SEBASTIAN.

A TALE OF THE PORTUGUESE IN INDIA.

10

"Sweet creature! angel of my life!
This hour repays the ills, the strife
That brought me to this dreary den
The victim of ungenerous men.
What! is it true—or do I dream—
The fancy of a heated brain—
That maketh life's last moments seem Replete with youthful joys again!
No dream! no dream! that form I see,
That glowing eye still bent on me,
And blushes mantling on thy cheek,
Which tell me more than words can speak.
Forgive my warmth—long years have past
Once looks like thine on me were cast,
Since kindly accents met my ear,
And woman's form stood smiling near.
Long years have past—my days have been
One frenzied and unblessed scene,
And little that my life can show
Becomes thy tender soul to know;
Yet must I tell thee, lest thou deem
The prisoner worse than he doth seem.

11

"It matters not to tell thee how
These days were spent, when on this brow
The light of youthful gladness flashed—
My spirit free and unabashed—
When in fair Lusitania's plains,
All free from cares and manhood's pains,
I played away the sunny hours,
Or dreamt amid the shady bowers,
And pictured life without a sorrow,
All bright to-day—the same to-morrow.
Those days are gone, and why should I
Resummon to my Fancy's eye
Those long lost joys of vanished years,
Recallers of unwelcome tears?

"There was an old grey-headed man,
Sun-burnt his cheek—dark with the tan
Of tropic climes—for he had been
With Albuquerque in every scene.
Of glory in the eastern seas,
When to the soft and spicy breeze
My country's banner was unfurled
To triumph in the Orient world.

Oft would I listen to his story
Of countless wealth and peerless glory,
Got in those rich and sunny climes,
In the bright days of olden times.
He spoke of Ormus—that famed isle
Lit with the sun's perpetual smile,
And set in that romantic sea
That laves the coast of Araby,
The isle they call the world's chief gem,
The best in nature's diadem—
Of its unequalled wealth and trade,
Its pomp—and all that could have made
A youthful, ardent soul like mine
Pant for a world I deemed divine.
He told how Albuquerque had fought
There, and on the Malayan shore—
What fame was his!—what spoils he brought
What splendor when the toil was o'er!
How feast and festival was theirs
Who fought beneath his colours bright!
How gold and gems—without their care—
Followed always the glorious fight!
How beauty's smiles and brightest charms
Repaid always the toil of arms!
What wonder that my spirit felt
The wish to dwell where he had dwelt!
What wonder then, that visions bright
Thick crowded on my fancy's sight!
And I resolved to leave my home,
In regions of delight to roam,
And seek those joys and dangers sweet
Which daring youth so loves to meet.
Ambition glowed within my brain
A soldier's life!—all else was vain!
I dreamt of conquered realms, sacked towns,
Sceptres usurped, and plundered crowns,
The pomp of war, the pride of power,
And victory's delirious hour.
My sword I buckled to my side,
And sped across the waters wide,
Nor sighed to leave that pleasant clime
Where I had spent sweet boyhood's time.

"Long years have past, and I have been
In many a strange and bloody scene;
On Reccan's coast, on Pegu's shore,
Where Christian foot ne'er fell before;
And oft among those spicy isles
Where the blue sea like Heaven smiles.
And I have seen War's demon game,
Have shared its glory and its shame,
Familiar with its horrors grown,
And witnessed deeds I would not own.

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given, any other being unnecessary and likely to cause confusion.

" My tale is brief—'twere vain to tell
 Each varied scene—and idly swell
 The story of a truant life,
 Less marked by peace than storm and strife ;
 But one event there is has left
 Within my heart—now dearly reft
 Of joys and griefs—a burning trace
 Which death alone can now efface.
 De Brito—you have heard his name,
 A name that long ago became
 A stirring watchword to the brave
 Who came across the western wave,
 And gained him Pegu's regal crown—
 De Brito sought Dianga town
 From Selim Shah, who cursed the hour
 When first the stranger rose to power,
 Vexed that a Christian chief should reign
 Where he had borne his arms in vain.
 The Lusian deemed the city won,
 But Selim seized his favorite son,
 And, with a thrill of savage joy,
 Stabbed to the heart the harmless boy.
 While still on bloody murder bent,
 Swift to the town his mandate went
 To massacre each Christian soul,
 Woman, and man, and child—the whole
 To leave alive no Portuguese
 Again to vex his royal ease.

" The night was beautiful and calm,
 And, like some rare and subtle balm
 Prepared by angel Alchymy,
 The moonlight spread around, above,
 And seemed to stir the soul to love.
 Clear in my memory is the light
 And beauty of that fatal night :
 I sat upon my terrace then Thinking on those moments when
 First in my youthful mind arose
 Those dreams that broke youth's sweet repose
 And led my footsteps to this clime
 Ere life had grown to manhood's prime.
 'Twas silent all, when quick the cry
 Of tumult rent the stilly sky,
 Wild shrieks of murder and dismay
 Gave signal of the bloody fray.
 I strained my eye, I bent my ear ;
 The horrid tumult gathered near ;
 I rushed into the open street
 When soon, too soon the truth was told,
 For lifeless lay beneath my feet
 Many a Lusian comrade bold.
 My single arm I felt was vain :
 I fought 'tis true, but sought to gain
 The shore where haply none might mark
 My passage to a friendly bark
 That floated on the waters there,
 Free from the Moslem's wily snare.
 The shore was reached, the bark was gained,
 And I with foeman's blood all stained Trod the firm deck as fast each sail
 Expanded to the favoring gale.
 The shore grew dim, the breeze blew strong
 And merrily we dashed along ;
 Joy gleamed upon each gladdened brow
 As onward flew the friendly prow.

THE number of visitors to the Indian Museum during December last reached 44,753 persons, including 34,332 native males and 9,152 native females and 979 male Europeans and 290 European women. As the Museum was open for 21 days only, the average of daily attendance was as high 2131—as an indubitable proof of popularity.

WE are obliged to Major Cooper, the Honorary Secretary, for the following five items of information regarding the Countess of Dufferin's Fund:—

"The first of the Silver medals presented by H. E. the Viceroy to the National Association for supplying Female Medical Aid to the Women of India has been claimed by the authorities of the Grant Medical College, Bombay, for presentation to Miss B. Bradley, the most successful student during the past year at the first examination in the certificated Practitioners Class.

Sir Walter Desouza, whose liberality has enabled many female students to study at the Calcutta Medical College, has just placed a cheque for Rs. 2,400 in the hands of the Central Committee, being his final donation to the sum which, under the name of the Desouza Trust, has conferred so much good to scholars and sick in the Indian metropolises.

The Queen's Register is nearly finished, but the number of contributors to the Jubilee collection were so great that it will yet be some days before the book will be ready for despatch to Her Majesty, as every entry has to be most carefully examined. A copy of the list is being made out for printing, and the names of all contributors, together with the copy of the Presentation Address, will be published with the Annual Report.

The capital engraving in a recent number of the Graphic of Dr. Barter's class of nurses at Nagpur, Central Provinces, shows that interest in the movement has extended beyond the limits of the Indian Empire. The reports from the Branches are now being received by the Central Committee, and give a very satisfactory account of the progress of the Association during the past twelve months. The provincial organisation is working well, and the local Committees are settling down steadily to their work. The co-operation of the Medical authorities and the various Municipalities and District Boards is very noticeable in the reports of the Branches. The interest taken in the movement by the non-official members of the various local Boards and Committees is one of the most encouraging signs of public approval.

The Third Annual General Meeting will be held in Calcutta early in February, and it is hoped that it may be attended by representatives of the various Branches. There are not any changes to propose in the Rules of the Association, but it is very probable that it may be found necessary to incorporate the Association in view of the increasing responsibility incurred in the distribution and custody of public money."

THE appointment of Sir Charles Elliot in the place of Sir Theodore Hope in the Viceroy's Council is gazetted, and he has taken his seat.

NOTES AND LEADERETTES.

WE are officially informed that the last pillar on the Murghab section of the Afghan frontier was erected by the end of December. Colonel Alikhanoff, the Governor of Merw, and Colonel Tarkhanoff, the Governor of Punjab, with some German travellers and a considerable Turkoman escort, were present. Hospitalities were exchanged by the English and Russian Officers. The two parties were to have started north-eastwards the first week in January. All's well that end's well.

THE Maharaja of Mysore is at present staying in Calcutta on a visit. His Highness arrived here last Tuesday and was escorted in one of the Viceroy's carriages under the usual salute, to his residence, 21 Garden Reach. His Highness' people, high and low, Europeans and Asiatics, made the best of their way to their quarters on foot or in chance ticca Bengal bandies or such other inconveniences or misconveniences as luck favored or favored them not. There were no arrangements for the transport of the following host, and the usual ticca garies that lounge at the terminus happened not to be in force. To add to the situation, the Port Commissioners who wait for no Raja or Rajmantri, true to their almanac, were dodging to disolve for the moment their nuisance of a shanty dingy bridge. Accordingly a "stampede" was ordered. Were it not for the hospitable courtesy of the Viceroy, the great station might have resounded with, A horse! a horse! a kingdom for a horse; etc., A cab! a cab! a Raja for a cab!

THE State Mahmandar and other paraphernalia of the Foreign Office—be they Boses or Dasses, Bukshs or Browns, Smiths or Joneses—are in high feather and "mighty jolly," like doctors at the approach of the sickening season. In these days of retrenchment they are not only glad of an opportunity for showing some work but they are in pretty good demand, and the quotation promises daily improvement. Their duty is simply delicious. It is literally a Business of Pleasure—to feast and be feasted. For, doubtless they are not such simpletons as to forget the claims of No. 1. Nor are the guests such churls as to scruple to help them to the good things to be paid for by the practically absent third party, the Indian rate payer. And the Indian Princes always reserve a good fund for free will Backheesh to the incorruptible Ars Beghies, Khansamans, Mooshreffs, Moot-suddies, and menials of the Household of the British Mogul.

Just now Mysore is the great gun among the native guests, but a motley crew are soon expected who may function in this Calcutta season as the Khan of Khelat did at Lord Lytton's Grand Tamasha of Empire at Delhi. There is already a dubious flutter among the Foreign Office people. For they are preparing for the advent of a frontier mountain chief. This is no other than Sardar Afzul-ul-Mulk of Chitral, who with 22 followers, arrived at Sialkot from Jammu on the 26th. Thence the party were to start for Calcutta on the 5th January, and, calling at Delhi en route, reach Calcutta on the morning of Tuesday next, the 10th January.

The Governor of Bombay and Lady Reay arrived in town this morning under the usual honors. They will stay here ten days and take Benares and other upcountry cities in the return.

PURSUANT to announcement in the papers, Mr. Locke Richardson's recital of Julius Cæsar came off on Thursday night at the Dalhousie Institute, before a distinguished and sympathetic audience headed by the Viceroy and Lady Dufferin, and the Lieutenant-Governor with their respective suites. The hall was fairly filled with European ladies and gentlemen. The Indian attendance was confined to the sterner sex, of every age and condition. Student and teacher, guardian and ward, pleader and client, black curls and grey hairs, were there, animated by the common desire of listening to the words of the immortal dramatist through the voice of a great elocutionist whom a good wind had blown to our shores. It is to be regretted that the emancipated denizens of the zenana and the girl graduates were quite unrepresented. Such abstention may lead to an impression that the sensation novel is more to their taste than the writings of the world's bard and that Portia is not a model which they care to honor, much less to imitate. Here (as often elsewhere) the Mahomedan community was represented in the sole person of Nawab Abdool Luteef.

The hour for the performance was not mentioned, and vaguer word than "evening" does not exist in English or any other language. No wonder, some of the audience came rather too early on the scene. We suppose the same circumstance is accountable for the late appearance of the Government House party, which delayed the opening of the business, causing some truly British grumbling. There was also some confusion in the allotment of the so-called reserved seats which we suppose will not be repeated.

Mr. Richardson quite fulfilled the expectations he had raised in the minds of his audience. The recital was intelligent and interesting throughout; the expression dramatic, the action being always suited to the word. Starting with the advantage of a pleasing exterior, the performer sustained the attention of his audience by the varying modulations of his voice proper to the different characters, as by appropriate aside observations and explanations which took the place of hand-bills and scenery, thus as it were singly representing all the parts. Mr. Richardson also introduced critical observations upon different characters and scenes in the play which had the merit of condensing, within a small compass, the cogitations of many writers. We do not think it necessary to revert to these last beyond drawing attention to a mistake in the criticism of the morning press. Shakespeare's Cæsar is not the all-accomplished statesman, the splendid orator, and all the rest of it. With all his "little Latin," the Poet has, by instinct of genius, been able generally to present the truth of Roman life and of the recorded event. The exception is in the character which gives name to the play. He would have better called it "Brutus." His Cæsar is neither the Cæsar of history, nor the Cæsar of the Commentaries. The notable deficiency in the creation is that it Cæsar is no doer at all—no man of action. On the contrary, he is represented with all his infirmities, so as to justify the conspiracy against him and to exalt the character of Brutus, and it is a rather serious mistake to father the opposite view upon, of all men, a lifelong student of Shakespeare like Mr. Richardson. We are glad to find that encouraged by his first success with our fellow-citizens, Mr. Richardson proposes the recital of Merchant of Venice as per details mentioned elsewhere in our columns. We trust he will meet with the good success which he richly deserves.

A DIVISIONAL Bench, consisting of the Chief Justice Sir Comer Petheram and the Hon'ble Mr. Chunder Madhub Ghose, have referred to the Full Bench the question of Hindu Law of inheritance, namely, whether uncle's son's son or brother's son shall first succeed.

It is in go-ahead America that woman's rights are receiving the utmost development. The land swarms with lady doctors, lady lawyers. Females are crowding every civil profession and employment. Girls and boys are educated together. In many exercises the ladies take their full share. At Washington alone a hundred ladies ride tricycles. In Nebraska, the lady leader of the bar has been raised to the bench.

IN another particular, the sex is asserting itself, even in Old England—we mean women availing themselves of the benefits of the patent laws. Formerly their invention was at the mercy of ungenerous man. If a woman happened to make a useful discovery, she personally gained nothing by it, either in the way of pelf or praise, for some male cousin or other relative of the ruder sex usually appropriated it. Woman now claims her own. Many fair inventors are in the field and careful of their rights under the patent laws. The genuineness of the inventions as results of female ingenuity is beyond question. The mark of femininity is on them. Indeed they all belong to the sphere of woman's life in particular. Thus Lady A. M. W. Fitz William has registered a new ambulance. Another lady, Philot by name, has patented two inventions, (1) a gridiron for frying fish, and (2) a rotatory bread grinder to make up waste pieces of bread into crumbs. A woman of Essex announces a protection—much needed—for the tip of the toe of shoes. An America lady, as fitting, has distanced them all by the invention of a process for cleaning and renewing dresses without taking them to pieces. It is strange that such a supreme necessity should have to this day remained unattended to—that the desideratum should still exist. But then it was felt only by women and the discovery belonged to the male department.

THE whole Hindu world will be interested to know that its Taianga Swami is no more! The charm at last wore away, and that phenomenon of longevity as he was deemed, has paid the debt of Nature. After baffling the patience of generations, the sainted Rishi expired on Monday the 26th December. On the following morning the body was carefully deposited in a wooden box and consigned to the Ganges the box being perforated with nobs so as to admit the holy water whose touch is to cleanse the spirit that had left but not to let fishes and other aquatic animals prey upon the body. One would have thought that a sage and devotee would be glad of the opportunity of providing with his lifeless body a good feast to the denizens of the water below. So the late Raja Radhakanta left minute directions touching the disposal of his remains, how his body was to be left to the turtles of Mathura to be devoured, etc. The method adopted in the late Swami's case is said to be the usual way of disposing of the bodies of Jogees and others who are not burnt.

THIS is the New Year's Day Feast of Honours for Official India, Her Majesty's banquet to her servants, with a few crumbs for such hungry outsiders as happen to enquire about the bill of fare of the coming day and the guests to be specially favoured:—

The Gondal State to rank amongst First-class States of Kathiawar."

The new learned distinctions have already begun to be abused. Thus the Mahomedan world will hear with astonishment Moulvi Mahomad Hossein of Pabna made a Shamsul Ulama. Poor Gobind Lal Roy having at last paid his pence—towards the Louis Bustee at Darjeeling, has got his life's end. He had bled for the Lieutenant-Governor in vain. We believe he had a sort of promise from Sir Rivers Thompson, but to his misfortune the Maharaja of Cooch Behar put a spoke in the wheel of his fortune. To add to his mortification, he saw his rival the Laird of Kakina—a much more important local magnate, with antecedents—elevated, while himself left in the lurch.

The Doctors need not despair. Their crust of bread is certainly not in danger of being snatched away just yet! The sheet anchor of European practice is about to be strengthened once more. Besides cinchona they are going to have another substitute for quinine:—

"Chemistry seems destined to play almost as important a part in the annals of trade as did the substitution of machinery for hand labour. It is said that a chemist has discovered a substitute for quinine, which can be produced at much less cost than the article which now plays such an important part in the medicine of to-day, and the artificial production is said to possess all the medicinal qualities of the famous bark. This, if it indeed be so, will almost certainly destroy the trade in India and Ceylon, which has grown of late years to such proportions that it has practically stopped the export of the bark from Peru."

"If it indeed be so!" But there's the rub! But it is not so, and it cannot be as all Nature testifies, if science could see it. It is all nonsense that a chemist has discovered a substitute for quinine, which can be produced at much less cost than quinine. The new drug may be cheap as dirt, but it will be as nasty or worthless too, we are afraid. No chemist can achieve the impossible. It is not in Chemistry to produce a substitute for quinine or for any other drug. It is presumption in Chemistry to think of doing so, and a waste of energy to attempt it, seeing that that almost mechanical science has no understanding of drug action, belonging to the most delicate and difficult branch of all scientific investigation. So far from a substitute for quinine being produced, we are inclined to believe that the Indian quinine is not the same drug as the product of the South American bark.

REIS & RAYYET.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 7, 1888.

THE OLD YEAR.

ANOTHER year has rolled itself into the Past—another link in the onward chain of existence has been measured up. Last Sunday ushered in the New Year—an event always regarded with solemnity, as it is welcomed with joy. May it prove happy to our friends and readers! If the Old Year was happy, may the New Year be happier still—by adding to the good the other might have brought. If the Old Year brought aught of evil, may the New Year take it away. To particular individuals, or particular aggregates of individuals, the year that is gone probably proved, as usual, very far from happy. In localities here and there, it would probably be remembered hereafter with feelings other than of the pleasantest kind. This is more or less the case with every Old Year. But however it may be viewed by the close annalist, the local observer, or individual sufferer, on a broad and comprehensive survey of its effects upon this God's world at large, no Old Year—except in periods of aberration, cycles of Vengeance—but will be found to have advanced it—brought positive gain in knowledge, and progress and happiness. Notwithstanding temporary aberrations—partial or periodical divergencies—this is the law of growth, of universal operation, in the past, as in the present and future.

The journalist in his customary review of the year often occupies, however, the position of a close annalist, and of a more or less local observer. Representing a limited constituency—more directly concerned with the affairs of a particular country or section of country, he must view things as they appear on his limited scale. The incidents of life in detail are often of a kind which denies him the optimism of the philosopher, the cheerful frame of mind induced by contemplating the whole panorama in its proper perspective. Microscopy, in History is obviously fatal to reverence and comfort.

In Europe, the Old Year has been one of continual unrest. The year began with the question of the Bulgarian succession in full swing, and now that it closes, that question is far from closed as yet. It has been an interminable game of diplomacy, often threatening to lead to overt collision, happily prevented so far. Russia has claimed her right of interference in Bulgarian affairs, particularly in the choice of a ruler for the people, but there is chronic and powerful resistance in the new principality backed by countenance from without. Bulgaria has held her own so far, but not without a strain on her resources of a well-nigh intolerable kind. The strain is not confined to one country, the whole of the great and even some of the lesser European Powers, have been forced to increase their military armaments, and maintain them in a high state of equipment. In Germany, open rupture was imminent between the Man of Blood and Iron and the Reichstag on the subject of supplies, till the latter, after some resistance, gave way. The same thing was the case in France where General Boulanger exercised a fascinating spell over the people. His party has now gone out, but not before the military organization of the country has taxed the utmost resources of the people. France and Germany are like two gigantic camps, armed at every point, ready to close with each other at a moment's notice. What this chronic war scare means to the arts of peace—what a disaster it is to the real prosperity and happiness of the people, may well be imagined. A notable event which caused not a little sensation in France, was the scandalous disclosures about the sale of military honors and offices by M. Wilson, son-in-law of President Grevy, revealing the prevalence of corruption in most unexpected quarters. The atmosphere was so surcharged with distrust, that the soul of honor at the head of the State himself did not escape the shafts of faction. In the end, the son-in-law was cleared, but not before the father-in-law had resigned. Hence the formation of a new Government. This has not been the only change of ministry in the French Republic. The military party of Boulanger and the peace party, have managed to keep France on the rack of political restlessness. There have been several changes in the personnel of the Government, and the only thing certain seems to be the uncertainty which prevails.

In the European situation, England has not much embroiled herself, but the Bulgarians have just cause of complaint on the score of her attitude. Lord Salisbury is indeed satisfied that Bulgarian independence is safe in the keeping of the Great Signatory Powers to the Treaty of Berlin, but something more than such expressions of complacency would soothe the wounds which they are receiving in their unequal contest with a formidable Empire. The relations of Austria and Russia on the Bulgarian question, did not seem to be of the happiest, while speculation was rife as to the real leanings of Germany or the Porte. The war scare was by no means confined in Germany and France, a high standard of military preparedness being the great object everywhere. About the beginning of the year, Austria asked for a heavy military subsidy, and even Italy was not exempt from the craze. Indeed, the year has been one of great disaster to this rising Southern Power. She sustained great reverses in Abyssinia, which necessitated retaliation. Large reinforcements had to be sent, and altogether a protracted war has been on her hands all through the year, swallowing up all her resources, and keeping up ferment and commotion in political circles, and, as in France, rendering the chances of a stable Government impossible.

The English occupation of Egypt continues, and there is no knowing when it is going to determine. The British Government have continually professed to have no intention to make their stay in that country permanent, and have often fixed a time when it would be left "to stew in its own juice." Declarations of this kind gained some strength last year, and after protracted negotiations, an Anglo-Turkish Convention was proposed. In this Convention, the English agreed to evacuate the country after another period of two years, but they insisted on the right of re-entrance and interference, in case the affairs of Egypt fell into disorder so as to affect the British interests in the land. This condition was one to which the assent of the Porte was endeavoured to be obtained, but the other European Powers intervened, and the Convention fell through, things again returning to their Statu quo. Indeed, the British policy in Egypt has been one of subterfuge, and a continual violation of repeated engagements.

England has had enough troubles of her own and to spare. The Irish Question continued to gather round it the dust and heat of the deadliest contest. It has led to a shuffling of old parties—a new alignment of old landmarks—till the well known leaders of the Liberals as well as the Conservatives find themselves with strange companions. Mr. Gladstone and Hartington are parted, with hardly any chance of reconciliation. Chamberlain has also gone from the Liberal following as well as Bright. The Grand Old Man now shares with Parnell the leadership of the Home Rule Party, and the Unionists have gathered to themselves some of the best and bravest of his quondam retainers. The Crimes Bill has passed, not without the enacting of disgraceful scenes in the staid British House of Commons which used to be free from such characteristic features of Continental and Transatlantic chambers. And the Act has been enforced with little moderation. There is almost a revolt in Ireland, but prosecution of Irish leaders and proclamations of meetings and even of the National League have not had a quieting effect.

Ferment reigns in England itself, the boasted land of Liberty and Order. The wave of Socialism has burst upon her shores—the ominous figure of Militarism has almost entered appearance. There have been terrible demonstrations of the Unemployed, reminding one of the worst tumults in the last days of the Roman Commonwealth. The excesses of the working classes knew no bounds. Like the cry of panem et circenses, they paraded the streets with banners, bearing the inscription, "Bread or Work," wearing the Red Cap of Liberty, and even chanting the Marseillaise. It was, however, at the worst, an English rabble, and peace was soon enough restored, not, indeed, before resort had to be taken to the drastic plan of proclaiming public meetings, and considerable damage had been inflicted on trade and property. The police had a hard time of it, and required to be supplemented by the military. The Socialists must now be taken account with, here as well as on the Continent, and reigning sovereigns must put their heads together as to how long they could safely go on keeping the military system on the stretch.

Lord Dufferin's Viceroyalty has passed through a year of comparative quiet. Quiet, that is, so far as the turmoil of political dissensions which beset his predecessor is concerned. We remember his Lordship to have breathed the fond wish while replying to the after-dinner congratulations which he received from his countrymen on the eve of his departure for India, that nothing would make him happier than to receive similar congratulations on his return, the interval being one of peace and silence in regard to his name. That wish has in a measure been attained, although we are not prepared to say the apparent calm has brought him real quiet of mind. His Government has been severely weighted with the financial difficulty, due, no doubt, to his own action in Burma. Notwithstanding the organization personally introduced by the Commander-in-Chief, the so-called brigandage of the Burmans has also continued to give trouble. Nor has the state of Afghanistan been without its anxieties. Some relief, has, indeed, come with the termination at last of the business of the Boundary Commission, but the mystery which still hangs over the movements of Ayub Khan, and the Ghilzai rebellion against the Amir, have left little peace to that country of distracted politics, and the troubles of Afghanistan, from whatever source, must have a share for the Government of India.

The year 1887 has been, so far as India is concerned, one of normal character, as regards the weather, the crops, and health. There have been no exceptional atmospheric disturbances, causing a serious failure of the harvests, nor the outbreak of sickness of an abnormal kind. So far the land has had opportunities of recovering from the effects of former disasters, which, by their recurrence, had brought it to a low ebb of life. The year, however, did not go, without having its full tale of disasters of another kind. The event which will be most sadly remembered in association with the year 1887, was the wreck of a pilgrim vessel, the Sir John Lawrence, bound for Pooree, in the Bay of Bengal, by a cyclone. The disaster fell like a thunderbolt on the city of Calcutta which was the greatest sufferer, the casualties being chiefly confined to inhabitants of the city. The loss of life was considerable, having, so far as it could be ascertained, been within a thousand, chiefly female. This accident, like the wreck of the Hesperus, fabled in song, was due to the foolhardiness of the Captain, but the enquiry, which, under orders of the Government, was made by a Committee into the circumstances, also disclosed defects in the management which should not exist. The constitution of the Committee of Enquiry was not all that could be desired, nor the witnesses examined of a sufficiently representative character. These defects must have affected the finding of the Committee, but Captain Neustein has not allowed the Committee to have the last word in the business, and the observations which he has published on the subject must go far to enable the impartial public to form an accurate judgment. The wreck of the Sir John Lawrence was followed by other disasters of the same kind. The Maharatta, another steamer chartered by the same firm, Messrs. Macneill and Company, to replace the lost Sir John Lawrence, met with a similar fate, the loss of life being, however, not considerable, according to the official view. The B. I. S. N. Company's steam vessel, Arcot, stranded in the same sea, with the loss of 5 passengers. The year will be remembered for other calamities by fire or flood or storm, but accidents like these are never absent from the history of a year, and we have no wish to lay on dark colors to make our review unnecessarily gloomy.

In India, the year was heralded with the grand doings of the Queen's Jubilee. The celebration of that auspicious event took place in this country on the 16th and 17th of February, and great were the efforts made on all hands to make it an impressive spectacle. The whole country was astir—the manifestation of loyalty was unmistakable and universal. The Queen's Jubilee was of course formally celebrated with the usual demonstrations of pomp and rejoicing which strike the popular imagination. But these were not all. The loyalty evoked on the occasion displayed itself likewise in acts of permanent beneficence and charity. After satisfying the needs of scenic display and popular amusement—the illuminations and fireworks and musical displays being admired and enjoyed—enduring memorials of the event were sought to be established which would make the future partaker with the present of the celebration. The liberality shown on this occasion was something unique, and permanent works of public good are scattered over the length and breadth of the land to attest to future generations the loyalty of the Indian people. Several of the Native Princes commemorated the event by abolishing the transit duties. The celebration of the Jubilee in England took place in May, at which India was far from being unrepresented. Indeed, one of the most picturesque features of the Royal procession to the Westminster Abbey on the Jubilee day was the presence in it of a splendid array of Native Princes. As in India, the Jubilee called forth a burst of liberality among the British people, which also took the shape of institutions of a permanently beneficent character. The Native Princes have had to bear no small strain on their resources on account of the demands of the Jubilee. They had to make the celebration of it worthy of themselves in their own territory as well as participate in the public movements set on foot at Home. To the Indian and Colonial Imperial Institute, which, under the patronage of the Prince of Wales, has been found as the permanent memorial of the Queen's Jubilee for her dominions abroad, their contributions have been on a princely scale. The Jubilee has proved a godsend to philanthropists in furnishing them with a moral lever for more effectively working on public benevolence in support of the charitable objects which they had severally in view. Of such philanthropists, Lady Dufferin had not been slow to turn the occasion to account, and the Jubilee subscriptions to her Fund for Native Female Medical education and treatment have gone no small way in improving the financial position of the benevolent movement.

The Indian National Congress has, by its moderation, succeeded in disarming suspicion. The second Session of the Congress was held in Calcutta under the able presidency of Mr. Dadabhai Naoroji, and it dispersed about the beginning of the current year. Its discussions were conducted with such intelligence, knowledge, and, above all, temperance and sobriety as to contradict the calumnies which had been spread about it. Its enemies had ascribed to it extravagant and impracticable aims which existed nowhere except in their imagination, and which have been effectively belied by the proceedings of the body. The year closes with another sitting of the Congress at Madras, the business of which has been conducted with the same wisdom. To the Indian patriot, the spectacle of the whole continent coming together once a year to discuss matters of common interest cannot but be exceedingly gratifying. English education and the Indian press have now achieved what the Mogul arms failed to accomplish. India is now, for all practical purposes, one Empire, with identical interests, with one full beating in the entire body politic, no better proof of which could be given than the fact of the Congress itself. To a Government constituted like that of British India, the voice of a National Congress cannot but be of the highest aid.

The financial pressure due to the increased military expenditure of the Imperial Government, has not abated since the previous year. On the contrary, it threatens to be chronic. The operations in Burma continue, and there is hardly knowing when this drain on the resources of the Empire will cease. The Afghan Boundary Commission has, indeed, closed after going through untold sufferings and privations of various kinds in its marches and during its sojourn in those inhospitable regions. What loss of life and treasure it has entailed remains to be completely accounted for. An adequate set-off for all this would doubtless be afforded by the establishment of cordial relations between the two Great Powers that contend for the sovereignty of the East. The prospect of such cordiality is, however, as remote as ever. In the meantime, the exigencies of a watchful military policy on the North-Western frontier, coupled with the lingering operations in Burma, absorb up all the resources of the State, cripple the prosecution of urgent works of public utility, affect all Provincial and even Local Funds, and prolong the imposition of a most odious tax upon a people unable for the most part to make the two ends meet. The necessities of the Imperial Government, paramount as they are, leave the Subordinate Governments nothing but to submit to sacrifices. The Decentralization scheme has been recast on new lines, much to the disadvantage of the Provincial Funds. Indeed, the fundamental principle of the scheme, namely, the prior equitable right of the Provincial Governments to these funds for provincial expenditure, has been abandoned, and a different principle laid down in its place. The Imperial Government is the master, and before the exigencies of Imperial protection and safety all other considerations must give way. No one is disposed to call in question the abstract necessity or justice of this principle. But its operation must be exceptional. The Provincial Governments have already acquiesced in it too long to be easy any longer. They have already starved themselves too long to remain quiet, and murmurs of discontent are beginning to be heard. The Imperial Government, it is true, have been anxious to obtain what relief it could by trying some husbandry of resources, and towards this object, appointed a Finance Committee. This Committee have held long and close deliberations, but, judging from the result, they do not appear to have attained any better success than similar Retrenchment Committees in the past. It is the old story of cheese-paring economy, the great vested interests being deemed inviolate. The true method of economy is to tackle with the big offices. But this will never be. Some concession has, indeed, been made by Lord Dufferin's Government to the clamour of the Indian party who have insisted on a larger infusion of the native element into the administration. A Public Service Commission has been sitting for the last two years, and its report is now ready. How far it will satisfy the just ambition of the people and at the same time meet the financial difficulty, we cannot say. Nothing short of organic reform, however, will be a permanent solution of the problem, and the recommendations of the Commission are looked forward to with the keenest interest. The continued financial pressure borne by the Imperial and Provincial Governments, as it is the most notable administrative feature in the history of the year, has not been without direful effects upon the people at large. The Income Tax has been a terrible engine of oppression, and, while nothing less than its withdrawal is called for by the highest considerations of policy and justice, there are rumours already in the air of the Government intending to increase its incidence. Should these rumours prove to be true, nothing could be more disastrous for the country or more fatal for the good name of the Government of India.

Of other noteworthy events of the year, the most prominent place is due to the establishment of a Legislative Council and of a University for the North-Western Provinces. How far these measures were justified by the progress of that territory remains to be seen, but the dissatisfaction already expressed at the results of the Calcutta University, and the corruption which has been discovered in the management of the University of the neighbouring land of the Punjab might well have given some pause to those who precipitated the University movement in a notoriously backward province. The opportunity afforded by the institution of a Legislative Chamber for the North-West might have been taken to try, on a tentative scale, the principle of representation for which there is such a strong demand in the country.

Much dust of controversy has been raised during the year over a question of social reform, to wit, that of early marriage. It arose out of the misunderstanding between one married couple, in Western India, carpenters by caste, Dadaji Bhikaji and Rukhmabai. Whatever her grievances, the discontented wife knew to make capital of them, and, whatever her original charms, she has bloomed into a great heroine and a martyr. The controversy on the marriage question has become general, every part of the country having been drawn into its vortex, till the Government of India have issued a circular to Local Governments calling for opinion as to what action, Executive or Legislative, on the part of the State, might be justified by the circumstances.

The year following that of the Madras Scandals, had its own crop of scandals, if of a less grave kind. One of the sufferers from the Madras Scandals at the hands of Sir M. Grant Duff, we mean, Mr. Crole, has had justice done to him by the Secretary of State. The penalty of suspension and of loss of pay was revoked, and his conduct in the matter thoroughly vindicated. Of official peccadilloes of this year's own, the most prominent are the tyranny of Mr. Newberry, Magistrate of Rungpore, in what is named the Deer case, the Draconian justice meted out by over zealous Joint Magistrates like Mr. Holmwood of the 24-Pergunnahs, and Mr. Luson, of the Nuldea District; the disclosures in connection with the Beames case, and the alleged love intrigue of Mr. Wilson of Cambay, caused no small sensation amongst the people. In some of those cases, substantial justice has been

In stomach complaints, liver affections, pains and spasms of the bowels, Holloway's Ointment well rubbed over the affected part immediately gives the greatest ease, prevents congestion and inflammation, checks the threatening diarrhoea and averts incipient cholera. meted out to the offenders, but the orders of the Secretary of State in the Cambay Scandal case have been received with great astonishment and humiliation.

Our review of the year, imperfect and hasty as it is, must have its mortuary return. Death, as usual, was busy in high places, and middle and low. So far as Indian interest is concerned, it is by no means a meagre crop he has garnered to himself. Most prominent among the friends of India whose voice and pen have been lost to her, is Major Evans Bell. The Princes and people of India will never let his name die, so manifold have been his services to the cause of Indian political reform. Sir Ashley Eden, late a Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, and who has left in this Province a thoroughly familiar name, also succumbed to a protracted illness. Among other retired Anglo-Indians whom death carried away, are the names of Dr. Norman Chevers, Mr. Bullen Smith, Sir F. Douglas Forsyth, Sir Philip Wodehouse and Sir Barrow Ellis. Some striking characters, with European reputation in their way, passed away in M. Katkoff, editor of the Moscow Gazette, and no mean factor in Russian politics, Mr. Newdegate, typical Tory Squire of the House of Commons and Herr Krupp, the greatest gun maker in the world. In our own country, death has robbed us of Dr. Ramdas Sen, a rising Orientalist, of Mr. Dear, the Monghyr benefactor, of Babu Rakhhal Das Halldar, an ornament of the Executive Service, and a man of note in other respects, of Babu Hari Mohun Mookerjee, an enthusiast in botany and in agricultural improvement, of Dr. Anandabai Joshi after the completion of her foreign medical education, and of the benevolent Rani Sarat Sundari of Putia, as also of some tutelary or reigning Princes, as the Raja of Jhind, the transported Raja of Pooree, Nawab Kulb Ali Khan of Rampore, and the Ex-King of Oudh.

THE FIX IN THE FOOTLIGHTS.

WHILE the ring and the footlights have combined to perplex the choice of amusements of the "White Town" of Calcutta, there seems to be something like a fix in the public amusements of the denizens of the "Black Town." There has been quite a revolution of late in the playhouses in Beadon Street. Last season, we had native circuses added to the three theatres. One of the former even invaded the sacred grounds of the Maidan and scored a triumph that might be envied by even a Wilson or a Chiarini. The theatres did very well too. The Star, in especial, successfully strove to maintain the popularity of the native stage. Bilwa Mangal, a wholesome play—the old story with a thoroughly new and attractive face—drew men and money; while "Bellick Bazaar: or the Scamp's Exchange," a Christmas pantomimic sketch, nightly filled the house and its coffers. The latter was practically the hit of the season, and had a rather long run. It attracted crowds when even the thought of Christmas had once more been shelved in dreamland. The Star scored another financial triumph during the Jubilee. The manager rose to the height of the occasion. The decoration and illumination of the Star were pronounced by both press and public to be most tasteful. They attracted Viceroyal notice on the evening of the Procession of the 16th February, and His Excellency gave permission for advertising a patronage night with presence—a favour out of which he backed, nor wisely as we think, by lending his ears to some heroes in false sentimentalism fancy free. Perhaps he was afraid lest the scandal of the "Empress of the Arena" were repeated over again. It was a mistake, and the scandal which this mistake produced more than outbalanced the misconception which prompted it. That an Englishman of Lord Dufferin's age and experience should have thought of the morality of a stage-girl off the stage before looking at her on the stage, was perhaps the biggest joke of the season.

But this disappointment was as nothing compared to what the management of the Star had to experience at the hands of Fate soon after. About this time a dark speck in the spotless blue of the heavens that has been so long smiling upon the proprietors of the Star, began to grow into shape. Scarcely a month had passed before it assumed formidable proportions. It struck terror into the hearts of the proprietors, though the manager managed to present a calm face for some time. The fact of it is that a member of the Colootola Seal family, just bursting out of the state of adolescence, took it into his head one fine morning to have a playhouse of his own. No sooner was it conceived than he thirsted to make it a fait accompli. The chief family trait in the stripling now showed itself. He would not only have a playhouse, but the very best, even to the destruction of all the others in the metropolis. The land lying immediately to the east of the Star Theatre was available and even the most prohibitive price offered by its fortunate proprietor was at once accepted and part of it paid in earnest. Here, however, there was a rub. The calm exterior of the manager of the Star had something to do with it. He was not only its manager, play-wright, "star" and director, but also its guardian angel. The manager went over to Baboo Gopal Lal Seal to expostulate with him on the ground of the wrong the Star was sure to suffer by the intended playhouse next door. The nuisance, he said, would be fatal to the interests of both the houses. It was all in vain, the young man was inexorable. The manager would then sell his own house for Rs. 50,000. The offer was accepted, the negotiation was about to be concluded when stepped in the millionaire's legal adviser. The young man's wild enthusiasm must be curbed, and if he must have the Star, the price must be only Rs. 30,000—for the goodwill, the profits and the prestige of the proprietors, and all. The manager was simply indignant, and the negotiation fell to the ground. And now the project of purchasing the adjacent land revived with redoubled fury. The millionaire was mad to buy it and the proprietor mad to sell it, but there came a hitch—an awkward hitch, it could not be bought or sold. From the details of this incident we would abstain. Suffice it to say that the still calmer mood of the Star Manager had something to do with it. For four months he strove armless and alone against formidable odds. But in the interests of his company it was useless holding out any longer, a deeper policy than all the legal heads in the metropolis could divine suggested itself to him. Suddenly one day he succumbed, the Rs. 30,000 was paid down and the "Star" became the "Emerald." Within a week the old proprietors bought land in Cornwallis Street, Grey Street-crossing, and laid the foundation-stone of the future Star. The building just now has almost neared completion, and looks even now as a grand and fine structure. It would have been completed and the Star re-opened before Christmas but for another and perhaps the happiest whim of the Emerald millionaire. He had the playhouse made a grand one by addition and decoration inside and out, but he badly wanted a grand manager to manage his grand concern. He had secured a veteran, but before the latter had had a trial the young gentleman changed his mind, succumbing to zenana influence, it is said. He now would have a surer public favorite. In fact, he must have Baboo Grish Chunder Ghose, the Star Manager and opened negotiation once again. Baboo Grish would not come deserting his old protégés unless they themselves would gladly part with him. To part with Grish, Baboo Seal paid the Star proprietors enough to gladden them and Grish was brought at his weight in gold. The calm hero of the footlights and favorite of fortune once more smiled to the most complete discomfiture of the legal and other wise heads.

After the storm, however, the calm has set in. We congratulate the young Baboo on his choice of his present manager. Baboo Grish Chunder Ghose—poet, actor, play-wright and dramatic master all rolled into one—is, as we have more than once said in these columns, a rare genius in the profession into which he has cast his lot. A man of extraordinary intelligence, and possessing rare practical wisdom, he would have flourished in almost any profession. A child of fancy, he early showed his turn for the boards wheron he soon enough made his mark. Father of his amateur company, he soon became the father of the professional Stage in Bengal. A dramatic literature for the stage—a sufficient supply of acting plays—was alone wanting to maintain the new taste of the Bengali public. Dino Bandhu Mitter, Michael M. S. Dutt and the dramatisation of Baboo Bankim Chandra Chatterjee's productions had by this time been thoroughly exhausted, and no new drama or dramatist of merit was to be had—new sensations were out of the question. The old stories were repeated times nauseating. There was a dead fix that was most eloquent through thin houses getting thinner nightly, and the very 'gods' threatened desertion en masse. The dire necessity produced the man. There was indeed no need of going out far for him. He was within the precincts of the footlights, the great tragedian himself. He was only modest hitherto, under circumstances which this cry for novelty scattered to the four winds. The Garrick of the Bengal Stage discovered himself as its Talfourd. An ardent admirer of the best English poetry, and having already wooed the Muses himself, he burst forth into dramatic blank verse in Bengali the despair—as the great poet once said himself—of Madhu Sudan Dutt. His first production, Raban Bath (the Fall of Ravan) was succeeded by other and still nobler births, between short intervals. We have heard Grish never writes his books but simply dictates his verses, and that at times the modern Vyas, in fine frenzy rolling, makes his Ganesh's task quite hopeless of execution. Already his plays number about thirty, plays embracing almost all the episodes of the Rāmāyan and the Mahābhārat the Chaitanya-Charitamrita, and the Lalit-Bistar. We hope Babu Ghose will surprise us with something still better now that he has got the man to back his genius and that energy of which he still possesses no little store. We hope the passion which the son of Wealth has conceived for the Drama will, under his manager's wise and fostering care, become developed into genuine love and appreciation which may save him ultimately from a mad career of pleasure—the fatal temptation nowadays of the majority of our rich youngsters, and on which—sad to say—so many of the great Mutty Lal Seal's own race have been wrecked.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR.

STR,—We know you to be an editor fond of phrases and idioms. You insert any correspondence, sense or nonsense in your well-known journal, if it happens to be chaste and ornate English with a certain amount of erudition, which generally the disciples of Dun-cotus display in their shallow writings.

Your Santipur correspondent is a man of the above type. He often with such pet phrases as 'man in the moon' 'three tailors in tooly St.' and 'cat's paw' &c., and hackneyed and stale witticisms finds favor with you. He like a pledged friend often holds out to the view of the public the bright side of the young and green-horned Vice-Chairman and vintishes his weaknesses and frailties enough to become dazzling attributes. At the last election the tutelary God of your correspondent stood for a commissioner-ship. But he was sadly defeated to his utter dejection and disappointment. It is a pity no doubt to see him crest fallen, but the fact goes to prove his utter unpopularity and dire want of discretion with which he exercised his power from his new musnud. The scandalous jobberies of his administration are still fresh in the memory of the Santipurians. The educated community hide their faces in the very name of that stripling, whose want of judgement and discretion led him to do foul plays at his pleasure. The rate-payers of Santipur, in the last election showed their moral courage by not electing one whom they have taken for an arbitrator* and a vintished noodle. The only alternative is now left for him is to be a nominated commissioner. We do not grudge him the honor he covets? And we heartily wish him success. The other day the able editor of the "Indian Daily News" after scrutinizing his administration, remarked the following:—

"The newly elected commissioners would not elect the obnoxious Babu (Soro Chunder Roy) to the Vice-chairmanship and the Bengal Government would show a poor appreciation of the views of the electors if they nominated a man so conspicuously rejected by the rate-payers. As to the age of the Babu, youth is no offence in itself; but we should say that an older man would be more suitable for the position."

The remarks are as judicious and prudent as they ought to be. If the Bengal Government do not nominate this younker, Mr. Editor! your able and truthseeking correspondent will die by inches of having nothing to write in eulogy of his decified hero.

With all your faults Mr. Editor! I know you to be a straightforward man which justifies me in hoping that you will not suppress my letter though you will not daintily relish it. I am your old and plain spoken friend,

SOSHI BHUSAN BOSE, (M. A.)

* * A false friend to be sure, and plain spoken by half only—a genuine partizan, in fact, but a foolish one who has not the art to conceal his hate, though he is a Master of Arts! A precious production of the Calcutta University! We have published the letter in all its native glory, not daring to make any changes for fear of being accused of sacrificing its points in league with our Santipore Correspondent. Poor "Master" Bose has not yet learnt to spell. No wonder idiomatic English should be a bugbear to him! But whatever the deficiencies of his education, surely, as a young Kyastha gentleman, he might have learnt better manners at home than causelessly to insult his seniors.

Notwithstanding all his sneers at "chaste and ornate English," (a sad jumble of his own, by the way) we have reason to suspect that our M. A. casts on it the same wistful longing look with which the fox dismissed the grapes overhead as sour. He himself does not disdain to try his pen at a little alliteration, where he shows us and our previous Correspondent up as the "disciples of Dunsotus [sic] displaying" erudition.

The above epistle is not a random shot nor a hasty scrawl, but a careful composition and a deliberate offence. Not a blot disfigures it. It is written leisurely in a neat hand---evidently from a previous draught. Hence its orthography and style are of the best in the writer's possession. So jealous is he of his reputation, indeed, so particular about his points, that he has taken the trouble to post a card by way of a corrigendum, to wit:---

"Santipur, the 26th Decem.

Sir,---Kindly read 'arbitrary' for 'arbitrator' in my letter dated the 25th instant.

Yours faithfully,
S. B. Bose."

That letter scarcely improves the situation. Verily, here is a correction in which nothing is corrected!

And is he one of the shining lights of "the educated community" of Santipore?

One parting word to all poors (purs if you prefer the Hunterian method) and provinces as well as persons. Reis & Rayyet is no partizan, whatever may be those whose communications find admittance in it. The journal is always open to correction, even though the offence may have been given by the editor himself. But, of course, people cannot be allowed to insult, like this blessed Bose, on pretence of correcting. We have deliberate views of our own, and on many questions strong opinions, but we have no Zid against persons or things or views---no bigotry, no claim to monopoly of truth or wisdom.---Ed., R. & R.

Nim Oil No. 1—For internal use.
Nim Oil No. 2 } For external use.
Nim Ointment. }

Dr. Brandis says—"The oil is used medicinally as an antiseptic and anthelmintic." Dr. Maxwell has found it "as efficacious as Cod Liver Oil in cases of consumption and scrofula." Sir W. O'Shaughnessy says—"The oil is thought anthelmintic and is applied externally to foul ulcers and used as a liniment in rheumatic and spasmodic affections and in headaches from exposure in the sun." Dr. Dymock says—"The oil is applied to suppurating glands, is given in leprosy and in a variety of diseases." If applied to sores in horses and other domestic animals, it keeps off flies and thereby promotes healing. The oil is a sovereign remedy for BARSATEE SORES, mange and itches and all foul sores in horses and cattle. Nighanta Ratnakar, a Sanskrit Medical Encyclopædia, thus speaks of the medicinal virtues of the Nim Oil—"It is bitter, destroyer of worms, cures leprosy abscesses and ulcers and diseases of impure blood, chronic fever and piles."

SEBASTIAN.

A TALE OF THE PORTUGUESE IN INDIA.

"Three days had passed, and still we sailed
Before a breeze that never failed.
The fourth day, as uprose the sun,
And dewy morning ceased to weep,
The echo of a distant gun
Boomed clearly o'er the silent deep,
Far to the East a sail appeared,
And speedily the stranger neared,
Another gun!—we felt alarmed;
All hurriedly the crew were armed,
And, half in doubt and half in fear,
We gazed as fast the prore drew near.
Another gun!—the foeman's flag!
'Crowd every sail,—we must not lag
My lads when foes, like these are nigh.
Crowd every sail and let us fly.'
'Twas vain, 'twas vain, still nearer came
The foe, and sooth, I felt some shame
To think our Christian vessel ran
Before a prow of Arracan.
On came the foe, began the fray,
And yard to yard the vessels lay;
Fiercely we fought, but still no check,
Comrades and foemen strewed the deck.
Oh! 'tis a horrid thing to be
Thus fighting in the lone wide sea,
With sky and ocean spread around
And nothing but the wave's dull sound,
To answer with its mockery there
The shriek of pain, the dying prayer.
I sank at last, nor know I how Victory fell upon the prow;
But when my senses came again,
I found myself among the men
Who brought me here in chains where I,
Fair maid, am doubtless doomed to die.
I fear not death—yet would I live
If but for this—that life might give
Of sweet revenge, one glorious hour
To check the treacherous Selim's power,
Retrieve in battle field our name,
And wipe away the madd'ning shame
Thus thrown upon the Portuguese
Once masters of the Indian seas."

17

He ceased: As 'gainst the wall he leant,
Her dark full eye on his was bent,
For as he spoke of fame, felt noble ire,
Bright beamed his features, and his eye was fire,

While in the lofty proudness of his look
Too clear were traced what thoughts his spirit shook.
He leant against the wall with folded arms,
Lost for the moment to the quiet charms
Of Gul-ánar, whose pensive features wore
A sweeter look than they had worn before.

"Christian! in truth I mourn thy fate,
For deep and deadly is the hate
That Yeosuff bears thy race;
And well I know 'tis joy to him
To keep thee in this dungeon dim,
Where pleasure has no place;
To let thy broken spirit nurse
Each painful thought and fruitless curse,
And feed upon the torturing thought
Of joys which happier hours brought;
To let no ray of hope be thine,
In grief and loneliness to pine,
'Till life wears out, and the frame sinks
Beneath the burst of hope's last links.
I knew him well—myself have been Too oft the victim of his spleen,
Suffering what has racked this heart,
And almost rent its ties apart;
But morning breaks—thy life is safe,
Unless unseen mischances chafe
The tyrant, and in bloody mood
He breaks upon thy solitude,
There yet is hope—though faint the ray,
And gleaming on a distant day.
'There yet is hope—Oh! if my power
Could loose thy chains, the coming hour
Should find thee with a freeman's tread Wandering where thy wishes led."

'The maid is gone—the maid who came
So seraph-like to soothe his woes,
Because he bore a Christian name
And dwelt among Unchristian foes.
She, who when hope's last ray seemed fled
And every joy for ever dead—
Friends far, and foe men nigh—
Grim death, before the eye
Being a sickly dream
Replete with visions dim
Came, like the sudden gleam
Of waters unto him,
Who long hath roamed the desert curst,
And nought to quench his burning thirst,
Came like religion, meek and mild,
At the pillow of a dying child.

Not now the prisoner thinks on death,
 The lamp of life once more burns bright,
 And love and joy, and the soft breath
 Of hope, awake a new delight.
 Though stern the captive soldier's breast,
 The tender sigh is unrepent.
 What wonder Gul-ánár should wake
 Each gentle thought and feeling,
 Until his heart for her sweet sake
 At love's bright shrine was kneeling.
 What wonder that her eye, her form,
 Her winning tone, her look of love,
 So like to what we paint above,
 Should touch a soul, racked in the storm
 Of an unquiet life,
 Till grown quite sick of strife !
 What wonder ! love will find its way
 Where harshest feelings hold their sway,
 And, like sweet music, render
 The sternest bosom tender.

21

Each night, when quiet reigned around,
 And slumber prying eyes had bound,
 Would Gul-ánár with silken tread
 The mazes of the prison thread,
 By more than simple kindness led.
 And there, with fruits and spices sweet,
 The lonely Christian captive greet,
 There stood the maid in that dark cell,
 And in her hand she bore
 A silver lamp, whose radiance fell
 His sun-burnt features o'er !
 Strange was the contrast 'twixt
 That scion of the West,
 Whose glance of love was not unmixt
 With fierceness and unrest,
 And her, the beautiful and mild,
 Sunny India's generous child,
 Whose braided brow and Orient dress
 Robed her in peerless loveliness !

Though cheerless that lone cell, the night
 Was passed in somewhat of delight,
 While listening to the tales he told
 Of other lands and other times,
 Wild scenes which travellers behold,
 The wonders of rare trodden clime,
 And oft he spoke in idle mood
 Of danger he himself had wooed—
 Of strife by land, of storms by sea,
 Of many a deed of bravery.
 On such discourse the maiden dwelt,
 And seemed to share the woes he felt.
 Tears for his tears, sighs for his sighs,
 And gazing in each other's eyes.
 And when the hour of parting came
 What tremors filled her tender frame !
 And how she wished the long day o'er
 To bring her to his side once more.

"Can this be love?" she asked her heart,
 And sighed unconscious of her lot.
 "Ah ! what will one's own heart impart,
 When that which is we hope is not.
 Can this be love ? Ah ! no, Ah ! no,
 This soul of mine must never know
 Such sinful love, his very name
 Once linked with mine—undying shame—
 Would brand upon my faith and race,
 A stain no virtues could efface.
 I love not—but may soothe his woe
 Although he be my people's foe."

NEWS AND COMMENTS.

WE have to correct a statement in our last. The question under the Hindu law, referred to the Full Bench, is whether the paternal uncle's son's son or the brother's daughter's son shall first succeed, not whether the uncle's son's son or brother's son has the precedence.

RAJA Rajendralala Mitra and Professor R. E. Bhandarkar of Bombay, have been admitted as Honorary Members of the American Oriental Society. Dr. Mitra was already a Corresponding Member, but then he was reduced to share that title with a Bengali imposter named Ram Chandra Ghosh.

SIR ALFRED LYALL has been taken in on the India Council in place of Sir Robert Montgomery deceased. We hope Sir Alfred will now learn to use his Indian experience to the advantage of India.

THE Nizam celebrated his birthday at a Durbar by a shower of Mulk-u-Dowla—and Jungships. The Arab Chief Sultan Nawaz Jung has come in for a share. He had been banished from the city for the Arab éméute three years ago, and had been pardoned last year. Now he is completely exonerated and—ennobled. A proof, if proof be needed, of the truth of the strength of the Arab interest in the Deccan confessed by the late Salar Jung to Sir Richard Temple, according to the latter's last publication.

THE Madras Magistrate Mr. Scharlieb has punished a boy of 12, for theft of four annas, with one month's jail and six years' reformatory. Is not this gentleman one of the men of light and sweetness down South? Verily, it is a fierce light that never was on sea or land, but only beats on the doomed Coromandel Coast, and makes the darkness of the Benighted Presidency visible. The sweetness seems a mere delusion—at best, the sweetness of what is popularly called in Bengali the candied knife. Mr. Scharlieb is certainly very popular among his fellow-citizens. So was Draco. We should not wonder if the stern Magistrate were treated to the same demonstrations of appreciation of the people as greeted the bloody Law-maker.

"BEWARE" of the Engine—of telegrams !—

"A passenger, who took a down train at Allahabad, got into conversation with a fellow traveller who was going to Calcutta on business as an agent of one of the respectable firms at Bombay. The stranger, through amiability of disposition, made friends with the agent, and obtained all necessary information concerning his employer's firm. He left the train at Benares, and availed himself of the next up-train with a ticket for Káhnpu. He alighted here, and, putting up in the inn called 'Mogal ki-Serai' went to a Mahajun, to whom he represented himself as the agent of the Bombay firm, and told him that he had to go to Calcutta, but having been robbed on the way was in want of money ; if permitted he would obtain Rs. 200 from his master by telegraphic money order to his care. The Mahajun, seeing the agent in distress, and taking into consideration his connexion with the firm at Bombay, acquiesced in his proposal. The pseudo agent immediately telegraphed for the money, which was sent and delivered to the man before the Mahajun by the money-order peon. The man thanked the Mahajun and left his shop immediately. After a lapse of a few days, it was discovered by the firm at Bombay that the real agent was never robbed, nor ordered the amount sent to him a Káhn, ur. The proprietor of the firm has brought a legal suit against the Mahajun, as an accomplice in the act, who now denies any knowledge of the whereabouts of the stranger, and also that the money was given by the money-order peon on his security."

A BERLIN telegram reports that "the National Zeitung states that steps will shortly be taken to remove Prince Ferdinand from the throne of Bulgaria."

ANOTHER Nihilist plot to assassinate the Czar has been discovered at St. Petersburg. The Czar does not therefore go there as intended but continues at Gatschina. Several military officers are implicated in the plot.

THE Supreme Legislative Council meet on Thursday the 19th and not on the 20th as previously announced.

MYSORE has gone, Kapurthala has come.

KING Theebaw is to be removed from Ratnaghiri to the hill fort of Satara.

GUARD BROOKES, serving on the North-Western Railway, is under arrest on the charge of assaulting Mrs. King, a passenger by the train of which he was in charge, and cruelly maltreating her with immoral intent. He is believed to have entered the carriage between Gujrat and Lala Musa.

The weekly remittances to the Home Treasury by Council Bills, from 1st April 1887 to 7th January 1888, amounted to £11,191,300, the Budget estimate for the year 1887-88 being £16,114,000.

NOTES AND LEADERETTES.

THE Municipal Commissioners have Resolved upon a commercial road connecting the Hooghly Bridge with the Sealda Railway terminus. The so called Central Road will run through Burrabazar, a thickly populated quarter, covering mostly tenanted lands and huts. The cost of acquisition and construction must be enormous, but they estimate it at half crore. The noticeable principle in the Resolution is that they propose to acquire much more land than is necessary for the work, in order to resell the same at enhanced prices to keep down the cost. This is an advantage to the general body of the ratepayers who are saved the full cost. The principle has been objected to in certain quarters. It has its approvers as well, and the Commissioners passed the Resolution by a large majority. Whatever the propriety of the measure, the owners do not seem to object.

THE days when the Orient brought in its tribute of curiosities to swell the triumph of empire and send gaping and jaying the rabble of Rome, are recalled by a visible token of mutual understanding, respect and good feeling given by the Viceroy to the King of Persia. The Great Mogul of Ind has sent the Shah-in-Shah a barbaric present in the shape of a huge tusker. This fraternal compliment was received with befitting gravity and ceremony. The open Durbar in the open has had the honor of a place in the Gazette. The following is taken from the official Teheran Gazette of the 12th October:—

"His Excellency, Lord Dufferin, Viceroy of India, sent some time ago a fine male elephant of enormous size, as a present to the Shah. The animal is as big as a mountain; tusks, the size of his have never been seen before; he is truly a royl animal. This great and powerful elephant, besides being naturally very handsome, has very handsome trappings, valued at several thousand tomans; there are ornaments, a silver gilt howdah and gorgeous covers and trappings heavily embroidered in gold and silver. The animal reached Teheran a few days ago, and on the 4th instant was presented to His Majesty in the Bagh-i-Maidan by Mr. Nicolson, the English Charge d' Affaires at the Court of Persia. His Majesty, together with his attendants, inspected the elephant, and expressed himself delighted and very much pleased with the noble present."

The speech of the British Representative in presenting "a native of India" and His Majesty's truly Persian reply, are duly recorded. According to a Teheran correspondent, the Shah "was really very much pleased, and told Mr. Nicolson besides that he had not words enough to express the pleasure he felt, and that he really meant three times as much as he had said."

By sports like these are all their cares beguiled,
The sports of children satisfy the child.

The curiosities and arts of India have always been appreciated at the courts of High Asia, which has been civilised by Hindu influence, almost as much as by a Semitic religion and Greek philosophy. History tells us not only of the spoliation, by invader after invader, of the gold and silver and precious gems and stuffs and effects of Hindostan, but also of the artists and artizans and manufacturers carried en masse by Afghan and Iranian and Turanian conqueror. A Timur or a Nadir would have preferred to capture the Pheelkhana of Delhi and lead away the grand beasts across the Indus home to receiving a present. For Nasiruddin himself a park of artillery ought to be more welcome than all the elephants in India. But what is to be expected of a monarch who not only states like the most innocent of the profane vulgar at the chef d'œuvre of Madame Tussaud but faithfully diarises them for publication.

THE Elephant is a rather ugly customer. He frequently proves a disaster to his very friends, as the Indian Raja Porus and the African General Hannibal discovered too late. In Persia, he is like a whale out of the sea. We read:—

"The 24th was the anniversary of the Shah's birthday, and the elephant was brought in state to the salam, or durbar, as a tamasha for the people. The animal was not in good humour. Persian keepers, who are to replace the Indians that brought him from India, did not know his ways; at last he became obstreperous, threw a man into a tank and charged the crowd. Some men got injured, a couple were pinned against a brick wall, fortunately between the tusks, but one of the tusks was broken against the wall. The piece of tusk is now in the museum, ideas of riveting it to the stump having been given up."

Yes, His Elephantine Majesty is every inch a king, even as his great human fellow-countryman Porus, who even in captivity expected to be treated according to his rank rather than to his chances of the hour. Whether he be confined or at large—in the park of an Indian prince or in the gardens of Nature, in the London "Zoo" or in the menagerie of Barnum, the showman, it is all the same with this truly sovereign beast. He must be dealt with with all due deference. He brooks no trifling. He is not irascible; he has too great a sense of dignity and propriety for that. But beware of his losing temper! His rage is truly Achillean.

THE latest indigenous stupidity:—

"An Association called the Aryan Patriotic Association has just been founded at Bareilly, of which Rai Bishen Lal is the president. Its objects are to create and promote Indian unity and feelings of universal brotherhood and patriotism throughout the members of all the branches of Aryan Patriotic Associations throughout India; to encourage national literature, and its diffusion among the masses; to publish national journals or tracts in the vernacular languages; to indicate the ways of the Government to the people at large, through the vernacular press and popular lectures; to promote real education—moral, physical, and religious; to represent the grievances of the people to the Government, and make suggestions; to introduce gradually and harmoniously, social reforms."

That goes by a great length beyond the National Mahomedan movement nearer home. It never struck these innocents that their programme is a contradiction in terms, as their very name is an offence against good sense and taste.

IN the Pandits' enthusiasm for the language of classical Hellas—enthusiasm sure to be drained to the dregs by non-Pandits—the legitimate claims of the living speech of the Greeks are apt to be ignored. In fact, modern Greek suffers, like Bengali, from the extravagance of the learned and the pedantry of the unlearned, by being pitted against its venerated finished prototype. Otherwise, like the Bengali, it is a noble instrument of thought, quite worthy of its old mother the classical Greek, as the Bengali is worthy of the ancient Sanskrit. It is not only copious and musical, but also boasts a respectable literature. Several of the poets of Western Europe have been interested in it and found in it comfort and pleasure. Byron rendered some of its shorter pieces. Mrs. Browning, poet by her own right as well as the consort of the profoundest poet of our day, has a fine appreciative essay on the modern Greek masters of song. Lately, a great addition has been made to the volume and quality of the modern Greek library by the translation of the greatest English epic. This literary feat has been accomplished by a native Greek, M. Kasdagh. He dedicates his version to Her Majesty, the Queen and Sovereign of Milton's countrymen.

IF the British will not bridge their Channel, their good neighbours, the French, will do it for them. No sooner had Sir Edward Watkin's scheme of a tunnel under the Channel been abandoned than they took up the question in right earnest; for, of course, they were not going to embrace the carcass of the dead English project. They entered upon the subject on independent lines and they have now matured a new plan of their own. Resting on concrete piers, with a height of 40 metres, so as to enable the largest vessels to pass under it, it is proposed to build an iron bridge. It is to start from Cran-aux-Œufs, south of Cape Grisnez, and run in a straight line across the Channel to Folkestone. This is not the shortest cut, but the sea there is least deep.

A DEEPLY interesting, if not unique, case of philanthropic madness, is told by the Paris correspondent of the Morning Advertiser. Eugene Orbecchi was a young engineer of great humanity. After a course of earnest well-doing of a miscellaneous character, he at last stumbled on his rôle—the reclamation of fallen women. He was easily persuaded that they were as earnest and anxious in the matter as he himself and he bravely fought the facts which contradicted him. His last case was a Magdalene named Marguerite Mathis. Her conversion to virtue was as remarkable as that of her ancestors to the Church. He preached and conquered. She had only been looking out for the good Samaritan to turn a new leaf. She was ready to go into furnished lodgings and receive a dowry and promise to be good. He fed her and housed her as a lady and provided for her future, and she seemed as good as her word. Thus it went for a few days, perhaps weeks. Orbecchi, warned as he had been by previous disappointments in succession, at length felt himself secure in his protégé. He had at last come upon the right stuff of penitent humanity. Vain deluding joys! Woman will be out, and wily Marguerite was out. Orbecchi accidentally discovered her continuing her old life of guilty pleasure. The discovery scarcely disconcerted Marguerite who only cursed her carelessness, but Orbecchi flew into fury and stabbed her—the doubly, trebly fallen! He was tried, but the jury took the true view of the matter and saved him. There is no saving the doomed. Such was Orbecchi. The discovery that she whom he regarded as the reclaimed was no better than she had been, the knowledge that her penitence was a perfidy—a sham and a shame—went to his very soul. It was too much. He could not stand it. The more so that life had lost all its charm for him. The last hope against hope of usefulness to which he clung was blighted. Othello's occupation was gone. Three days after, he was found dead at a hotel, dead by self-administered chloroform.

UNDER the head of Miserly Magnificence, we read in the Advocate of India :—

"Not frequently a man is encountered who is a moral paradox. The late Marquis of Westminster was such a man. Liberal in large affairs, he was penurious in trifles. He wore shabby clothes, carried a cotton umbrella, saved bits of paper and twine, picked up pins, and gave away thousands of pounds."

That is, the Duke was a dristi-kripan, as we would say in Bengali. The English, that Great Annexander among languages, rich as it is in its resources, is not rich enough. It wants a whole host of vocables of the sort common in the despised Bengali. Dristikripan literally is sight-miser, meaning, a man who may be liberal enough or even extravagant or a very prodigal but who is anxious about trifles, who is afraid of a drain at the necessity of the most insignificant or common outlay, who picks and treasures up old nails and saves rotten odds and ends, who will haggle over a six-pence in a large bargain but may, all the same, allow him self to be easily and habitually robbed. Such moral contradictions are not so rare as some seem to imagine. We have numberless instances in this country. To avoid the living, we believe Doola Sutar and Mutty Lal Seal belonged to this type. They were reckoned misers in the community, yet how large-hearted were they in reality! how vast their benefactions! what thousands they befriended in difficulty! what numbers they supported! Each of them maintained an alms house, where whoever applied was fed.

"He once drew a cheque for thirty thousand pounds for a benevolent object, but the donor's name was never published, and his own son, the present Duke of Westminster, never knew for what purpose the cheque had been drawn."

A clergyman, who had been to London to consult a doctor, was dining with the Marquis.

"What did the doctor advise?" asked the nobleman.

"Too absurd, my lord! Horse exercise."

"Then why don't you take it?"

"Because I have not a horse, and can't afford to buy one."

"Have you a stable and a paddock?"

"Yes, my lord."

"Then I will give you a horse."

The next day a groom rode up to the house, leading a fine horse. The grateful parson offered the man a half-sovereign, but the groom declined to take more than sixpence, saying that it would be as much as his situation was worth. He could not accept more. "But, please, sir," he added, "give me twopence for the turnpike gate. His lordship specially told me to be sure and ask for the twopence."

May the Lord reward the good Duke! for weak vain man could scarcely appreciate him! Such a miser, if miser such a one can be called, is worth more than vast numbers of your heartless wasters.

THERE is a limit to every thing, as there is a season and place for it and the limits of the extravagances of "society" must be reckoned to be reached when the doctors, who are also men of the world and of "society," interfere. In this view, the article in the British Medical Journal on the absurd habits of the day, is significant. The writer ridicules the "modern society hand-shake." For anything that we care, he is welcome to his game if he would spare us that last compound vocable which is too suggestive of the participial form in vogue among our countrymen in certain parts of Bengal. He assails "society" with the weapons of science, or at least overwhelms it with scientific jargon, giving an anatomical description of the modes. But the provocation comes from the other side. Fashion now-a-days simulates ill-health and disease. This is how one class of exquisites of the Period "keep touch" with those they make-believe to salute :—

"The right scapula is raised and brought forward, the humerus being extended in nearly a horizontal line, and somewhat adducted, while the forearm is semipronated and allowed to hang nerveless and inert; a little oscillatory movement is imparted to the arm, but no grasp is attempted."

When the greeting parties are birds of the same feather, the other man of course returns the compliment in the same fashion, and their fingers touch. But the action is meaningless. The soul is not called into play. The movement is like that of a man suffering from hemiplegia, and, according to the writer, more awkward and graceless, and quite as indicative of loss of brain power. Nor is this all.

"Some of the attitudes of certain young men and women strongly resemble those we see in extreme exhaustion, hysteria, and St. Vitus' dance. Thus we may mention as examples :—Heads inclined to one side, a symmetrical posture of the spine, hands ill-balanced and contracted in the palm, with the fingers bent backwards. Ladies in the drawing-room will sometimes assume postures the very counterpart of those in chorea, while a languishing mode is thought to indicate esthetic refinement. What shall we say about the habit of dressing the hair so as to cover the forehead, the bulwark of the brain; and masking all expression in the hands which should be exponents of the mental state by perpetually carrying an opera hat, fan, or flowers. We might further dwell on a cultivated monotonous drawl of voice, with falsetto pitch, with absence of expression, power, and energy in all the movements, the eyes being half-open, and not directed towards the person addressed. A certain school of modern art seems to lend much favour to this sort of thing. It has been said that a man should dress with care and attention, for the first impression made on meeting a stranger is to some degree produced by dress; to a much greater extent does the carriage and the mode of salute make an impression—the method should be manly. The salute should indicate the impression produced by the meeting; of course it should be under control—never too cold or too effusive—but that does not justify a purely artificial method, meaning nothing. Shaking hands is often used as a pledge of contract, but then it must express the mental state."

That account is a settler. And it is not born of Baboo malice or Baboo ignorance. It is not a native Indian caricature of the manners of the Whitemen. Its good faith cannot be questioned, and it has the stamp of professional accuracy on it.

THERE is a strong family likeness among princes throughout the globe. Their virtues and vices are the same all the world over. It will be remembered that there was a complaint against His Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh, for not returning, while cruising along the French coast, the salute fired from a French battery. This was not only an obvious breach of international civility but a breach of the Queen's Regulation for the Navy. Enquiry showed that the charge was true. But the omission to fire originated in no wilful desire to put a slight on the French. It was wholly accidental. It appears that the Royal Duke is a sleeping character, like the Fat Boy in Pickwick. He is always ready for a nap, in season and out of season, having apparently cultivated his gift to the utmost. Perhaps, the Prince's choice of a profession was determined by his passion for sleep. The monotone of the lonely sea disposes the most restless spirits to somnolence. It is only in the vasty deep on board a man-of-war in time of peace that there are unlimited opportunities for dosing and day-dreaming. It is a capital place for going to sleep in without fear of being disturbed—just the place for princely sleepers! The waves rock the sleeper as in a cradle, as well as swell the grand chorus of royal snoring. By dint of constant practice, the dear Prince has now attained perfection. On a recent occasion, he was sailing past the French coast in a state of unconsciousness, when a battery on land, recognising the Queen's Fleet, fired the usual compliment, but the greeting was not returned. And why not? Not that the whole crew and officers were all asleep, but who could dare to rouse a royal Prince to receive orders? Doubtless, the officer in command during the royal siesta was competent to carry out the Code of Navy Regulations in such a simple matter of courtesy to an ally of Great Britain, but then the Captain was afraid of disturbing by his fire the Prince's slumber. The royal Captain thought it a smaller matter to insult the French nation. When, however, the French Ambassador complained to the British Foreign Office, the matter appeared more serious and explanation was called for from the royal sailor. Thereupon, a neat little "white lie" was enacted. The Prince himself, it is said, quietly threw into the sea at night his salute gun in order to make a plausible excuse for the omission of the salute, namely, that in the hurry of leaving the vessel he had forgotten to take its salute gun.

That incident has wider signification than may be imagined. But we leave to others to draw it—till another opportunity.

THE Convocation of the Calcutta University came off this afternoon. We were not present, but missed nothing. Even our Girton "gals" in high feather—the prime attraction—we bowed to from our sanctum as we espied them driving to the Latin Quarter. For, the rest of the business was a sad pantomime. His Excellency the Chancellor presided, but delivered no discourse beyond a few words in welcome of the girl-graduates. The Vice-Chancellor delivered the formal oration, which was quite inaudible to the audience—a not uncommon fate for speakers and hearers in the Senate House. We wish Sir Comer Petheram might be impelled to take steps towards improving the acoustic properties of the place.

THE new Fellows—good, bad and indifferent—of the Calcutta University, are—

J. Wood Mason, Esq.; Surgeon-Major A. Crombie, M. D.; J. H. Gilliland, Esq., B. A.; Baboo Durga Mohan Das; W. H. Jobbins, Esq.; Baboo Hara Prasad Sastri, M.A.; Moulvie Ahmad; Baboo Umesh Chandra Dutt, B.A.; and Baboo Rajani Nath Roy, M.A.

Mr. Wood-Mason's name is a welcome addition to the Senate, and the only wonder is that he has been so long in reaching this just recognition of his attainments in learning and his long service in the temple of science. Indeed, we never thought that he was not one of the governing body of the University. Perhaps, we shall awake one morning to learn that he was not one of even the Honorary Magistrates of the town. We know he is not one of the Municipal Corporation, but a fitter man, by habits of business and by continual residence in town and almost next door to the office of the Corporation, to say nothing of intellectual eminence, does not exist. Perhaps, he is not sufficiently known to the natives who form the bulk of the electorate to seek their suffrages with any chance. In that case, the Government might appoint him with advantage to the public interests.

We are glad to see Pandit Haraprasad Sastri's claims recognised.

It will lead to a considerable quieting of public criticism to learn that the latest Mahomedan Don is not the gentleman of that name possessed of municipal fame of a certain description, but the Arabic and Persian Professor in the Presidency College and the son of that distinguished and erudite scholar the late Maulvi Muhammad Waji, Chief Professor of the Calcutta Arabic.

MR. PEACOCK takes furlough for 20 months and Mr. MacDonnell for 2 months and 13 days. Mr. W. Mackworth Young from the Punjab has taken over charge of the Home Secretariat of the Government of India. This is the officer who is understood to have headed the protest of the Punjab officials against a certain able officer being elevated to the Satrapy of the Land of the Five Waters. He comes with a reputation for ability.

Sir Charles Turner leaves India once more for the last time, with the tolerable good wishes of officocracy. He was not so bad as he seemed at the earlier stages of the Public Service Commission, when his examination of vested pretensions was wont to be rather searching. Latterly, he went clean over to the majority—of the defenders of privilege.

IN another column will be found a smartly written communication on the results at Santipore in the late municipal elections. We do not despise parochial politics; in the present state of the country in especial they are of peculiar interest in the education of the country. But we cannot afford the space for chronicling the doings in all the municipalities, and we are afraid they would be regarded as too much of a good thing by the generality of our readers. The present letter presents a good sample. Santipore is one of the largest of our country towns—the largest in Lower Bengal of those which are not official centres. It has the unenviable distinction of being on the black list of the Moffusil Municipal Act, being like Uttarpura notoriously torn by factious feuds.

Our Santipore Correspondent ends with raising a general question. He assails our apologia for canvassing at elections and quotes high authority against us. We are not to be terrified into surrender of our position by the apparition of any giant, intellectual or anatomical. Ours was no assertion, but argument, we gave a reason for the faith in us—a reason that remains untouched by the quotation. And we could mention others. Indeed, "An Onlooker" has strangely missed the drift of our contention in favor of legitimate canvassing, for, of course, there are canvassing and canvassing. The elective system would be at the mercy of the unscrupulous if all personal application and explanation to voters were forbidden. The strangest results might well be apprehended. In India, a very deadlock might ensue.

We must warn our clever correspondent against the fascination of giants who are consummate statesmen. Does he seriously believe that his giant of noble sentiments does not canvass himself? The passage quoted seems to us a grand stroke in the Fine Art of electioneering. It might deceive the unwary and help his own agents and friends—the "consummate" one!

We do not wonder at Babu Sarat Chandra's defeat. It need not be due to deficiency in canvassing. There is no surer road to unpopularity than to serve in a position of command or vantage.

BOMBAY soon expects to see the beginning of her scheme of technical education as a fait accompli. Sir Dinshaw Manockji Petit, the new Native Member of the Viceregal Legislative Council from Bombay, has made another of his truly princely benefactions. He has given property to the value of three lacs for a "local habitation" for the Technical Institute. Such an act of munificence might last any man a long time, but Sir Dinshaw is not, like others, daunted by his own good deeds, colossal as they are and appearing as they do in quick succession. In the same breath, he has given a lac and a twenty thousand in aid of a hospital. These were the little "extra jobs" he executed—the six pennies he put in the poor box—before he left his city. There is not only no unseemly fuss, there is no self-consciousness. The thing is done in a quiet business-like way, its very habituality precluding attitudinising. Noise is neither made nor sought for. There is no call for Kudos. Another man in his situation might have posed as a Caesar, till the people were provoked to cry—

Why, man, he doth bestride the narrow world
Like a Colossus; and we petty men
Walk under his huge legs, and peep about
To find ourselves dishonourable graves!

But this Colossus of Charity in his meek unconcern actually dwarfs himself in the operation. He minimises the necessary demand on the attention of the public. Both his latest great gifts are acknowledged by the Government of Bombay in the same Gazette.

Well may the Advocate of India say that it is only in Bombay that such munificence is to be found!

THE Fifteenth Annual Report of the Howrah People's Association for 1886-87 shows more energy in its members than in those of many a high-sounding Calcutta institution of its kind. The committee have been busy with many important questions of the hour, local, provincial and imperial. The fact of a single member, Baboo Hari Mohun Bose, the Vice-President, having paid the cost of the casket for the Jubilee address, betrays no little respect for his country in the Baboo. But perhaps the best thing in the whole Report—which, by the way, might be better written—is the not unenviable cash balance of Rs. 143-6-15gds. for a trans-Hooghly Amateur political club.

By a notice posted up in the medical school at Leeds, the students were requested to assemble at the Young Men's Christian Association Rooms for a discussion of a proposal for them to become members of the Association. Nearly a hundred young men attended. The proposition was no sooner brought forward than most of them expressed loud symptoms of disapprobation. Soon the scene became lively. There was smoking and shouting and letting off of crackers. The assembly was uproarious beyond description. At last, some order was evolved by the leaders, and they left the hall, and marched in procession to Victoria Square. There, in front of the Town Hall, in the midst of a large crowd, one of the *un*Christian medical young men tried a mock oration beginning, "Fellow-brethren and unemployed!" Then "our Boys" adjourned to the nearest public-house, to raise their jaded spirits up by pouring spirits down their gullets. Again, the procession through the streets was resumed. Thus they perambulated the streets of the whole town, vigorously singing the well-known comic song "Bally-hooly," varying their exertions by cheering any prominent townsman they met with or robbing any unfortunate passer according to fancy. Nor was this all. They continually revived themselves at every gin-shop at the expense of the publicans doubtless. They threw into the gutter the poor sandwich-men whom they encountered on the way. Thus, for full two hours the whole town was kept in a state of noise and uproar, to the trepidity of the peaceable and not without the anxiety of the authorities.

Talk of the want of discipline of Indian schools and of the growing rudeness of native students after that!

REIS & RAYYET.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 14, 1888.

SIR AUCKLAND COLVIN'S DEBUT.

SIR AUCKLAND COLVIN'S first Durbar will be memorable for his frank declaration of a noble policy. The new Lieutenant-Governor of Upper India means decidedly well by his people. And small wonder is it to any one who remembers the secret political history of the last few years. Author of the remarkable tractate, "If it is Real—What does it mean?" in which he expounded, in the columns of the Pioneer, the significance of Lord Ripon's triumphant progress, as of the recent no less elaborate, able and generous defence, in the same paper, of the policy and the proceedings of the Public Service Commission, his kindly words are almost a matter of course, for his liberal views are known. They are nonetheless welcome or valuable. Indeed, the fear was that, with his elevation, he might, like many another, turn his back on his former principles and his old loves. The tension of suspense is determined; he has made his choice in his new sphere, and has made his deliverance. He has declared his policy and no mistake. Expounder of the New Era, he bids fair to prove the Man of the New Era in his new sphere of work. The territory he has been chosen to rule, has a glorious future before it, and only wants fostering aid to win its destiny. Upper India is to be congratulated on the luck which gives it such a satrap. The task before him is not a little arduous. In inaugurating a progressive policy, the successor of a Couper and a Lyall will have much to do, and still more to undo. The budding aspirations of the people deserve encouragement and not repression. Sir Auckland's first Durbar has already revived hope. May he go on in the way he has begun.

There was a ring of candour in Sir Auckland's speech which was highly reassuring. "I shall always be glad," he said, "to avail myself of opportunities of personal intercourse with you, knowing as I do how important it is to me to keep myself fully informed of your views and desires, and being equally assured that the Natives of India appreciate nothing more than freedom of access to officials, and reasonable facilities of communication with them. So that on that point you will feel no apprehension and I shall be careful to let my views on this subject be made known to the several officers under me." Freedom of access to the governing class has, indeed, its use as well as its abuse, but wary officials with experience and discernment may well be trusted to deal with ambitious tuft-hunters as they deserve. With this reservation, free intercourse between officials and the people cannot but prove an efficient instrument of good government.

Holloway's Pills.—Changes of temperature and weather frequently upset persons who are most careful of their health, and particular in their diet. These corrective, purifying and gentle aperient Pills are the best remedy for all defective action of the digestive organs. They augment the appetite, strengthen the stomach, correct biliousness, and carry off all that is noxious from the system. Holloway's Pills are composed of rare balsams, unmixed with baser matter, and on that account are peculiarly well adapted for the young, delicate, and aged. As this priceless medicine has gained fame in the past, so will it preserve it in the future by its renovating and invigorating qualities, and the impossibility of its doing harm.

The political necessity of more and more enlisting the honorary services of able and public-spirited non-officials in the task of administration, was set forth with truth and unreserve. "The business of administration in India," said Sir Auckland, "becomes more complex as the years pass, and the wants of the country grow more numerous. It is impossible for the Government, unaided by the people, either to know or to supply all these wants; and it is to the co-operation of the people in the administration of certain branches of public business that the Government must look, to enable it at present to deal successfully with its difficulties. The assistance which may be thus rendered to the Government has a two-fold advantage; it enables the Government to work more efficiently and it trains those who assist it in those habits of exertion, of self-discipline and of interesting themselves in the general welfare which lie at the root of all progress and improvement." This is the true raison d'être of Lord Ripon's scheme of Local-Self-Government. It is the necessity of the Government which makes the opportunity of political education for the people. Officials wedded to the old "benevolent despotism" are not, indeed, quick enough to seize its true import, and of such officials, Sir Auckland speaks in almost the same terms which we remember to have read in his Essay in the Pioneer referred to. "It may be," he says, "that the officers of the Government themselves, however willing, have been trained on former lines and are not familiar with the methods necessary to give practical effect to modifications in the system with which they have been hitherto familiar; there may not always be on their part the patience necessary; there may be sometimes, with all possible loyalty, a doubt as to the efficiency or utility of the institutions themselves.....I will frankly say that if you will exert yourselves to work the Boards as a real and effective machinery, I will, on the other hand, do all in my power to remove obstacles from your way and to give you every assistance. I have every interest in doing so; for, as I have said, I require your assistance. You have no less interest, on the other hand, on your part, in assisting me, for the habit of consulting and of working together to the common good, of laying aside to that end unworthy jealousies and inherited animosities, of exercising forbearance, and of endeavouring to understand the points of view of those who are associated with us in business, is essential to the formation of qualities without the possession of which it is idle to aspire to participation in the conduct of public affairs on any considerable scale." The heavy responsibility attaching to our countrymen in connection with their part in the scheme of Local-Self-Government, could not be brought home to them with greater force or in a clearer manner. The above words contain a lesson which they should do well to learn and practise. On their successful acquittal in this trial, depend issues of vital moment to the future of the country. They must, however, prove their fitness in small things before they stretch forward their hands for greater. "You should fix your attention on matters falling within the legitimate scope of your action and not waste it in the discussion of more ambitious schemes, the carrying out of which requires the collective action, and that practical handling of affairs which is the result of a long and laborious training in the conduct of public business, such as you have scarcely even commenced to impose on yourselves. I think that the more you familiarise yourselves with the practice of administration in the branches in which your cooperation is asked, the more reasons you will find for believing that the business of Self-Government on any more ambitious scale requires the use of qualities which can only be acquired like other powers by graduating in lower classes." These lower classes are furnished to our hand in the Local and Municipal Boards. By not scorning to attend to the details of rural and urban administration, valuable business habits and knowledge will be acquired which will prove of essential service in the near future when the people expect to be more largely associated in the administration of their country. Sir Auckland points out the way, and it is for the people to follow it.

MORAL DISCIPLINE IN SCHOOLS.

THE Government of India has issued an elaborate circular letter to all Local Governments and Administrations, on the subject of discipline and moral and religious training in schools and colleges. The letter sets out with the admission that, apart from the discussion of the subject by the Education Commission, the question of discipline in public schools and colleges has not hitherto received any comprehensive consideration. It is, however, no omission for which any blame attaches to any body. "It is only within comparatively recent times," it is explained, "that the Government has come to deal with public instruction on the present wide scale, its first efforts having been directed more towards supplying a course of literary instruction for a few students of exceptional ability than towards the wholesale dissemination of Western learning. It thus came to pass that the want of a standard of discipline in our Indian public schools and colleges was not at first felt, it became manifest only in more recent years with the ever growing demand for education according to European principles and of a purely secular character." The adequacy of this explanation is, however, open to question. The pioneers of English education in this country never lost sight of the importance of discipline, and the personal experience of educated Indians of a former generation living at this day, will attest to the sufficiency of the discipline, which, without degenerating into severity, used to be maintained while they were at school. The falling off in discipline is a fact of recent occurrence, and must be due to the operation of influences which have come into play in comparatively recent times. There is no denying, however, the fact itself, although it is apt to be exaggerated, and to lead to inferences, which, on a closer examination, it will not bear. Much in the demeanour of the present generation of students, which is justly felt to be offensive, may be mere faults of manner, rather anything more serious—apparent blemishes without being symptomatic of anything wrong at the core. We have ourselves been often vexed and annoyed with what looked like the want of proper modesty and respectfulness in our young hopefuls, and sometimes set to accounting for the phenomenon. On coming to close quarters, however, with the offenders, and cultivating them, the result has almost invariably been to show that the evil had no deep moral origin—that whatever objection might be taken to the arrogant airs—the look of affront—the rudeness in the port—and whatever impatience might be felt with them, they were mere indications of bad breeding, rather than of a refractory spirit or any bad organic lesion of the heart. Against these faults of manner must, on the other hand in all fairness, be set those intrinsic moral excellences of the rising generation for which they do not appear to receive the credit to which they are entitled—their superior courage, love of truth, independence, and patriotic sentiment. These are essential virtues which more than counterbalance any external failings, which, one might charitably hope, were but a temporary phase, sure to pass away under influences of the right sort. The faults of manner have, no doubt, gone too long, without let or hindrance, and, although the education authorities have had their attention drawn to the matter, and from time to time taken some measures by way of a remedy, those measures have not either been of a sustained character, or they were too severe or too complicated for practical operation.

The need of a corrective is thus set forth in the above letter. "It cannot be denied that the general extension in India of education on these principles [according to European principles and of a purely secular character] has in some measure resulted in the growth of tendencies unfavorable to discipline and favorable to irreverence in the rising generation. Such tendencies are probably inseparable from that emancipation of thought which is one of the most noticeable results of our educational system. But though inevitable under the circumstances of this country, they are nevertheless, it will be admitted, tendencies which need control and direction so far as control and direction can be supplied by a judicious system of scholastic discipline and of such moral training as our policy of strict neutrality in religious matters enables us to supply."

The Government circular then proceeds to discuss the practical bearings of the subject. The standard of discipline proposed to be aimed at, is the English standard, for reasons which will be admitted on all hands. "Indigenous education," it is rightly observed, "furnishes no traditions which can be referred to for guidance in such matters. In the indigenous schools of early India, grotesque and ill-proportioned punishments established relations between teachers and pupils which were wanting in dignity; while in Sanskrit seminaries the question of discipline did not in practice arise owing to the sacred character of the writings that were studied, the veneration for teachers which they inculcated, and the acts of submission and reverence that were exacted in all the relations of pupil to teacher."

The English standard of discipline remains therefore the only one for practical guidance. But the next question is, whether it should be adopted in entirety, or with suitable adaptations. It is notably severe, but the Government is confident of its successful application. The views of the Government of India on this point, setting forth the advantages which are derived from a strict system of discipline are important enough to be quoted in extenso :—

"There is no reason to fear that the English standard of discipline will be found deterrent by its severity. English education is now established on so firm a basis in India, and its advantages as leading to a career in life are so generally recognized, that the Government can look confidently for support in introducing reforms, which have for their object the elevation of the tone of colleges and schools and the training of the present generation of students to those habits of self-respect which find expression in submission to authority, temperate language, and deference to the judgment of those older than themselves. The English public schools and universities aim, not merely at training the faculties of men for the acquisition of knowledge, but also at producing a distinct type of character well adapted for the uses of practical life. In various ways they attempt to teach practical wisdom, and there is every reason to expect that a closer approximation to their methods of education may result in fitting the members of similar institutions in India to take a useful part in social business of all kinds. Self-reliance can only spring from self-control, and self-control can be best taught by a system which looks beyond mere knowledge, and demands from those who come under it the exercise of their powers of moral judgment and of steady co-operation towards the higher aims of the institution to which they belong."

After referring to the remarks made by the Education Commission upon the subject of discipline and of moral training in schools, the Government proceeds to make some practical suggestions for meeting the object in view. Those suggestions are :—

- (1) The provision of efficient training schools and colleges for teachers, and the employment, as teachers, only of those who have given satisfaction during a course of training ;
- (2) The extension of a system of teaching having a direct bearing upon personal conduct ;
- (3) The repression of breaches of discipline in accordance with certain well-defined rules ;
- (4) The introduction of conduct registers ;
- (5) The extension of the hostel or boarding-house system to the fullest extent that the public finances or private liberality will permit ;
- (6) The introduction of a system of monitors to be made responsible for the conduct of the scholars while in and as far as possible while out of school ;
- (7) The exclusion from school of boys who have not reached a certain class by a certain age.

The above suggestions are offered by way of a supplement to those which have been made by the Education Commission, and which are, we believe, partially in operation. They do not pretend to be exhaustive, and the Local Governments and Administrations are invited to communicate their opinions on the subject. Having left ourselves little space, we shall resume the discussion of the question in another issue, contenting ourself for the present with just a word of warning, namely, that the distorted views which are apt to be taken of the mere demeanour and attitude of the student population, do not betray us into any retrograde movement.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

OUR "COUNCILMEN."

I desire to say a word or two in reference to the wanton and reckless manner in which Anti-Humbag has dragged the names of some of our notabilities, through mire belched out from the inner depths of his consciousness. It is curious, and somewhat in explicable that, notwithstanding your hesitation to publish the communication for the very good reason that you hate "personalities" and deprecate "violence of speech as feeble and degrading," you have been led (apparently through inadvertence or an error of judgment) to allow your Correspondent to throw dirt at Raja Doorga Churn Law. I certainly do not object to a or any free and fair discussion of men and measures, public of course, or to your ruling that "what gentlemen may openly talk about is publishable and might be wholesome," but when sheer "insult," without a shadow of reason or rhyme, is the object aimed at, it is your duty no less common civility on your part "to eliminate the whole of the objectionable element," and not to permit a stray passage like the following to disfigure your really esteemed hebdomed. I must ask you to explain what the writer really means by these lines "the Bania Raja, with brass enough in his head to make a tea-kettle, whose memorable speech in support of the Ilbert Bill strongly tempted me to look towards his feet to ascertain whether he was the gentleman whose name should not be mentioned to ears polite." If the Bania Raja supported the Ilbert Bill what offence did he commit to render himself liable to be daubed as the very incarnation of the cloven-footed? The Raja was in the Legislative Council only at the fag end of the season, when the Ilbert Bill was introduced, if I recollect aright, at the instance of the Maha Raja Sir Jotendra Mohun Tagore, to whom the Viceroy Lord Ripon was under a promise that an early opportunity would be taken to remove the hideous blot from the Criminal Procedure. It was at this moment, and not while the Bill was in its height or fury and had turned the heads of all silly insensate Englishmen, that Babu Doorga Churn (since Raja) spoke a few words which your correspondent admits were in favor of the Bill. If so, then where was the offence that smells so rank to your correspondent? He is evidently in a bantering vein, but satire, without wit or point, is impertinence, pure and simple. I could understand the denunciation heaped on the head of Maharaja Jotendra Mohun Tagore for his sheepish acquiescence to the gagging of the Vernacular Press, but I fail to comprehend what the deuce has Raja Doorga Churn committed by doing his duty, i. e., in approving of the measure in its incipient stage? Is it for that or is it because he happened to be a member of the Supreme Legislative Council that this missile has been thrown at him? I suspect it is only for the latter, as Anti-Humbag evidently could not contain his bile at the sight of a Bania (although the Rothschild of Calcutta, Banias often and anon are Rothschilds) seated in the highest council of the country. Anti-Humbag only betrays his pitiable ignorance of the man when he reckons him among those who raised themselves by brass. Doorga Churn never knew what brass is. A more frank, open-hearted, outspoken, thoroughly straightforward and honest soul breathes not amongst the natives. He certainly lacks the wily ways and cunning diplomacy of a Cossimbazar usher to forge gold from brass, and yet Anti-Humbag puts that famous eight-metalled hero in the category of the illustrious constellations that ever shone in the Legislative firmament! I wonder why Anti-Humbag omitted the name of the eminent Librarian, another member of the seven blind Mittra doll that ever afflicted or still afflicts the town. Was he not a smart writer, a racy novelist, and an impromptu speaker? Why? Is it because he was a failure? But Anti-Humbag's appreciation of councilmen is blazingly illustrated by the omission of a really distinguished name that of Dinkar Rao. Much as I uphold Anti-Humbag's sentiments in regard to the suggested improvement of the present constitution of the Councils, I cannot, I must with shame and disappointment own, approve of the manner in which he has, and in which you have allowed him, dragged the name of a really good man whose only fault has been that he has achieved greatness, and that he was not born great nor has had greatness thrust on him.

One word more, and I have done. Sir Maharaja Jotendra Mohun Tagore is no doubt "mealy-mouthed and amiable," but is not that an accomplishment for which he should be praised? As to his connection with the Gagging Act, I think he has made ample amends if not a complete amende honorable in having got Lord Ripon to introduce the thin end of the wedge into the black Act. Had it not been for the great Willy at Home the Ilbert Bill would have driven its coach through the rampant stony race-antagonist Anglo-Saxonism of the day. Another Lord Ripon, and we shall be rid of the monstrous incubus that is sucking the blood of our country!

ANTIBORE.

26th December, 1887.

THE 2ND GENERAL ELECTION OF COMMISSIONERS AT SANTIPUR.

Verily, the British Government is a leveller, and the elective franchise, which you succeeded, by extraordinary exertion and against fearful odds, in procuring for the metropolis in '76 and which was extended to the mofussil Municipalities in '84, is one of the mightiest instruments to serve the purpose of Government. Even at the risk of being called a pessimist, a Philistine and what not, I will say in the language of the most prominent quondam leader of the Young England Party,

Let wealth and commerce, law and learning die,

But give us back our Nobility.

The second General Election of the Santipur Municipality, which came off on the 5th ultimo, was not the success it ought to have been. The majority of the gentlemen (?) returned being Bhotian snobs of each possible shade and each possible hue. Of these 4 are Mussulmans, 5 are Brahmans, 1 Confectioner, 1 Sundi, 1 Milkman, 3 Tilis and 1 Kayastha, no knight of the loom being returned, though the weavers constitute no inconsiderable proportion of the population. When the names of our newly chosen civic fathers were announced, I wondered, like the fly in the amber, how the d---I they got there, and predicted that, forming as they did a miscellaneous lot, they would be a scratch pack that never could hunt together. I have always held that a Municipality ought to consist of men

* * * * Who their duties know,

But know their rights, and knowing dare maintain.

Brought to this test, with 4 or 5 exceptions, all the elected Commissioners will be found wanting. One of the gentlemen in question is the grandson of a thatcher, was twice criminally convicted, and had, if I am not mistaken, to cool his heels in a penitentiary into the bargain; another was implicated in an atrocious murder case but, having command of the long purse, got off scotfree; a third was accused of kidnapping a girl for an immoral purpose, but the man was made to bleed by way of atonement by an overscrupulous Police, and the matter was hushed up; a fourth raised a hornet's nest against him by confining a young widow for some immoral purpose, but the washing of dirty linen in public was avoided, the Gay Lothario having been out of pocket to the extent of a few hundred Rupees--the amount being expended in satisfying the inner man of his neighbours--for, does not the shortest way to a gentleman's favor lie through his stomach? a fifth and sixth when connected with this very Municipality, earned an unenviable notoriety by their venality as well as ignorance of the difference between meum and tuum; a seventh--the most wicked and mischievous of the lot--is a veritable Mr. Fudge who reminds one of the monkey who has seen the world. But it is no use describing the character of men, not a few of whom are the veriest scum of society, at the risk of making the readers of even a society paper like Reis and Ryyet turn up their nose. But there is not a cloud without its silver lining, and there are among the gentlemen returned 4 or 5 persons who are ornaments of their species. Let us hope that a little heaven will leaven the whole thing.

The election was irregular from beginning to end. In preparing the lists of voters, which contained the names of about 300 men who are not voters but who did vote, the Sub-Divisional Officer rode a coach and four through the election rules. An asthmatic Deputy Magistrate with one foot in the grave, was deputed to attempt the impossible--to conduct the election of a town 9 square miles in area and with a population of thirty thousand souls. The election of all the 5 Wards commenced 2 or 3 hours after the appointed time and many voters went away. The enthusiasm and interest which the Mahomedans displayed were simply marvellous, they made a long pull, a strong pull and a pull altogether and gave the lie to the charge that they are apathetic in matters municipal. In '84 only one Mahomedan was returned, while this time so many as four followers of the Prophet were elected, 3 of them heading the poll at 3 different Wards. All the Mahomedans were made to swear on the Koran that they would vote only for their coreligionists.

In Ward No. 1, where there were four vacancies, no Mahomedan had the remotest chance of being returned; but then there was division in the Hindu camp and the Mahomedans were too wide awake not to take advantage of it. Only 27 Mussulman voters were present at the hustings and they gave 4 votes each to their nominee who headed the poll. In Ward No. 2, which is brimful of men of intelligence, education and public spirit, there were 4 candidates, one being our "uncrowned king," I mean Baboo Muthur Muthur Mukurjee, who is a tower of strength to the Municipality and who has established a title to our gratitude by his services to the town. The election of Muthur Baboo was a walk over and is a just recognition of devoted public spirit. In Baboo Muthur Muthur is realized the theory of perpetual motion. He knows no rest. When asked to take rest, Muthur Baboo says like Pascal "Rest! Have not we a whole eternity to rest in?" The other two Commissioners of this Ward are both men of light and leading and have made their mark as city fathers. In Ward No. 3, the two resident Zemindars were elected unopposed at the general election of '84 and they were confident that their election would be a matter of course, but evidently they counted without their host. Two of their Mussulman rayyets of different Wards measured their strength with them. All the Mahomedan voters, who by the way were the rayyets of the Zemindars in question, voted for the Islamite candidates on pain of ostracism. The Mahomedan candidates were in hopes that both of them would be returned, and it was not till 15 minutes after the poll had commenced that they awoke to their senses, one of them withdrawing from his candidature and thus taking the wind out of the sail of the Zemindars. It being now certain that the Mahomedan candidate would be returned, the question was which of the Zemindars would be elected, the uncle or the nephew, and now that Greek met Greek, the tug of war came. Both of them had run neck and neck for some time, when the idea occurred to the shrewd uncle that if he could induce some of the remaining voters to give him two votes each, he would be able to cut the ground away from under the feet of his nephew. The idea was reduced to practice, and the weak nephew Baboo Sarat Chandra Roy went to the wall. United, the Zemindars might have stood, but divided, they fell. Thus a rayyet did

Beard the lion in his den
The Douglas in his hall.

As soon as the result of the poll transpired, "Oh for an hour of Mati Baboo!" "Stands Santipur where it did?" "Surely, the times are out of joint!" were on every tongue. Now that the administration of Baboo Sarat Chandra Roy is about to close, it ought to be said that, though on his accession to the Vice-chair his enemies taunted him by saying that he was hatched at once into a Vice-chairman by the heat of his own ambition, and by repeating the lines

"A sight to make surrounding nations stare
A kingdom trusted to a school boy's care,"

they are now forced to admit that, in spite of many a storm that he had to weather, the schoolboy has steered the little craft under his guidance safe into the harbour over the rocks and quicksands that lay in the way, and that no name sheds brighter lustre on the Roll of Vice-chairmen of the local Corporation than that of Baboo Sarat Chandra Roy. The Great Commoner said that he had married the British constitution. To compare small things with great, it may truly be said of Baboo Sarat Chandra that he has married the Municipal administration though the contract is only for two years. In Ward No. 4, there were 4 seats to be competed for. But for the breach in their camp, the Hindus might have returned 3 of their number. In Ward No. 5, the poll commenced at 8 P. M., instead of at 5 P. M., and closed at 11 P. M. For the nonce, the Hindus dismissed all baser counsels, sordid views and vengeful feelings, and the Mahomedan candidate had not the ghost of a chance against their united phalanx. The three Hindu candidates scored an equal number of votes and carried the day, the Mahomedan being nowhere. It is a pity that the Hindus should have pressed a falling man too far and that some of the following of the defeated candidate should have come in for a deal of rough handling.

As for canvassing, the less said of it the better. The canvassers, mostly the candidates themselves, gave themselves no rest for 3 or 4 mortal days preceding the election, and rendered the lives of the poor voters not worth a day's purchase. They stuck at nothing which could even indirectly tend to compass their ends. Even the sacred thread and unadulterated falsehood were put into requisition. Some of the not overscrupulous candidates made the most of the letters that were sent to them by the Sub-Divisional Officer requesting them to send in the names of 6 gentlemen for nomination by Government. The practice of begging for votes, is, I should think, absurd, pernicious and altogether at variance with the true principles of elective franchise, your assertion to the contrary notwithstanding (Vide Reis 17 December '87). This is not my ipsi dixit only. Let us hear what the intellectual giant and consummate statesman says on the subject in a letter to his constituents:--

"The suffrage of an elector ought not to be asked, or to be given as a personal favor. It is as much for the interest of the constituents to choose well, as it can be for the interest of a candidate to be chosen. To request an honest man to vote according to his conscience is superfluous. To request him to vote against his conscience is an insult. The practice of canvassing is quite reasonable under a system in which men are sent to Parliament to serve themselves. It is the height of absurdity under a system under which men are sent to Parliament to serve the public. . . . I trust that the great and intelligent body of people who have obtained the elective franchise will see that seats in the House of Commons ought not to be given like rooms in an alms house, to urgency or solicitation, and that a man who surrenders his vote to caresses and supplications forgets his duty as such as if he sold it for a bank note. I hope to see the day when an Englishman will think it as great an affront to be courted and fawned upon in his capacity of elector as in his capacity of jury man. He would be shocked at the thought of finding an unjust verdict because the plaintiff or the defendant had been very civil and pressing, and if he would reflect, he would, I think, be equally shocked at the thought of voting for a candidate for whose public character he felt no esteem, merely because the candidate had called upon him, and begged very hard and had shaken his hand very warmly."

OPINION OF THE PRESS.

Dr. S. C. Mookerjee, the editor of what is undoubtedly one of the ablest papers in the country in point of literary power is the author of a pleasant little book of Travels in East Bengal.....The author is master of a racy style of English which many an Englishman may envy. Humorous descriptions and caustic satire enliven every page. There is throughout a vigour and freshness of style that lends a charm to the veriest commonplace. If there were, however, a higher purpose in the publication of this book than to lighten the weary evening hours of the ordinary reader, we confess to a feeling that the author has failed in such an object. We are afraid there is not poetry enough in us to body forth in imagination the beauty of the scenes which the author has described in his voyages to and fro between Dacca and Tipperah. Humourist as he is Dr. Mookerjee will remind us of the words of the poet that the point of a "jest lies more in the ear of him that hears it than in the tongue of him that utters it." As with the jest so is it with the description. We do not say that the charge is unfounded. Prosaic as we are, drudging away at the desk, perhaps it is that we lack capacity to follow in imagination what the author has doubtless delineated with an admirable pen.

One of the chief impressions that a reader will receive from a glance at the book is the somewhat strained relation between the Babus and the Anglo-Indians. The author pours a flood of ridicule upon the lordly airs of our "rulers." He hits hard indeed in his account of the Colonel at whist enduring a Babu looking on, when on board the steamer, and of the whiteman's condescension in bowing to the black nigger. Happily we in the South are not so badly off in our commerce with the representatives of Western civilization. In spite of several instances of conflict and misunderstanding Englishmen and Hindus pull on agreeably together. But the author, notwithstanding his involuntary feeling of aloof-ness from the European, is no stranger to the blessings for which the West has laid us in debt. He has a keen appreciation of the endowments of this Westernized life of ours. He looks for ever forward and casts no longing lingering look behind at the things with which we have shaken hands and parted. His heart is in the continuance of British supremacy in the East. And agitation is his utmost weapon for the maintenance of his rights. But he will have nothing with spurious agitation. We extract below a paragraph of excellent advice to his brethren of the press. [Extract.]

The author recounts his adventure with the Railway officials of Sealdah with considerable humour. We feel an irresistible temptation to quote it in extenso, but space forbids. How the greenback was no legal tender, why silver of the Calcutta mint was wanted and how the currency question stood stiff and frowning despite the Editors and Magistrates who had accompanied the author to bid him good-bye at the station, and how again with the advent of the Justice of the Peace all objection to receiving the currency-note vanished, are all narrated in a style that is fittingly characterized only by the word "delightful." In another place the author introduces the reader to the Hindu belief in the auspicious hour for starting on a journey in language of such playful raillery that we make no apology for quoting it. [Extract.]

The author has some trenchant criticism on the insolation of the Englishman, which makes him inaccessible to the complaints of extortion or plunder by their menials. They are too absorbed to know all that passes about them and the wrongs that are committed in their names are unnoticed as mere trifles for they have rarely any idea of their magnitude. It is only too well known throughout the country how blackmail in the shape of money or provisions is levied upon the inhabitants when the Collector is on tour. It would be difficult to believe the thing could go on under his very nose without his connivance if we did not know his exclusiveness and his distaste for mixing with the people.

The author devotes the greater part of the book to a description of the people and the external aspect of the country that he passed through in his two trips to Tipperah from Calcutta and back. He has a good deal to say about the customs of some of the people he becomes acquainted with. He makes a discovery of the debris of a Portuguese colony in Tipperah that has become debased in morality and sunk in superstition. Although there is not much in the book that is instructive to the serious student, the grace of diction and the ease of style carry the reader pleasantly through. It would be difficult to rescue such a subject as he has chosen from dullness without his extraordinary command of language. We cannot promise more than a brief span of life to the book. It will prove what is abundantly clear to the readers of the Reis and Rayyet that the author is an adept in English composition. He is a lover of nature and he paints scenes and situations with an artist's pencil.—The Hindu, November 7, 1887.

.....this interesting book. We are justified in so terming it, not on account of any romantic adventures that the author has to relate, nor of any very new discoveries in geography or natural history. There is something particular as regards ethnology; and a great deal of human nature in the book, shown to the reader with a simplicity and candour which bear testimony to its truth. Called from the busy haunts of men in the city to dwell for a time in Independent Tipperah as a judicious adviser to its Chief, Doctor Mookerjee relates his adventures during the several journeys to and fro in that capacity, without revealing the secrets of the State, like a good diplomatist. He has adhered strictly to the advice which he offers to his brethren of the Native Press, and has written what he saw and knows, without revealing all, considering what he might properly say and what withhold.....

The above seems to be a curious passage to be found in a book of travels, and appears to have no connection with the subject. But it arises from a casual reference to a slaughter house, and a writer who "thundered weekly against the outrage of locating shambles in the immediate vicinity of a Hindoo temple"—where, in fact, no temple could be said to exist. Hence, the Doctor advises his fellow-scribes not to be Pharisees, righteous over-much, but to look and be sure of their facts. In the same spirit, he has written his book. He gives an account of his travels, which seem often to have been voyages, upon the wide-spreading rivers of Eastern Bengal which in the rains become almost inland seas. On these he philosophises on the nature of the country and the people, making careful observation of his facts; and though he sometimes fancies he knows better than his boatmen, and more than suspects that they are getting the better of him, he submits with a grace that would have done credit to Socrates, and accepts the apparently inevitable in the interests of peace. The Doctor is a close observer of nature, animate and inanimate, with an eye to the picturesque as well as to the sublime and beautiful. And although there is a vein of cynicism running through many of his observations, it is tempered by such evident good nature, that even a stranger would conceive him to be a laughter-loving rather than a stern philosopher. This is evident in his descriptions of his boatmen and others, while he denounces the lawlessness which has made the poor fishermen suspicious even of honest intentions, because they have so long been the helpless victims of marauders stronger than themselves. Their only defence is flight or deceit, and the latter is their justification as a mode of self-protection. We are shown not only the weakness of the people, but the shortcomings of the administration that leave these things possible.....

The author is impartial in his censures..... There is much in the book to which space forbids us to refer. That it is not a prosy one may be gathered from the fact that, for its 300 pages, there are nearly as many index references. Many of the subjects are necessarily but lightly treated, but all sensibly and fairly. And Dr. Mookerjee is such a master of the English language that in the whole book we have scarcely found a phrase that might not have been written by an Englishman "to the manor born." There is nothing in it at which any one could reasonably take offence; and there is much from which both Englishmen and natives may learn greatly-needed lessons.—The Indian Daily News, Nov. 22, 1887.

"TRAVELS IN BENGAL. Such is the title of a most interesting little work published a short time ago. Its author is Babu Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee, the well-known Editor of the Reis and Rayyet, the most original, cleverly-written and interesting journal in India. Babu Sambhu Chunder is one of the veteran Indian writers in English. He is the master of a most happy, racy pleasant style, which you can easily make out from amongst the writings of a hundred different men. In racy humorous writing Babu Sambhu Chunder has no rival among his Indian contemporaries. He won his first laurels, we believe, by his writings in his own periodical, the Mookerjee's Magazine, now long-defunct. In this magazine articles of great learning and excellence appeared, mostly from the pen of Babu Sambhu Chunder. He has written several other booklets. His Causes of the Mutiny; Mr. Wilson, Lord Canning and the Income Tax; the Career of an Indian Princess, Her Highness the late Secundra Begum of Ghopal; and the Prince in India and to India are publications which attracted considerable notice. His latest production "Travels in Bengal" is a work of great merit. It is at once a most faithful and interesting picture of natural scenery and life in Bengal, although Mr. Mookerjee does not profess to write a picture of Bengal life and uses his pencil in its portraiture only in passing. The dedication is characteristic. [Extract.]

The "Travels" are travels in East Bengal, travels and voyages between Calcutta and Independent Tipperah. We do not believe many people in this side of India know that there is such an independent State as Tipperah. But nevertheless such a state exists. We will give here a summary of its history in the words of Mr. Mookerjee—He writes:—[Extract.] Mr. Mookerjee was Dewan of Independent Tipperah for some five years in all between 1877 and 1881. The travels are an account of his voyages to and from Tipperah.

Those who have travelled in Bengal, particularly in its Eastern districts, which are the districts described in Mookerjee's book, will bear him out in his statement that Lower Bengal is not stale, flat and unprofitable, that, on the contrary, she is the beautifullest country in the world. She has no high mountains, but she has rivers apparently as vast as the sea, to make her scenery grand and majestic. She has a hundred rivers ever overflowing with water, thousands of transparent lakes covered with the lily and a hundred beautiful water-flowers, thousands of seas of ever-waving paddy fields, thousands of clusters of bamboo and of great trees dressed in beautiful creepers adorning the river banks, to make her the loveliest country in the world. Even a Bengali needs to see and travel Bengal to adequately know her thousand witching charms. For a foreigner it is well nigh impossible to get even an approximate idea of what they are like from description, however true and faithful. Let us hear what our author has to say on the subject. We read:—[Extract.] A paddy sea is thus inimitably described:—[Extract.]

We will quote a passage of another character: [Extract.]

We could cull many such gems. But space forbids it. We will, however, quote some passages of another kind. Our traveller, though old in years, is evidently young in heart, for no one in the romantic age of youth could be more appreciative of female charms than our traveller. In every other page you find our author describing in terms of enthusiasm some rural girl or woman of beauty. [Extract.] In the next page we find our traveller's attention [Extract.]

There is the description, physical and moral, of a Colonel, which we cannot resist the temptation of reproducing, although the article has already exceeded the usual length. [Extract.]

We have now given extracts enough to show that the little book of travels is most delightful reading. It contains graphic descriptions of natural scenery, faithful portraiture of men and manners, and happy, good humoured observations on them. There is not an ill-natured or unkind word in the whole book—it overflows in every page with the milk of human kindness. Every observation testifies to the author being a keen observer of men and things, as an example of which we can mention the instructive and interesting chapter on the Native Christians of Portuguese extraction in Tipperah. Again, although the book does not pretend to deal with life in Bengal, the glimpses of that life we find in it are very considerable and pleasant. We will now conclude by recommending the book to all who may wish to spend a few hours amidst happy thoughts and pleasant pictures.—

—The Tribune, Nov. 26, 1887.

If we have not before noticed Mr. Sambhu C. Mookerjee's Travels in Bengal, which was published some months ago, it is not because the little book is either dull or pointless. It contains, on the contrary, much interesting matter, though some of the incidents are over-weighted with detail in what is facetiously called a "little booklet." The author's view as a rule is, by the way, facetious: he is given even to punning; but he is also sentimental in the highest degree—"a naked Whiteman" hurts his susceptibilities; a Hindu girl, bathing in the river, throws him into an ecstasy of delight: "he had such large anguishing eyes." But he is nothing if not philosophical, and his reflections on this or that social and political subject are not without their moral. Mr. Sambhu C. Mookerjee was formerly Minister to the "last of the Nawabs Nazim of Bengal, Behar and Orissa" and afterwards Minister of the Maharaja of Tipperah. He is a man, therefore, of experience, and when he speaks his brethren should listen to him.... Travels in Bengal is a readable book, and it abounds in anecdotes which are often as instructive as amusing, and it is not spoiled by too many political allusions, though, of course, some few have crept in.—The Promer, Dec. 1887.

INFALLIBLE SPECIFIC FOR LEUCORRHOEA.

A week's use of this medicine not only cures Leucorrhœa—the characteristic white, green and bloody discharge—but also removes the concomitant intense menstrual pains, and all the various complaints and symptoms incidental to menstrual difficulties and green sickness, and prepares the system for conception.

Price: for a week's consumption, Rs. 2, packing and postage 4 annas.

There are capital medicines besides—for piles, all the 20 kinds of flux—such as spermatorrhœa, diabetes, &c.—diarrhœa, rheumatism, puerperal complaints, cataract of the eye, macra, asthma, &c.

[Certificate.]

"I have known Babu Rajendra Nath Ghoshal Kubiraj for upwards of 15 years, and I can bear ample testimony to the wonderful efficacy of his medicine in the treatment of diseases of the womb. While Assistant Surgeon of Monghyr and subsequently, I have known him to cure the most obstinate cases of uterine Leucorrhœa and other uterine derangements, organic and functional. I can safely call his medicine the Specific for Leucorrhœa and painful menstruation. Ladies who have been subject to these diseases for years and were barren have been cured and borne children.

SEBASTIAN.

A TALE OF THE PORTUGUESE IN INDIA.

Sebastian loved—for who could see
That maid, and say his heart was free,
Once hear her silvery accents fall
Upon the ear, so musical,
So winning, and so like the sound
Of some sweet voice that year on year
Hath haunted pleasant fancy's ear,
And though far sought yet rarely found?
Oh! who could meet that sun-bright eye,
Beaming with all that love lives by,
And own not that there dwelt the spell
Which soft-lipped Hafiz sung so well?
Sebastian loved—but yet his soul
Was scarcely fashioned to the feeling.
For cold ambition held control,
At every ray of hope's revealing,
And dark revenge still vexed his breast,
And robbed it of its wholesome rest,
And dreams of Glory once again
Came crowding on his heated brain.
And though his brow was smoothened down
When Gulánar was by his side,
Unclouded then by one dark frown,
One angry look or shade of pride,
Yet when he found himself alone,
Cribbed within those walls of stone,
And no companion but his thought,
Which stirred up olden memories fraught
With keen excitement past delight,
The wild excursion or the fight,
He sighed for freedom—for those days,
When none controlled his vagrant ways—
Content at any price to gain
Once more the ocean or the plain.

'Twas night and slowly rolled away
The moments, as Sebastian lay
Upon his cot; his brain disturbed
With thoughts that slumber never curbed.
Still did he muse upon his love;
On her, who, gentle as a dove,
Still wrought her generous task of good,
And sanctified his solitude,
Yet ever and anon the thought
Of joyous freedom came unsought,
And Gulánar and love did seem
The tissue of an idle dream.

* * * *

Again the maid is by his side,
And in her look, form, dignified,
And yet so mild, there breathes a grace
We find not but in woman's face,
And as he presses to his breast
Her whom of all he loveth best,
And with the silence of deep joy
Delight that words would but destroy,
Reads in her large and lustrous eye
The soul's response to every sigh,
She feels as one whose heart is strung
To verse impassioned but unsung,
Whose tide of aspiration flows
With depth and energy divine,
And yet wants words to tell how glows
Each burning thought and feeling fine.

27

"We part, Sebastian, part to-night,
Take this, and none may stay thy flight:
This signet gains thee ready way,
Beyond these hated prison walls.
Away, and let not love delay
When wishes urge and freedom calls."
"And thou?"
"There where fate hath placed me
I remain, nor must I seek to be
A rebel to my race and creed,
Howe'er so much our hearts may bleed."
"Oh! no, oh! no, we must not part,
Thou who hast wound around my heart
And made life priceless, who hast been
The brightener of this prison scene!
No! no! oh fly with me, oh fly,
Thy name shall be our battle cry,
Till every bosom shall awake
To Glory's light for thy sweet sake."
"Now listen, Christian,—it were vain
To urge me thus—for ne'er again,
So wills my fate, shall we two meet,
No more my glances thine may greet,
I would not forfeit heaven,
I would not wrong the Moslem name,
Though the heart's chords were riven,
And life one scene of woe became,
Nor would I break the vow,
My soul has pledged another,
Though vengeance fires my bosom now
And hate I scarce can smother.
Enough that I have saved thy life
For this in danger and in strife
When foes are near and friends are far,
Thou'lt still remember Gulánar,

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money order if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given, any other being unnecessary and likely to cause confusion.

Thou'lt still remember her who dared
 So much for him for whom none cared ;
 Who set aside her fears, her pride,
 E'en to attend a Christian's side,
 And almost gave her heart up wholly,
 To a love she knew to be unholy ;
 A bark awaits thee on the shore,
 Farewell, farewell—we meet no more,
 Farewell—go where thy wishes lead thee,
 And oh ! may Allah, Christian, speed thee."

The maid is gone, and will he go
 And forfeit one he loveth so,
 Or will he still in chains remain
 Nor relish stirring life again,
 But waste his lonesome hours where
 There never circled freedom's air ?
 Again the quiet moonlight falls
 Within those dreary dungeon walls,
 And as it met the prisoner's eye
 He paused—what means that heavy sigh ?
 Thinks he of olden scenes and times,
 Of days unstained by manhood's crime,
 When on his native land he played
 A boy beneath the orange shade,
 In freedom's full and wild delight,
 Then when the blossom had no blight !
 " Fool that I am, why linger here,
 The maid has gone, and her kind ear
 Will list no more wild words of mine,
 And make my moments seem divine."
 The gates are passed : he gains the shore,
 Treads with light step the friendly prore,
 In hope and freedom once again
 Sebastian rides upon the main.

NEWS AND COMMENTS.

THE following appeared as a Gazette of India Extraordinary on Thursday, the 19th January, 1888 :—

"In exercise of the powers conferred by Section 7 of the Indian Salt Act, 1882, and in supersession of Notifications by the Government of India in the Department of Finance and Commerce, Nos. 1449, dated 10th March 1882, and, 751, dated 28th April 1882, the Governor-General in Council directs that, on and after the date of this Notification, the duty to be paid on salt manufactured in or imported by land into British India, shall be as follows :

(a) in the case of salt manufactured in or imported by land into Lower Burma, one rupee for each maund of 82-2/7 pounds avoirdupois weight, and

(b) in the case of salt manufactured in or imported by land into any other part in British India, except that portion of the territories administered by the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab which lies west of the river Indus, two rupees eight annas for each maund of 82-2/7 pounds avoirdupois weight."

That means, we take it, that Upper Burma continues a drain on the Indian exchequer, that the year closes with a deficit and that the Income Tax is not to be enhanced.

OUR Government, it is reported, feel themselves at ease to pursue the annexation of the Shan States. That was a question of time, we only hope it will not involve an increase of taxation to the poor Indians.

SIR Henry Sumner Maine has resigned his seat on the India Council, his duties at Cambridge being heavy. Who is the "fairest" Knight—Sir William W. Hunter, Sir Theodore Hope or Sir Rivers Thompson ?

IN reply to the Bombay memorial against the appointment of a Civilian as Chief Presidency Magistrate, the Secretary of State declines to interfere in the matter, the place being equally open to Civilians and Barristers.

THE Advocate of India writes :—

"Mr. Ney Elias, the Central Asian traveller, was Gazetted on New Year's Day a C.I.E. He has declined the decoration. An obvious suggestion seems to be that the Government should not, like a benevolent Santa Claus, take by surprise people who are known to have hung up a stocking, or to be deserving of a seasonable recognition. It should guard against a snub such as Mr. Elias has not too politely administered, by first consulting those whom it is intended to honour."

It is a rare bird in these days of hollow radicalism that declines a decoration. Or, is Mr. Elias' pretensions so high that he would not be companion to anything however big ?

WE are glad to welcome any signs of the prospect of Indian-gold-mining. Accordingly, we note that the Madras Times writes :—

"The collapse of the gold-mining companies in this Presidency a few years ago, when the frauds which had been perpetrated in issuing the prospectuses and compiling the reports, &c., of those companies were brought to light, caused the almost immediate withdrawal of public faith from all gold-mining transactions in Southern India ; and at the present time confidence is far from being restored. The companies in Mysore have conducted their operations since then with the utmost caution, only allowing the public to learn the progress they are making through an instructed agent, or from the published reports. During the last years several native speculators have started operations on their own account and, as they are extending them we may suppose that they have not been altogether unsuccessful."

THE sea is giving back to China her lost city—Haigen :—

A WRITER in the Advocate of India addresses an eulogistic letter to the Hon'ble Haridas Nanabhai, in the course of which he pays him the following well-deserved tribute :—

"You have done the greatest possible service to the cause of education in this Presidency by drawing the attention of the public and the authorities to the very curious and enigmatical manner in which the University conducts its business. Sir, you have done what everyone who knows you expected you to do—your duty. The silent and the sure way in which you work for the advancement of your countrymen cannot but elicit the admiration of all. Your minutes on the Civil Service question, your labours for the native Bar, and your effective measures to put a stop to official high-handedness in Gujarat have endeared you to all the inhabitants of that province. But sometimes you carry your modesty too far. In this instance it is the earnest desire of all the candidates, and their parents, that you should persevere in this good cause with your wonted zeal."

Mr. Nanabhai is not only an able Judge but a public-spirited citizen. He is a model of modest worth and activity which may be imitated with advantage throughout the empire.

TEMPORARY War Railways were first constructed by the British in the Crimea. Since then, the idea has found extensive development. And now we read :

"Portable railways of a new type will assuredly be among the leading features of the next great war. The latest invention in this line is the idea of an Austrian engineer, Herr Leinwather. His rails are said to be the best of the kind ever made, being especially good over uneven ground. The Austrian War Office has ordered a small supply, and will make a trial of the railway at once. Germany has also asked Herr Leinwather for samples both of his rails and wagons."

MRS. PUTNAM HEATON'S investigation into the employments, wages, and prospects of female toilers in New York, shews that women constitute more than half the assistants in the dry-goods stores, a fourth of the telegraph operators, about a fifth of the type setters and more than half the type-writers. According to her, women generally are less efficient telegraphers and type-setters than men; but that they are as good stenographers, and altogether superior type-writers and "dry-goods clerks."

THE Advocate of India has, in its Thursday (Jan. 12) evening's wise and brilliant leading article, disposed of Sir Syed Ahmed's late lecture at Lucknow. We extract the most important paragraph, and trust that our countrymen of this Province will feel themselves beholden to the Editor for the just and spirited defence of the poor Bengali which he never fails to make—he replied to Sir Lepel Griffin's anathema—when necessary!

"For our own part, we cannot make out what position Sir Syed Ahmed really wishes to occupy. He is a warm admirer of the Government, but, on the other hand, he is also proud of the Bengalis, who, according to him and some other people, appear to be the only Hindus in India. Yet he would not like to see them rule over Mahomedans and Rajputs and other warlike races because they are afraid of table knives. Evidently, who drives fat oxen must himself be fat; but as the Bengalis do not propose to fight, but to work peacefully among the 'warlike' races, most of whom have taken part in no hostilities for the last hundred years, what reason is there for reminding them that they are physically weak and a little too conscious of the fact? Sir Syed Ahmed does not seem to be aware that all over the country Bengalis are occupying offices that bring them into daily relations with the warlike races, not only without untoward results, but with remarkable success. The native State of Jeypore, for example, the home of the Rajput, has for its Prime Minister a Bengali, who has for many years been in the same service; and several other Bengalis hold high office in the State. Yet it was in this very State, some twenty years ago, that a British Political Agent was cut to pieces in the public streets by an ignorant population maddened to frenzy at the idea that he intended, in some manner, to make away with the infant Maharaja. Where the Englishman, though he possessed much more prestige than that with which Sir Syed Ahmed credits the ordinary Civilian, went helplessly to his death, the Bengali, by his kinship with the people—he is an Indian after all—has been able to retain the confidence of a Rajput Prince and the respect of his Rajput subjects. Yet if the critics of the Babu are to be trusted, he has no chance of securing the good-will of the warlike native, or indeed of any one outside Bengal, except he is able to show that he is a fire-eater of the genuine sort. In Kashmere the Chief Justice until the other day was a Bengali. He was for years an honoured servant of the late Maharaja; and the circumstances under which he left the State are not in any way discreditable to him. In this Presidency, too, there are, we believe, two or three Bengalis in the service of the Government; but though they occupy high posts in the midst of Mahrathas and other races, no one here thinks of differentiating them from their surroundings."

THE Sessions Judge of Hooghly, Mr. Kelleher, has, on verdict of guilty, sentenced one Sagore Mundul to seven years' labor for arson. The man admitted the offence before the committing Magistrate, but pleaded not guilty and moreover is said to have feigned madness during the trial. The Judge took evidence as to the state of the prisoner's mind and the Jury unanimously convicted him.

To the simple Oriental, the floating of iron ships is wonder enough. But what shall be said of the following!

"The question of making laces of iron and steel for ladies' and children's wear is again (says the Pittsburg Chronicle) being discussed in art and fashion circles. At the Centennial in 1876 a piece of steel rolled by a Pittsburg mill was on exhibition, which was so thin and light that it weighed much less than a book leaf, and could be blown from the hand easier than a piece of paper of the same size. The iron leaf was rolled on a train of rollers upon which heavy tank and boiler iron is now rolled. Experts say that curtains and fine laces can be made of soft malleable iron, and in every way be used with greater satisfaction than cotton laces. The sheets will necessarily have to be rolled down to an exceedingly low gauge, and then passed into any desirable pattern and shape. There will be no trouble in furnishing iron laces for ladies' and children's wear, with their names and other ornaments in a filigree design. An introduction of steel lace would establish in Pittsburg an industry that would give work to at least 3,000 men, and consume annually not less than 76,000 tons of steel, which is now a drug in the market at less than two cents a pound. Steel lace, unlike cotton, can be made tight or heavy without affecting the grade, colour, or brightness. We may yet see fashionable ladies wearing steel shawls and trimmings for their hats and dresses."

Iron gossamer is a contradiction in terms—an Irish bull. But there is no room for doubt in these days, and we may live to wear steel muslin.

NOTES AND LEADERETTES.

THE scandals which drove the late President of the French Republic from the helm, are not creditable to European public morality. The desperate clinging to power of Mr. Grèvy, has been no less a scandal of another kind. The facts are worth recounting. On the 19th November, M. Clemenceau in the Chamber demanded an immediate disclosure of the intentions of Government after the grave scandals implicating the President's son-in-law. In vain M. Rouvier pleaded for grace, till at least the conversion of the 4¼ per cents, threatening to resign in case of refusal. The Chamber took the Premier at his word. After a brief pailey rather than debate of three quarters of an hour, the Chamber divided, with the result that, by a combination of the Right and the Extreme Left, in a house of 544, the proposition for delay was lost by a majority of 90. M. Rouvier announced his resignation. Then commenced the difficulty of M. Grèvy. He exhausted all the leading politicians without one being able to form a ministry. There was nothing left for him but to resign, but he rejected such counsels till Wednesday the 23rd Nov. when he yielded to a friend, M. H. Maret, a journalist whom he consulted. He allowed M. Maret to announce his intention. I, was not however till Friday the 25th that the President announced to the Cabinet his intention to resign. Even then he was not prepared to execute the written document to that effect there and then. He wanted a few days more; on Monday the 28th he would send in his resignation. The suspense was most irritating to Paris—to whom the hours seemed months—and might be dangerous in France. When Monday came, the President had not yet made up his mind. He again promised to send in his formal resignation on Thursday the 1st. M. Rouvier, who conducted the Government in the meantime, accordingly made known, in the official Gazette, Thursday as the date when M. Grèvy's resignation would be received. But the President again changed his mind, and M. Rouvier had the awkward task of announcing the vacillation to the Chamber, coupling the statement with his own second resignation. The Chamber was furious, and adjourned till 4 P. M., in the hope of a favourable message by that hour. None came, however, when they reassembled, so they, by an almost unanimous resolve (531 against 3), adjourned again for a couple of hours, expressly stating that they expected the promised announcement. This expression of the Deputies' mind was strengthened by the concurrence of the Senate. When the will of both Houses was conveyed to the President, he again promised to resign the next day. And this promise he kept. Small thanks to him for doing a thing of compulsion with such exceedingly bad grace! What a fall was there for a man who bore such a high character and was specially reputed for a grave dignity, and who was in consequence twice elected President of the Republic. Had he been a stronger man he might have caused a coup d'état.

A Paris correspondent moralises on the fall of the President:—

"Since Sulla's in 79, to Amadeus of Spain's in 1873, few countries but have had an abdication in their history, and almost all rulers have abdicated on the Hobson's choice principle; not excepting Diocletian, cited as a model abdicator. Charles V., when he retired from business to embark in the clockmaking trade, got softy and relieved his monastic ennui by conspiring against his successor. 'It is a year to-day since the Emperor abdicated,' said Cardinal Granville: 'It is a year to-day that he has repented for doing so,' replied Philippe II. Christina of Sweden had hardly descended from her throne than she conspired to repossess power. James II. of England, the Napoleons, Charles X., Louis Philippe, were 'run in,' and which, by courtesy, has been called abdication. Napoleon I. abdicated when he lost the Russian campaign: he did so a second time, after his defeat at Waterloo. Casimir V., of Poland, laid down his sceptre voluntarily and with dignity, before the Diet which he assembled. Predicting the dismemberment of the kingdom, which he could not prevent, and the divisions among the legislators, that he could not reconcile, he retired. Thiers threw up the sponge in a sulk, and was vexed to the day of his death, for being kept out in the cold. MacMahon, rather than speculate in civil war, submitted and retired. It was only when among showers of enemy's shells and balls, that he never budged. Gambetta even had to lay down his dictatorship, in presence of an exhausted and betrayed France. And now M. Grévy had to retire, before the clamour of indignation, at his making the Palace of the Elysee the headquarters for the carrying on, by his son-in-law, of a vast bazaar, where influence was sold; and every shady project welcomed, and lame ducks rarely dismissed.

The lingering struggle M. Grévy has made against his forced retirement, has considerably diminished the sympathy that otherwise would be extended, to the sudden collapse of his presidential career. It was hitherto believed, that M. Grévy's paddy-go-easy official life was the consequence of a temperamental antagonistic to fuss and feathers; that his years naturally were glad to leave not a little of his cares and vigilance to others, in whom he had the blindest confidence. But since the nation, admirably passive—a model of sans fâit—yet terribly pained and wounded at the humiliation brought upon them by all the dealers in corruption and abuses, has noted the unexpected development of his energy and plans to avoid shaking off the presidential coil, it is more economical in the appreciation of the services rendered to France, and to the republican party, by M. Grévy. During his nearly nine years in office, it is asserted, he has saved about one million of francs. He is upbraided with parsimony, by giving no fêtes, and so give a lift to depressed trade: by not figuring on lists of charity: by not making official tours with the money paid to him for that end. The Paris which with the XIX. Siècle, claims to have unearthed M. Wilson, states M. Grévy did very little for the Republican party, save to receive all the plums in the pudding. In 1830, he took a musket, and like other hot-headed youths, followed Blanqui to chase away Charles X; nothing was heard about him till 1848 when he brought forward, in the assembly, his famous resolution, that for the well-working of the Republic, it ought to have no president, but only a prime minister. Under the Second Empire, he did not come to the front, to protest against the confiscation of all the liberties by that régime, leaving the heat and burden of those days, to Jules Favre and Ernest Picard. During the Government of the National Defence, that is of the invasion, he was seen upon no breach; he remained in his snugger of Mount-sous-Vaudrey. He turned up at the Assembly of Bordeaux, and occupied the presidential chair. No eloquence of his is to be recorded, regarding the invasion, the Commune, nor the loss of Alsace. When the 16th May threatened the Republic, he disappeared. After the abdication of MacMahon, and the death of Thiers, he came to the front, and received the reward of the presidency. As a set off to this indictment, it must be remembered, that the very fact of electing him twice president, implies claims of an exceptional order, and he would not now have been flung aside like the sucked orange, had it not been for the scandals of his son-in-law, and other members of the Grévy family. Can no man happy till he is dead."

MR. E. E. LOWIS, under date the 3rd instant, gives, in a Calcutta paper, an interesting account of a first tiger 9 feet 3 inches long which was shot by three persevering Mahomedan village Nimrods (Shikaris) in a tree. It is only leopards and jaguars that ascend trees, but this tiger appears to have been belated and surprised in the midst of its night prowlings by day-light. In quest of a suitable place for hiding in the day, it met with a man on the borders of a pond and, more in funk and fright than in mischief, charged and wounded him. Seeing no respectable thicket for the use of a genteel tiger, it quietly got up an umbrageous ancient mango overhanging the piece of water and improvised the shady loft in the air for a lodging pro tem for itself, till nightfall might allow it to depart in peace for its native woods. But the villagers were far too frightened to allow it peace. They dared not to come out of their homes till the unwelcome visitor had been chased out or laid hors de combat. Soon the local heroes came gun in hand and, after a careful reconnaissance, discovered that the noble animal had taken shelter in the branches above the water; it could not be well seen even from the land. Nothing daunted, they constructed a raft of the trunks of plantain tree and sailing right under the leafy canopy took aim and fired. This had only the effect of dislodging the tiger from that part of the tree to another part on the land side, where it was partially exposed to view of some of their companions in sport. They fired, compelling the tiger to shift its position, until after a long hide and seek for life it fell down, goaded by the relentless persecution of these rural hunters, and was finally despatched, not without omitting the last indignity of fate in the East—kicking and lashing with slippers and shoes.

This occurred in Chittagong.

LITERARY men in Europe not only write but they also fight—in France, unto the bitter end. Lately, one Bennet Burleigh was arrested with others, apparently in connection with the demonstrations of the unemployed, and charged as one of "loose, idle and disorderly persons disturbing the public peace with intent to commit a felony."

Mr. Poland, who prosecuted for the Treasury, withdrew the charge, saying that the Police had made a mistake. By the bye, those blessed defenders of our peace seem to have a remarkable faculty for mistake. In the West, as in the East, in the Northern as in the Southern hemisphere, they are always doing the wrong thing and capturing the wrong man rather than the wrong-doer. Mr. Vaughan, the Magistrate, at once and emphatically said when the defendant was first brought before him that such a charge could not be supported. The notion was, said Mr. Poland, that Mr. Burleigh was acting with the other defendants, but it was an unfounded notion. The Magistrate thought the reporter ought to have mentioned to the Police his vocation. So he did, Mr. Burleigh said. He was taken up notwithstanding as a felon. The Magistrate said that the Police Superintendent on the first day distinctly stated the contrary. Mr. Lewis, on the part of Mr. Burleigh, said that if the case had proceeded there would have been a conflict of evidence.

A WRITER in an American Magazine gives a charming story of Oriental good faith, chivalry and generosity:—

"Never was the Empire [of France in Algeria] in such danger as in the Franco-German War. As soon as it was evident that it was going against the French, their troops were recalled from Africa to take part in the great struggle at home till Algeria was left almost without defence. Then the hour for which the conquered races had long waited had come, and if they could at once have joined their forces and proclaimed a holy war, it is altogether probable that the French would have been driven from Northern Africa. They might have regained Algeria after the German war was over, but only by a repetition of the years of fighting which it cost to conquer it. That the tribes did not take advantage of this and rise while the French had their hands full on the other side of the Mediterranean, was owing wholly to their fidelity to a solemn pledge. When the war broke out a chief of great influence among the tribes, Mokrani, gave his word to the Governor-General of Algeria that there should be no insurrection while the war lasted. The word was faithfully kept. The French arms were followed by disaster after disaster; Napoleon surrendered at Sedan, and Bazaine surrendered at Metz. Then it seemed as if a voice from the Rhine called to the tribes of Kabylia to seize an opportunity which might never come again. But not a man stirred; nor yet when all the defeats and disgraces of the war culminated in the siege and surrender of Paris. The Moslem's faith was plighted; the Moslem's faith was kept! But—when all was over, when the last battle had been fought, and the treaty of peace had been signed at Frankfurt, then Mokrani was released from his pledge, and then, and not till then, did he declare war. And still he would take no unfair advantage, but gave forty-eight hours' notice. Then the war cry went through the mountains, and the tribes rushed to the field. They fought desperately, not only destroying towns, but laying siege to fortified places. Even Fort Napoleon, now Fort National, the strongest fortress in Kabylia, had to sustain a siege of over two months before the French troops could come to its relief. But the end was inevitable, for as soon as the French armies were freed from duty at home, they came in large divisions across the Mediterranean. Seeing that all was lost, Mokrani put himself at the head of his troops for the last battle, and dashing to the front, 'foremost, fighting, fell.' The war was ended, and the Kabyles were subdued, but with no loss of reputation for courage, and with increase of honour, in that they had kept faith, even with unbelievers; and it was fitting that the French should themselves erect a monument to mark the spot where this noble enemy perished. Such fidelity, coupled with valour in war and industry in peace, with intense love of country and courage in defending it, are enough to redeem a whole people from the reproach of barbarism."

Still harping on Oriental barbarism! But what a contrast do these Arabs present to the French intruders. Foiled in Algeria in the field, these representatives of Christendom and Western Europe burnt their brave enemy in a cave! After plighting their honor to the heroic Abdul Kader, they deported him and threw him into prison in the heart of France! And how nobly the Moslem hero kept his troth to the last, even after he was set free, and was once more among Mussulmans in a Mahomedan land! How unlike the darling of the French nation and anointed of the Pope, Napoleon the Great! Herein lies the strength—we will not say the superiority—of Islam. And they prate of European honour, and deny its possession to the East! Well, if the East trembleth not before "society," it is enough if it walketh in the fear of the Lord.

MR. RICHARD PROCTER has been treating of the idiosyncrasies of memory. We extract the cream. Speaking of a college acquaintance, he says:—

"Though he had only read through our college Euclid once, he could recite or write out the whole of it; or if preferred, he could begin at any point where one might start him and reproduce any quantity—verbatim et literatim, atque punctuatim, so far as that was concerned. But not only was he utterly unable to understand a word of it all, he had not even brains enough to keep his real ignorance of Euclid to himself. He was always forgetting the good old rule ne quid nimis, and as he did not know where to stop in his marvellous recitations, the examiners naturally came to the conclusion, perfectly justified by the facts, that though he knew his Euclid by heart, he knew nothing about geometry. We need not then despair of our mental powers when we hear of marvellous feats of memory, nor even think that our minds are failing because with advancing years our memory may occasionally play us false. Memory, as Dr. Dordat, of Montpellier, long since pointed out, and as hundreds of facts shew, is rather the offspring of the vital force than of the intellectual principle, and it is not surprising if in old age, when the vital force diminishes, memory should sometimes fail, even while the intellectual power preserves its full integrity. The examples themselves which most strikingly display the capacity of special brains for remembering words and syllables show also how little this capacity has to do with intellectual power—some of them, indeed, seem almost to suggest that a very keen memory may be a mark of disease. That excessive keenness of memory may result from a disease of cerebral action is, indeed, certain; but fortunately we are not obliged to regard this fact as giving any unpleasant significance to exceptionally good powers of remembrance. If foolish or idiotic persons, or persons in the delirium of fever, have manifested remarkable memories, men like Macaulay, Prescott, Saler, and others have had marvellous memories without being feeble minded and without the aid of disease. Pepys tells us of an Indian who could repeat a long passage in Greek or Hebrew after it has been recited to him only once, though he was ignorant of either language. Coleridge relates in his 'Literaria Biographia' that in a Roman Catholic town in Germany a young woman who could neither read nor write was seized with a fever, during which, according to the priests, she was possessed by a polyglot devil. For she talked Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, besides uttering sounds which, though not understood by her hearers, had, doubtless, meaning, but belonged to languages unknown to them. 'Whole sheets of her ravings were written out,' says Coleridge, 'and were found to consist of sentences intelligible in themselves, but having slight connection with each other.' After much trouble he discovered that at the age of nine she had been charitably taken by an old Protestant pastor, a great Hebrew scholar in whose house she lived till his death. On further inquiry it appeared to have been the old man's custom for years to walk up and down a passage of his house into which the kitchen opened, and to read to himself in a loud voice out of his books. The books were ransacked, and among them were found several of the Greek and Latin fathers, together with a collection of Rabbinical writings. In these works so many of the passages taken down at the young woman's bedside were identified that there could be no reasonable doubt as to their source. If the girl had remembered these passages in a normal way and had merely uttered them during her sickness, the story would have been remarkable enough, since she was altogether uneducated. But, as a matter of fact, she remembered none of them in health, either before or after her sickness. It was doubtless the activity or the circulation during the access of the fever which brought out, as it were, the impressions of sounds recorded in the brain, but so lightly that except during such stimulation she remained unconscious even of their existence."

Such marvels of memory as Mr. Procter mentions at the outset, are common enough in the East as well as in the West. Most of them are men of slender parts in general, but their nakedness usually eludes examiners. And herein lies the cause of the failure of examinations, as ordinarily conducted, as a test of merit. We have known men who passed their law examination simply by their power of repeating by rote. One of them, a fine mathematician who held the chair of law at a Government college, confessed to us that at the time he passed in law he really did not understand the Penal Code, though he could give it from beginning to end. It is only youths of such retentive powers that have a chance at modern examinations, so much on such a variety of subjects is expected of examinees. That shows a radical defect in the system which should be removed, if high intellectual power is not for ever to be scared away from University education or denied its rewards. It is a great evil where the memory is exercised at the expense of the higher faculties. And this is what is precisely done. The unreasonable cultivation of the retentive power is made use of to "get up" rather than master subjects for which students have no natural aptitude. This fighting Nature can come to no good. Neither the individual nor society is at all benefitted by it. It should be the aim of enlightened educationists to put an end to this great evil which is growing with the expansion of education. In another column is an opportune protest from a simple native student.

THE Committee of the Madras Agri-Horticultural Society held a meeting on the 7th December last, in which papers were read on the production of mangoes at unusual seasons. Dr. John Shortt writing from Yercand on the subject, says:—

"Very little care or attention has been given to the mango as a fruit producer. Some care is given to them during infancy; after that, they are left to nature; neither pruning, manuring, nor irrigation is attended to. Notwithstanding, we do get some splendid fruits from some of them; but if they were attended to like other fruits, the results would be better. On the Bombay side and towards Goa, two crops are obtained from the mango, but on the Madras side only one. The plants will have to be forced to get them to fruit out of season. Recent mango graft will often push out flowers out of season; advantage should be taken of those to take grafts off them and to see that the actual branch in flower is made the 'scion.' Grafts from trees that produce a second crop from the Bombay side should be secured and care should be taken to see that grafts are put on when the tree is in flower with its second crop, and thus I think we might succeed in establishing a second mango crop. I have myself eaten mangoes from second crops which were taken from Bombay to Tuticorin, and sent up here from thence by my daughter. Second crop fruits are procurable along the Western Coast on these occasions. I don't know whether you are aware that an indication of the failure of a crop of mangoes becomes at once evident when the tree bursts out with a mass of young leaves which is a certain indication that no fruit will follow. It is only by resorting to selected grafts, the scion of which has been taken from a plant that produced fruit out of season and when in flower or fruit, a second crop of fruit may be obtained by ringing the stem, and at the same time attending to the tree by manuring, watering and pruning it freely. This plan might be put into practice anywhere, that is ringing the mango stem out of season, and when got to flower and fruit, take grafts from it at once. This is a subject that requires care and attention, and success will be the result. I have some papers on the subject on which I cannot lay my hands just now." "Dr. Shortt also suggested two other plans; but the honorary secretary doubts the likelihood of either of them being successful, but agrees with Mr. Gleeson, the Superintendent of the Gardens, that by patient enquiry and careful selection trees may be found and propagated with the habit already established of fruiting not twice a year, but at unusual seasons, by which means fruits might possibly be obtained in nearly every month in the year. Surgeon-General Bidie remarks, that when at Colombo last year during the Christmas holidays, a basket of mangoes was brought to him, and on enquiry he was informed that that was the season for Jaina mangoes; also that he has heard that the late Maharaja of Travancore succeeded in having mangoes every day of the year."

Before we congratulate the gourmands of the South, we should like to know the quality of the edible. Better good mangoes once a year than indifferent ones all the year round. The Southern fruit is so inferior that we do neither wonder at, nor care for, its chronological variation or the multiplication in the number of its crops. The shifting of the season is not so difficult, and by due arrangement of a dozen trees one may get mangoes every month. But it might be hazardous to experiment on the finer varieties. Certainly, we would not advise any one to try to extract two crops from his Lengra, Pearaphooli, Gopale Dhoba, or other similar grafts. We would warn the good Nawab of Moorsheedabad against any innovation of the kind in his orchards. The delicate flavour of the Begumpasand and the Sultanpasand and other such Pasands, will scarcely stand such rude interference. It would be a calamity if, in the rage for horticultural reform, the quality of the noblest of God's tokens of love to his creatures—the mango—suffered. What we desire to see is the multiplication of trees of the most delicious fruitage, so as to bring the boon of such good eating—in every sense—within the reach of the poor. For the mango is not only savoury but nutritious.

If our scientific botanists and "practical horticulturists" want to make experiments in this connection, let them discover the mango creeper and try their powers on it. They may come upon some good.

WE have to record a sad loss in the death, on Thursday morning, at Deoghur, of heart disease, of Baboo Dwarkanath Chuckerbutty Born of poor parents at Gostea, north of Hulisahar, the Brahman lad went to the neighbouring Hooghly College for education, where he commenced his school career. There he early developed his intellectual powers under the chargeable care of Baboo Bhudeb Mookerjee, then Headmaster of the local Normal School. Baboo Dwarkanath next joined the old Hindu College in Calcutta paying his expenses by private tuition. Compelled early to enter the world, he took to schoolmastering as his profession. Cherishing higher aims in life, he passed his examination in Law. Being little known and wanting the wherewithal to set himself up a practitioner, he continued a teacher. He next went to Cuttack as headmaster, thence in the same capacity to Beerbhoom—his future home. There he was enabled by the kindness of the Judge to enroll himself a Vakil and shew and develop his powers as a lawyer. Soon he began to prosper. With reputation established, he went to Bhagulpore. On the death of Kristo Das Pal, he accepted the Assistant-Secretaryship of the British Indian Association, and joined the High Court, without giving up his mofussil practice. He figured best during the last Rent Question, and contributed some of the ablest argument, from Beerbhoom, in the Englishman on the Rent Bill. A new Zemindar, he regarded with horror the gradual whittling away of the pledges of 1793, and he put his whole soul into their defence.

Baboo Dwarkanath knew no rest nor comfort. He knew only his clients, and died in their service. He leaves two sons to inherit his competence chiefly invested in land. He was an amiable man of great modesty. His love of study was an absorbing passion. He was a brilliant criminal advocate, sound in law and effective in examination and pleading. He was a good and ready speaker as well as writer. But his fame had been local before the death of Kristo Das Pal brought him to town. He was discovered by his letters to the Englishman. The first of the series showed the existence of a new writer in rural Beerbhoom. Since then his fluent pen was pressed into the cause.

ON Wednesday, the 18th, the Countess of Dufferin opened, at the Museum, the International Exhibition of Photographs. The Lieutenant-Governor received the Countess and the Maharanee of Cooch Behar was present. Baboo Koonjolal represented the oleaginous natives.

THE Accountant-General, Madras, was for 20 years troubled with an iron safe which would not open. From time to time, attempts were made to peep within but without success, as without zeal. No effort in right earnest was made, under the notion that business would not quit cost—le jeu ne valait pas la chandelle. Possibly, the notion was encouraged by some one or more in the office who knew better. At any rate, the chest was not broken open, and it was voted a nuisance. For, it certainly might have been left undisturbed, to take its chance in the future, when the "open sesame" was discovered, or till inquiry for something of importance missing in the office might suggest an anxious search into the unopened safe. If pressed for space, the chest might be utilised for a seat or a stand for various articles. If it wounded the esthetic sensibilities of the Accountant-General, it might easily enough be converted into a thing of beauty. At the worst, it might be relegated to an obscure corner, or even to a lumber room. But no! it was worse than an eye-sore. It became a crying grievance. Nothing short of making an end of it, would satisfy the indignant department. So they deliberately proceeded to the sacrifice. Here the traditions of the Great Circumlocution Office interposed and imposed moderation. A bloody execution was out of the question. The Accountant-General might have blown the offending box and its contents to atoms with dynamite, but he was reminded that that would be too barbarous for British officials. At last, after the usual expenditure of black ink and red tape and foolscap, the obnoxious safe was ordered to be sent to the auctioneer for whatever price it might fetch. Messrs. DeRozario and Co. sold it, knocking it down to a Native. The purchaser was more persevering than the Government department, if he had not indeed made his purchase on purpose. He came into a valuable possession for a song. He found in the chest a large number of Tanjore bonds valued at 10 lacs of rupees. Now the officials awoke to their responsibility. There was weeping and wailing in the department and shedding of crocodile tears, as well as drops of genuine distress and shame. The law officers of the Crown were moved, and at last Government came down upon the purchaser—for the bonds. The auction-purchaser stood upon his rights: having paid for the safe as it was, he flatly refused to part with the contents. He however agreed to give up the bonds for Rs. 2,00,000 or even for Rs. 1,50,000. Now the officials made an opportune discovery—to their own discredit though. The bonds in question had been paid up, though they bore no endorsement to that effect. That was a grave irregularity, for which somebody ought to suffer. But if the statement be true, the bonds are little better than waste paper. It were paying dearly indeed for a whistle to recover them at the price set or for any respectable sum. Indeed, if Government possessed proof of payment, we do not understand the anxiety for the bonds. Failing to bully the purchaser into surrender of the documents, application was made for the interference of the courts. A suit for the bonds was filed, and Justice Shephard has ordered delivery thereof with costs.

THERE will be an Investiture of the Most Eminent Order of the Indian Empire in the Throne Room of Government House, at noon, on Saturday, the 4th February, 1888.

A SAD failure of justice has, in the opinion of the whole Oriental world, occurred, under the operation of an inelastic Code of relentless theoretical legislation, in the case of Sahoo Sahu of Cuttack. We hope the Crown will step in to save the poor man.

THIS afternoon, the Municipal Commissioners elected Mr. John Cowie as their Secretary to replace Mr. Turnbull who retires in April next.

LATE at night, as we are going to press, we receive the following telegram from Cuttack:—

Orissa annual National Agricultural Exhibition was proclaimed opened on the 18th at 9 in the morning, in the Cuttack Collectorate compound by Babu Denonath Bannerjee, with a short speech explaining the object of the Exhibition. Subsequently six salutes were fired and music played. The exhibits are of rare quality and nicely arranged. Both European and Native gentlemen were present and expressed satisfaction. Mr. Henry, the Collector, expressed great satisfaction and has given one prize. The arrangements are simply perfect, considering the single-handedness of Babu Denonath. His zeal is laudable. On the 19th, 500 poor were fed by Dinonath Babu. Admission of cultivators, ladies and girls was gratis. Exhibition remained open for six days. Prizes will be distributed next week. Some students of college and collegiate school destroyed some articles throwing balls into the exhibition hall and cutting screen, insulted police and forged tickets.

Mr. Cantonment Magistrate Hopkins of Barrackpore is a strong man. He lately fined the European Personal Assistant to the Inspector-General of the Police for not taking out a license for his horse. The P. A. pleaded exemption as a Police Officer, but the C. M. overruled the objection. He might be of the Police at Calcutta but not in the 24-Pergunnas. The P. A. paid the fine but he conceived himself unfairly treated, and got his principal the I. G. to sympathise with him so far as to appeal to Government against the savage quasi-military tribunal. But the Law officers thought Mr. Hopkins right and the Lieutenant-Governor did not interfere.

HORSE BREEDING FOR THE STATE.

THERE is great difference of opinion on the quality of horseflesh suited to the demands of the state. In the East, we swear by the Arab. Among the Arabians, who are the best horsemen in the world, there is an ancient tradition, implicitly believed in by the tribes of the desert in Asia as in Africa, that attributes the horse to a special creation of the Almighty next in importance to the making of Adam himself. In India, the famous Katywar is originally an Arab. In France, the Algerian struggles of the French so impressed the authorities with the virtues of the Arab animal, that the Emperor Napoleon III deputed one of his "horse" generals to Africa on an elaborate inquiry and to select stallions and mares. His report embodied much curious information from native sources and was translated into English some twenty-eight years ago. Notwithstanding, the Arab horse lost character in the European sporting world, until the appearance of Mr. Wilfrid Blunt. This gentleman, since so famous as the friend of Araby Pasha, and afterwards of India and of Islam in India in particular, and now a martyr, by self-election, of Irish politics in Tullamore gaol—first came to notice as the champion of the Arab horse. This long sojourn in the East and wanderings among the desert tribes in the Asiatic dominions of the Sultan, had given him opportunities for observing the fleetness and, above all, the enduring qualities of the native horse, and filled him with quite a Moorish enthusiasm in favour of the noble animal. At last, he came to regard it as his mission to procure justice in the Western world to this noble companion of the lonely Bedouin—the camel, however useful and even indispensable, is but a beast of burden, and withal a savage at best and uncompanionable. He sunk a fortune in importing a considerable stud and breeding in England and made himself hoarse with the advocacy of the Arab cause, but to little purpose. His active restless countrymen admired the solid qualities of the foreigner, but stuck to the native. Mr. Blunt's horses fetched no proper prices. He still maintained his point and his stud, keeping up breeding as far as the disheartening coldness of the British turf would allow.

He again visited the East in search of horses, but was drawn by the stress of politics to the cause of the Eastern man. A Conservative at home, he espoused Liberalism in Egypt when English Liberals were down on Young Egypt. He nobly stood by his friend in need and was instrumental in saving Araby's life. When all was up with the National Party in Egypt, and its leader was deported to Ceylon, he followed his friend to the Farther East and travelled through India. There, though chiefly drawn by men, he did not neglect his old love. His observation and enquiries seem to have strengthened his Turkish and Egyptian experiences. Unlike other tourists, who love the Europeans' curries, not wisely but too well, and get such glimpses as they are allowed of the poor Indians through spectacles of their Anglo-Indian hosts, he cultivated the natives. He fell among a people whose regard for the horses of Arabia has passed into a national proverb. It is the same in all parts and provinces: on this head Bombay and Bengal, the North and South, are all of one mind. In the Western Presidency and in Hyderabad in especial, his expert eye feasted on the finest Arabs and Indo-Arabs. The embers of his old zeal must have kindled afresh. He had never confessed himself beaten in the experiment of demonstrating the superiority of the Arab. But if his stud had never been closed, yet under the freezing discouragement of the British public the breeding must have been much restricted, specially during his absence. On his return from India, there seems to have been a revival. His hope of ultimate success too has revived. At length, he is understood to have made some impression on some horse-fanciers. Within the last few months, some horses from his establishment have sold well.

This popularity of the Arab may be but a temporary reaction. There is scarcely a chance of this breed recovering its old place in the Western world. On the turf, the English horse will probably always maintain ground. We have a suspicion that, for active service in the field, the Arab is a more economical investment. But, we fear, the breed does not get fairplay. Not only is the partiality of the British in favor of their own against it, but probably vested interests will always be in the way. At any rate, English breeders, who are the leading sportsmen, have in their hands the making of opinion, and the power of opinion frequently proves superior to the logic of facts. Racers do not make the best chargers, yet, after all, the turf naturally governs the War Office in matters of horseflesh.

In India, the official faith in the English horse is unshaken. Mr. Hallen, the chief of Government experts, still believes in the Norfolk stallion, and 22 such trotters were ordered out during the year ending 31st March last. He knows that the native prepossession is in favour of Arab breeds, and that many Europeans in this country are of the same view. But he holds that the experience of the fairs and exhibitions of the year, proves that the longer and more powerful horses were the issue of Norfolk sires. There were at the end of the year, in the Government Horse breeding depôts, 421 stallions, or 299 in Bengal and 122 in Bombay. Of these, 12 Norfolk trotters and 8 thoroughbreds were brought out from England and 55 stallions procured in the country. Mr. Hallen had been to Beluchistan on a professional tour, and reports enthusiastically of the country as a field for horse and mule breeding.

UNIVERSITY REFORM.

THE intelligent and educated classes of the Indian communities, having repeatedly, through accredited organs and assemblies, declared their adherence to the principle of representative Government, we beg earnestly to draw the attention of all concerned to the desirability of recognising that principle in the administration of the affairs of the Indian Universities. The Western institutions, after which these Universities have been modelled, are, for the most part, self-governing, and the products of the Indian Universities have furnished the most zealous and intelligent supporters of all systems of Local Self-Government introduced by the British in India. The laws of the land recognise this by the anxiety to confer special electoral privileges upon graduates. The graduate has indeed been the greatest political missionary, the advanced guard in freedom's fight—parochial, provincial or imperial—and as the days advance and the old lights of the pre-university period dim and disappear, the graduates will more and more monopolise the position of the men of light and leading, who in every country and clime exercise a great deal of influence upon the course of public affairs. Is it then too much to ask that these men should, in their corporate capacity, be endowed with a voice, however feeble or partial, in the management of the educational affairs, in which they are the most competent to judge, and wherein they have almost all a personal stake, seeing that every educated man cannot but do his best towards giving a similar education to his children? With vast and wide-reaching schemes of Local Self-Government created by statute for even the rural populations, there can hardly be a question as to the fitness of the graduates for the reception of franchise rights. If they are unfit, what other class in the country can be called fit for the exercise of the privilege? In number, they can be counted by the hundred in the case of the older Universities, and therefore offer a sufficiently wide field for experiment. From the point of view of political expediency, there cannot be any doubt that a system of representation would relieve the Chancellor, in other words, the Government from the difficult task of appointing Fellows for the Universities—annually increasing in delicacy with the rapid increase in the number of educated men in the country—and getting rid of the public discontent caused by every case of supposed or actual bad selection. Of course, at starting, the appointment of Fellows was necessarily with the Government, although, as remarked by the Times of India, the result has not been altogether satisfactory, men being often admitted to be members of a reputed learned body solely on account of their wealth, their social position, or, mightiest of all, their powers of solicitation. The experience on this side of the continent can suggest equally pertinent examples. The growth made by the graduates in number, education and public spirit, justifies a claim that the Universities should begin to be relieved of their swaddling clothes and leading strings. There is no need for taking any revolutionary step like disbanding the existing Senate and making over the whole control of the University to the nominees of the graduates. A Bill of a tentative kind is already before the Bombay Council, whereby a certain number of Fellowships would be recruited through election by the graduates. Is it to be said that the graduates of the Calcutta University are less fit to be entrusted with a similar privilege or that the educational interests over which that University presides, are of a less important character? This is not the case, to our thinking, and we are deliberately of opinion that a similar measure should be introduced for the gradual reorganization of the Calcutta University. That body has, of late, undergone a distinct process of deterioration, and a process of natural selection by constitutional means is the best restorative. The scheme for the constitution need not be complicated. It would be sufficient that the principle were recognised and a beginning made, which contained within itself the seeds of future continuation. It would, for instance, be easy to provide, by a short statute, that one-half of the future vacancies caused by death, resignation, absence from India, or otherwise, should be filled up by election, none but the holders of high degrees in each department of learning (M. A., M. D., etc.,) being eligible for election, the graduates of the University residing in India composing the electorate. The subsidiary rules for the election might be safely left to the existing Senate; and the remaining half of the vacancies left to be filled up as now by favor of the Chancellor.

SIR A. LYALL IN THE INDIA COUNCIL.

THE appointment of Sir Alfred Lyall to the seat left vacant in the Council of the Secretary of State in England by the demise of Sir Robert Montgomery, cannot fail not only to astonish but disgust the whole Native community.

There cannot be a shadow of a doubt in the minds of any unprejudiced man, that Sir Alfred Lyall, both as Foreign Secretary and as Lieutenant-Governor, was an utter failure. What had he done to merit what ought to be reserved as the rich reward of at least true good service to the state, if not glorious achievement? He is doubtless an accomplished man, but smart poetasters and students deep in comparative demonology do not necessarily nor usually make good administrators or safe advisers in state-craft. We can recall no liberal measure distinctly emanating from him, but remember many things to his discredit. He began his official career in a bad spirit. The dealings of an Indian officer with those staunch supporters of the cause of Order and pioneers of Indian progress, the educated classes of the Bengali race, are an unfailling indication of his stuff. Sir Alfred employed his whole power and influence as a Political to keep the Bengali out of the Native States. And he retained his prejudice and maintained his disloyal policy to the last. Even as a literary man, he has left no noble words to compensate in some measure for a long course of ill-doing. India has, in a very great measure, to thank Sir Alfred Lyall indirectly for the imposition Holloway's Pills.—Factory Operatives and Workers in Manufactories.—The remarkable remedies which have been discovered and perfected by Thomas Holloway, and which have for more than forty years been successfully used in every quarter of the globe, are especially useful in all the manifold ailments which afflict those who by reason of their occupations are confined for years, or all their lives, in crowded buildings and workshops. Holloway's Pills and Ointment are associated remedies, the former restoring the vital powers when diminished, and always acting as an efficient blood purifier, whilst the latter relieves local maladies, checks inflammation, and acts as a cleansing and healing agent in cases of bad legs, bad breasts, ulcers and unhealthy sores of all kinds.

of the Income Tax, for it is a well known fact that the Empire owed the Afghan campaign to the blunders and mistakes of Sir Alfred Lyall when he held the portfolio of the Foreign Office.

Again, throughout the whole of the Laidman-Hearsey case, Sir Alfred Lyall clearly proved that he did not know what true honor and honesty was, and was ready to sacrifice the good of the country, the welfare of the natives over whom he was placed to rule, rather than permit the offences of an individual of his own Service to be brought to light. His sense of justice in the whole matter clearly shews what an amount of judicial obliquity must have actuated all his proceedings. And this is the man the Government have thought fit to make one of the Council to advise and check the Secretary of State! Well may the country look to his appointment to the Secretary of State's Council with both astonishment and alarm!

But the country, in a very great measure, has to thank itself for the result. For if it had only afforded a proper amount of support to Captain Hearsey, the Government, in the face of the evidence that would have been adduced, would not and could not have dared to appoint him to that post. Captain Hearsey wished, in order to clear up all matters concerning the notorious Resolution, to prosecute Sir Alfred Lyall criminally, but the Viceroy, at the solicitation of that Lieutenant-Governor, refused flatly to grant his sanction. Doubtless, the bugbear of reasons of state was held in terrorem before His Excellency by an Oligarchy of officials who in Rome would have vetoed against Cicero's prosecution against Verres, and in London against the impeachment of Hastings. It was then that Captain Hearsey purposed to prosecute him civilly. As such an action would be a most expensive one he called upon the nation to assist him in a cause which really and truly was theirs, but met with no response whatsoever, although the matter was warmly urged by the independent press. There is only one way by which this appointment, so dangerous to the aspirations and wishes of the whole Indian community, may be counteracted, and that is by furnishing Captain Hearsey with sufficient means to prosecute this autocratic satrap criminally before the Queen's Bench in England. Here he will find no shield and protection from his former official position in India. In fact, it will, before any honest English Judge, militate against him especially in so much as he was guilty by his audacious Resolution in insulting an honorable member of that bench, because he would not comply with his wishes and find an honest man guilty who was not. What are a few thousands to India's millionaires? Any money expended for this purpose would be well laid out by the nation, as it would prevent any Provincial Head or other high official from abusing his office in the way Sir Alfred Lyall did.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

AIMLESS EDUCATION.

"What is the object of your life?" asked a gentleman who was on a visit to a college of a student of it. The boy was at a loss, he was not ready with any answer, but after a few moments' consideration he extricated himself from all difficulties—he was foolish enough to say that his father knew what he would make of him. The boy in question was a distinguished student—and hopeful boy of twenty, he was sailing on and on without any ideas of arriving to any haven, he referred to his father about the choice of his own course of life. It grieves me to think that a vast majority of our young friends who daily flock to schools and colleges are of the above type, they are being educated without having any goal in view where to halt and take breath like a shining star.

Every individual should from his cradle resolve on what he would be, and thus with an aim prepare himself in such a way as might enable him to arrive at his goal in face of all impediments that might come across his pathway. A man without a fixed career in view is like a ship driven adrift, he does not know what to do, where to turn; victim of every random gust, he has no force of his own, he is inert.

It is a sad pity that a greater number of Young Bengal are subject to this evil, they do never think for a moment what they will do, they prosperously proceed with their academical study, come to an end of their student career, and graduate themselves.

Now the difficulties make their appearance, now the graduates breathe a new atmosphere, the thought of winning bread comes in their head, they hastily seize the nearest resource. This is no other than law. They take up law and turn advocates without ever thinking whether their genius is adapted to a vocation.

Ninety per cent. of these lawyers get little or no practice and their portion is to labour under the weight of Pugree till at length starvation finishes them.

Every individual has a natural bent of mind, no one should curb this, rather ought he to cherish it. Every boy should follow the innate inclinations of his mind in order that he may prove that the "child is father of the man."

I have some aptitude for mathematics, my talents are favorable to success as a mathematician. If I come to know this I should at once give up any serious thought of making myself a lawyer. It is better for me to follow my favourite pursuit. I, in no case, ought to depend on others for the choice of my own profession. Where the father is quite ignorant of the natural bent of the boy, he is utterly incapable of striking out a path for the son. The son is to find his own path in the world and the father father's. The son will have to play his own part, and he should try to attempt to do it ably and well. Towards playing well previous preparation is necessary, and previous preparation can not be expected without previous choice.

Lives of great men tell us that they toiled from their early childhood to get at the aim of their life, and without having any such aim no man has even been able to climb up the ladder.

BOSE.

A REPROOF AND A CHALLENGE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE "INDIAN DAILY NEWS."

SIR,—A receptacle of rejected addresses need not necessarily be a repository of rubbish, and a pair of uterine wits has improved upon the suggestion to present to all time a rich comedy of the supposed contents of the Balaam box. A vehicle for receiving suppressed matters must be useful, and is likely to be exciting or interesting. I have always admired the Indian Daily News for its protection to the suppressed, faithfully publishing as it does correspondence burked by the other journals. No doubt one's philosophy and equanimity are put to a severe test when self is in question, yet I think I have good reason to complain of your conduct in allowing in your Saturday's issue a correspondent to attack a "contemporary." It is idle to whine of etiquette or professional courtesy where community may be disowned. For I can scarcely imagine a worse case of wanton outrage against, I shall not say a brother journalist, but, one journalist by another. There was no pretence for publication. "B" and his clients may be aggrieved, but the Indian Daily News had nothing to do with it. It was a business between them and Reis and Rayyet. The Indian Daily News had not even quoted from that paper the account which naturally displeased those persons. Their remedy lay in the columns of Reis and Rayyet or in the courts of the land. Nor did your correspondent allege that he had sought publication in Reis and Rayyet, and been refused. The matter is more serious than the contradiction of an account in a newspaper. Reis and Rayyet is not an ordinary newspaper. It pretends to a high accuracy in its facts as well as deliberateness in its views. It passes over many items of news rather than commit itself to something unfounded. Besides, the account in question is not only an editorial note or leaderette, but it is avowedly personally editorial, being a report of a scene at which the editor was present. Now, it is this report that has been challenged, and not only challenged, but the editor himself has been abused. Even a bare contradiction would almost have been out of place, and scarcely intelligible, in the columns of the Indian Daily News. What shall be said of the deliberate offensiveness of language towards another editor in which the letter is couched! Never mind, you have done as seemed best to you. We in India are accustomed to wrongs enough from our fellow subjects to be inconsolable at a scratch like this; specially as I am not, God be thanked, without the power to defend myself according to need. But the matter must be fought in your columns. Having graciously opened your columns to a gratuitous attack, you must allow a reply, and so on. Before I reply, I must, however, know who "B" is. He knows whom he has attacked. He has attacked me as Editor of Reis and Rayyet. If he does not know who the editor is, you may tell him. I am entitled to know who he is. Apologising for the length of this communication,—Yours, &c.,

CORPORATION OF CALCUTTA.

MUNICIPAL ELECTION UNDER SECTION 23 OF ACT IV. (B. C.) OF 1876.

A vacancy having occurred in the representation of Ward No. 18 by the disqualification of Mr. J. G. Apar, owing to his absence from Calcutta for six months consecutively, it is hereby notified that the rate and tax-payers of the aforesaid Ward must forthwith proceed to elect a Commissioner for the aforesaid Ward. As only one Commissioner has to be elected, each person qualified to vote will, under the concluding portion of Section 13, be entitled to only one vote.

The election will be held on Monday, the 27th February 1888, between the hours of 9 A. M. and 6 P. M., at the Municipal Office. At a date not less than 21 days before the day fixed for taking the poll, a voting paper printed in blue ink will be forwarded by post to each of the registered voters.

The voter on receipt of this voting paper may—

- (1) Return it by post duly filled up to the Municipal Office in a closed cover marked "voting paper"
- (2) Return it by hand to the Municipal Office in a closed cover marked "voting paper"

- (3) Present it himself at the polling station on the day of the poll, or
- (4) Entrust it either open or in a closed cover at his option, to any person whom he may select, for delivery at the polling station on the day of the poll.

Any Voter who, owing to miscarriage of the Post or other mishap, may not have received his voting paper by the 14th day before the poll, may apply at the Municipal Office personally or by agent for a duplicate, putting in a written statement that he has not received any voting paper.

Voting papers on different colored paper from the original and duplicate papers referred to above will be provided at the Municipal Office at the time of the poll, and any voter who has not already voted, or who may wish to cancel his previous vote, may, notwithstanding that he has already filled up an original or a duplicate voting paper, appear at the poll and fill up a paper in the presence of the polling officer, and such vote or votes shall alone be held valid and shall cancel all previous votes.

OPINION OF THE PRESS.Dr. S. C. Mookerjee, the editor of what is undoubtedly one of the ablest papers in the country in point of literary power is the author of a pleasant little book of Travels in East Bengal.....The author is master of a racy style of English which many an Englishman may envy.
Humourous descriptions and caustic satire enliven every page. There is throughout a vigour and freshness of style that lends a charm to the veriest commonplace. If there were, however, a higher purpose in the publication of this book than to lighten the weary evening hours of the ordinary reader, we confess to a feeling that the author has failed in such an object. We are afraid there is not poetry enough in us to body forth in imagination the beauty of the scenes which the author has described in his voyages to and fro between Dacca and Tipperah. Humourist as he is Dr. Mookerjee will remind us of the words of the poet that the point of a "jest lies more in the ear of him that hears it than in the tongue of him that utters it." As with the jest so is it with the description. We do not say that the charge is unfounded. Prosaic as we are, drudging away at the desk, perhaps it is that we lack capacity to follow in imagination what the author has doubtless delineated with an admirable pen.One of the chief impressions that a reader will receive from a glance at the book is the somewhat strained relation between the Babus and the Anglo-Indians. The author pours a flood of ridicule upon the lordly airs of our "rulers." He hits hard indeed in his account of the Colonel at whist enduring a Babu looking on, when on board the steamer, and of the whiteman's condescension in bowing to the black nigger. Happily we in the South are not so badly off in our commerce with the representatives of Western civilization. In spite of several instances of conflict and misunderstanding Englishmen and Hindus pull on agreeably together. But the author, notwithstanding his involuntary feeling of aloof-

ness from the European, is no stranger to the blessings for which the West has laid us in debt. He has a keen appreciation of the enjoyments of this Westernized life of ours. He looks for ever forward and casts no longing lingering look behind at the things with which we have shaken hands and parted. His heart is in the continuance of British supremacy in the East. And agitation is his utmost weapon for the maintenance of his rights. But he will have nothing with spurious agitation. We extract below a paragraph of excellent advice to his brethren of the press. [Extract.]

The author recounts his adventure with the Railway officials of Sealdah with considerable humour. We feel an irresistible temptation to quote it in extenso, but space forbids. How the greenback was no legal tender, why silver of the Calcutta mint was wanted and how the currency question stood stiff and frowning despite the Editors and Magistrates who had accompanied the author to bid him good-bye at the station, and how again with the advent of the Justice of the Peace all objection to receiving the currency-note vanished, are all narrated in a style that is fittingly characterized only by the word "delightful." In another place the author introduces the reader to the Hindu belief in the auspicious hour for starting on a journey in language of such playful rillery that we make no apology for quoting it. [Extract.]

The author has some trenchant criticism on the insolation of the Englishman, which makes him inaccessible to the complaints of extortion or plunder by their menials. They are too absorbed to know all that passes about them and the wrongs that are committed in their names are unnoticed as mere trifles for they have rarely any idea of their magnitude. It is only too well known throughout the country how blackmail in the shape of money or provisions is levied upon the inhabitants when the Collector is on tour. It would be difficult to believe the thing could go on under his very nose without his connivance if we did not know his exclusiveness and his distaste for mixing with the people.

The author devotes the greater part of the book to a description of the people and the external aspect of the country that he passed through in his two trips to Tipperah from Calcutta and back. He has a good deal to say about the customs of some of the people he becomes acquainted with. He makes a discovery of the debris of a Portuguese colony in Tipperah that has become debased in morality and sunk in superstition. Although there is not much in the book that is instructive to the serious student, the grace of diction and the ease of style carry the reader pleasantly through. It would be difficult to rescue such a subject as he has chosen from dullness without his extraordinary command of language. We cannot promise more than a brief span of life to the book. It will prove what is abundantly clear to the readers of the Reis and Rayyet, that the author is an adept in English composition. He is a lover of nature and he paints scenes and situations with an artist's pencil.—The Hindu, November 7, 1887.

.....this interesting book. We are justified in so terming it, not on account of any romantic adventures that the author has to relate, nor of any very new discoveries in geography or natural history. There is something particular as regards ethnology; and a great deal of human nature in the book, shown to the reader with a simplicity and candour which bear testimony to its truth. Called from the busy haunts of men in the city to dwell for a time in Independent Tipperah as a judicious adviser to its Chief, Doctor Mookerjee relates his adventures during the several journeys to and fro in that capacity, without revealing the secrets of the State, like a good diplomatist. He has adhered strictly to the advice which he offers to his brethren of the Native Press, and has written what he saw and knows, without revealing all, considering what he might properly say and what withhold..... The above seems to be a curious passage to be found in a book of travels, and appears to have no connection with the subject. But it arises from a casual reference to a slaughter house, and a writer who "thundered weekly against the outrage of locating shambles in the immediate vicinity of a Hindoo temple"—where, in fact, no temple could be said to exist. Hence, the Doctor advises his fellow-scribes, not to be Pharisees, righteous over-much, but to look and be sure of their facts. In the same spirit, he has written his book. He gives an account of his travels, which seem often to have been voyages, upon the wide-spreading rivers of Eastern Bengal which in the rains become almost inland seas. On these he philosophises on the nature of the country and the people, making careful observation of his facts; and though he sometimes fancies he knows better than his boatmen, and more than suspects that they are getting the better of him, he submits with a grace that would have done credit to Socrates, and accepts the apparently inevitable in the interests of peace. The Doctor is a close observer of nature, animate and inanimate, with an eye to the picturesque as well as to the sublime and beautiful. And although there is a vein of cynicism running through many of his observations, it is tempered by such evident good nature, that even a stranger would conceive him to be a laughter-loving rather than a stern philosopher. This is evident in his descriptions of his boatmen and others, while he denounces the lawlessness which has made the poor fishermen suspicious even of honest intentions, because they have so long been the helpless victims of marauders stronger than themselves. Their only defence is flight or deceit, and the latter is their justification as a mode of self-protection. We are shown not only the weakness of the people, but the shortcomings of the administration that leave these things possible..... The author is impartial in his censures..... There is much in the book to which space forbids us to refer. That it is not a prosy one may be gathered from the fact that, for its 300 pages, there are nearly as many index references. Many of the subjects are necessarily but lightly treated, but all sensibly and fairly. And Dr. Mookerjee is such a master of the English language that in the whole book we have scarcely found a phrase that might not have been written by an Englishman "to the minor horn." There is nothing in it at which any one could reasonably take offence; and there is much from which both Englishmen and natives may learn greatly-needed lessons.—The Indian Daily News, Nov. 22, 1887.

"TRAVELS IN BENGAL. Such is the title of a most interesting little work published a short time ago. Its author is Babu Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee, the well known Editor of the Reis and Rayyet, the most original, cleverly-written and interesting journal in India. Babu Sambhu Chunder is one of the veteran Indian writers in English. He is the master of a most happy, racy pleasant style, which you can easily make out from amongst the writings of a hundred different men. In racy humorous writing Babu Sambhu Chunder has no rival among his Indian contemporaries. He won his first laurels, we believe, by his writings in his own periodical, the Mookerjee's Magazine, now long defunct. In this magazine articles of great learning and excellence appeared, mostly from the pen of Babu Sambhu Chunder. He has written several other booklets. His Causes of the Mutiny; Mr. Wilson, Lord Canning and the Income Tax; the Career of an Indian Princess, Her Highness the late Secundra Begum of Bhopal; and the Prince in India and to India are publications which attracted considerable notice. His latest production "Travels in Bengal" is a work of great merit. It is at once a most faithful and interesting picture of natural scenery and life in Bengal, although Mr. Mookerjee does not profess to write a picture of Bengal life and uses his pencil in its portraiture only in passing. The dedication is characteristic. [Extract.]

The "Travels" are travels in East Bengal, travels and voyages between Calcutta and Independent Tepperah. We do not believe many people in this side of India know that there is such an independent State as Tipperah. But nevertheless such a state exists. We will give here a summary of its history in the words of Mr. Mookerjee—He writes:—[Extract.] Mr. Mookerjee was Dewan of Independent Tipperah for some five years in all between 1877 and 1881. The travels are an account of his voyages to and from Tipperah.

Those who have travelled in Bengal, particularly in its Eastern districts, which are the districts described in Mookerjee's book, will bear him out in his statement that Lower Bengal is not stale, flat and unprofitable, that, on the contrary, she is the beautifullest country in the world. She has no high mountains, but she has rivers apparently as vast as the sea, to make her scenery grand and majestic. She has a hundred rivers ever overflowing with water, thousands of transparent lakes covered with the lily and a hundred beautiful water-flowers, thousands of seas of ever-waving paddy fields, thousands of clusters of bamboo and of great trees dressed in beautiful creepers adorning the river banks, to make her the loveliest country in the world. Even a Bengali needs to see and travel Bengal to adequately know her thousand witching charms. For a foreigner it is well nigh impossible to get even an approximate idea of what they are like from description, however true and faithful. Let us hear what our author has to say on the subject. We read: [Extract.] A paddy sea is thus inimitably described: [Extract.]

We will quote a passage of another character:—[Extract.]

We could cull many such gems. But space forbids it. We will, however, quote some passages of another kind. Our traveller, though old in years, is evidently young in heart, for no one in the romantic age of youth could be more appreciative of female charms than our traveller. In every other page you find our author describing in terms of enthusiasm some rural girl or woman of beauty. [Extract.] In the next page we find our traveller's attention [Extract.]

There is the description, physical and moral, of a Colonel, which we cannot resist the temptation of reproducing, although the article has already exceeded the usual length. [Extract.]

We have now given extracts enough to show that the little book of travels is most delightful reading. It contains graphic descriptions of natural scenery, faithful portraiture of men and manners, and happy, good humoured observations on them. There is not an ill-natured or unkind word in the whole book—it overflows in every page with the milk of human kindness. Every observation testifies to the author being a keen observer of men and things, as an example of which we can mention the instructive and interesting chapter on the Native Christians of Portuguese extraction in Tipperah. Again, although the book does not pretend to deal with life in Bengal, the glimpses of that life we find in it are very considerable and pleasant. We will now conclude by recommending the book to all who may wish to spend a few hours amidst happy thoughts and pleasant pictures.—

—The Tribune, Nov. 26, 1887.

If we have not before noticed Mr. Sambhu C. Mookerjee's Travels in Bengal, which was published some months ago, it is not because the little book is either dull or pointless. It contains, on the contrary, much interesting matter, though some of the incidents are over-weighted with detail in what is facetiously called a "little booklet." The author's view as a rule is, by the way, facetious; he is given even to punning; but he is also sentimental in the highest degree—"a naked Whitman" hurts his susceptibilities; a Hindu girl, bathing in the river, throws him into an ecstasy of delight: "she had such large languishing eyes!" But he is nothing if not philosophical, and his reflections on this or that social and political subject are not without their moral. Mr. Sambhu C. Mookerjee was formerly Minister to the "last of the Nawabs Nazim of Bengal, Behar and Orissa" and afterwards Minister of the Maharaja of Tipperah. He is a man, therefore, of experience, and when he speaks his brethren should listen to him.... Travels in Bengal is a readable book, and it abounds in anecdotes which are often as instructive as amusing, and it is not spoiled by too many political allusions, though, of course, some few have crept in.—The Pioneer, Dec. 1887.

INFALLIBLE SPECIFIC FOR LEUCORRHOEA.

A week's use of this medicine not only cures Leucorrhœa—the characteristic white, green and bloody discharge—but also removes the concomitant intense menstrual pains, and all the various complaints and symptoms, incidental to menstrual difficulties and green sickness, and prepares the system for conception.

Price: for a week's consumption, Rs. 2, picking and postage 4 annas.

There are capital medicines besides—for piles, all the 20 kinds of flux—such as spermatorrhœa, diabetes, &c.—diarrhœa, rheumatism, puerperal complaints, cataract of the eye, macra, asthma, &c.

[Certificate.]

"I have known Babu Rajendra Nath Ghoshal kâbiraj for upwards of 15 years, and I can bear ample testimony to the wonderful efficacy of his medicine in the treatment of diseases of the womb. While Assistant Surgeon of Monghyr and subsequently, I have known him to cure the most obstinate cases of uterine Leucorrhœa and other uterine derangements, organic and functional. I can safely call his medicine the Specific for Leucorrhœa and painful menstruation. Ladies who have been subject to these diseases for years and were barren have been cured and borne children.

SEBASTIAN.

A TALE OF THE PORTUGUESE IN INDIA.

CANTO II.

I

What blackened ships are they that ride
At anchor on the glassy tide,

Which Reccan's coast all idly laves?
The yards unbraced, the rigging rent,
The topsails hanging half unbent,

They seem abandoned to the waves.
Beneath the Sun's oppressive beams,
Each silent deck deserted seems,
But gazing close, are now and then
Perceived the listless forms of men,
Whose features, although dark and tanned,
Proclaim them of a Western land.

A sail! a sail! some watchful eye,
Ever alert for danger nigh,
Hath caught the stranger creeping near.
At once a hundred forms appear,
And throng upon the decks, to mark
The movements of the coming bark.
Nearer, it wears, and now at last
The well known signal flies the mast.
Each heart is glad, but half in doubt,
For none can make the stranger out,
And many dark misgivings fill
The bosoms of those men of ill.

There is carousing in those ships,
And wines the richest wet the lips
Of men who with their swords have won,
Here in this climate of the sun,
The costliest products of old Earth,
Jewels of price and silks of worth:
Fierce spirits from the warlike West,
Those daring souls have found a zest
In sweeping with their arms the seas
From Afrique to the Celebes:
Men who have left their fatherland,
And linked them in one desperate band,
Defiant of the law's control,
And scorning chains upon the soul;
Reckless of good, of fame, of life,
And, like the Arab, trained to strife.
And why carouse these wanderers now?
And why is mirth on each dark brow?

Another comrade they have gained,
A man who like themselves disdained
The antiquated laws that bind
Beings of less aspiring mind,
A man who might revenge, nor cared
What crimes he wrought, what danger dared,
So long as fullest vengeance got
Relieved the torture of his lot.
And sooth, Sebastian rightly knew
What arts would win that lawless crew,
How hope of spoil would warm each heart
And fit their souls for any part.

The wine goes round, and still they grow
More bitter at their Moslem foe,
For well Sebastian tells his tale,
Till every lip grows parched and pale.
He tells how fell by Moslem wile
Friends in many a neighbouring isle,
And how the Sultan vowed to slay
Each Lusian dog that crossed his way.
They listen to his tale—they curse,
And each succeeding oath grows worse,
And as the wine inflames the brain
Higher and louder grows disdain,
Till each is found at length to owe
Some debt of vengeance to the foe.
They linger o'er the midnight feast,
Nor pass till dawn has streaked the East
Each to his couch of unblessed thought
To dream of blood, and battles fought.

The shades of evening are around,
The mist glides slowly over the sea,
A darker shadow shades the ground
And insects sing their song of glee.
Now, plaintive through the darkened trees
Rustles the welcome Southern breeze,
And there where lofty palm trees rise
In beauty to the dark blue skies,
Oppressed by thought Sebastian walks
Or pausing, to himself he talks.
His Guldnar is still the theme—
She comes in thought, she comes in dream,
A spirit of that lovely race
That worship at the shrine of grace.
What though the band have made him chief,
That honor cannot quench the grief
Which yet at thoughtful moments flows
For her for whom his bosom glows,
That cannot change, that cannot dim
Remembrance of her love for him.
When Hope's last ray seemed nigh,
And he had nought to do but die,

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money order if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given, any other being unnecessary and likely to cause confusion.

When dreary solitude but brought
The misery of bitter thought,
And dungeon walls and clanking claims
Gave terror to the prisoner's pains,
Her silvery voice still haunts his ear,
His cheek still feels her burning tear :
And that last hour of painful parting,
When every bosom chord seemed starting,
Still racks his heart, still fires his brain,
And makes him half a child again.

In council rude the band are met,
Unsettled in their movements yet,
Still doubtful where to meet the foe
And deal the fury of their blow.
Though Chief as yet but one brief day,
Sebastian holds unbounded sway,
And those fierce spirits calmly yield
A homage free and unconcealed.
He has the art to mould their will
And keep their pride unwounded still,
And by the force of mind alone
Make every heart and arm his own.
And now attention holds each man
As skilfully he shows his plan,
Proves well how Sundeep's fruitful isle
If taken would repay their toil ;
How from that spot the band might go
In constant warfare on the foe,
And ever have a safe retreat
To shelter and careen the fleet :
What fertile spots were spread around,
Where gold and grain were always found ;
What useful tribute could be got
From prows that daily pass the spot ;
And how victory, wealth and fame
Might once more light upon their name.
He ceases, and each voice has lent
Its clamours to the rude assent.

There's silence in those ships no more,
For busy both in sea and shore
The seamen ply their task all day,
Nor slacken with the sunset ray.
The silence of the night is broken
With many an ominous token
Of preparation for a strife,
Whose deadly aim is human life.
The ships are changed—no more they seem
The shattered remnants of a wreck,
But bright flags from the topmasts stream
And all is life upon the deck.
Many a rusty blade and spear,
Courslet and casque the warrior's gear—
Many a gun whose trusty lock
Has answered well in battle shock,
Are tarnished bright to be again
The ministers of crime and pain.
And with many a spotted brand
Is linked many a bloody tale
Of deeds performed in Eastern land,
Of man's revenge and woman's wail,
Since Gama from the land of grape
In tempests passed the stormy cape,
And shewed the West the ocean way
To spicy Inde and rich Cathay.
Each one among that hardy crew,
Whose daring with their danger grew,
Who, for many a bygone year,
Had wrought the haughty Moslem fear,
And braved the treacherous Dutchman's flag
On ocean wave, and island crag,

Whose ardent souls seemed fiercer grown,
And fitted more for crime
From dwelling in a clime,
Whose Sun was fiercer than their own,
Had tales to tell whose every word
With horror thrilled the ear that heard.
And now that once again the sword
Of warfare was unsheathed
And every sound and sign aboard
Of battle and of conquest breathed,
The sultry moonlight nights were spent
In tales of past exploits, that sent
To many a guilty breast
Such pangs as robbed it of its rest.

MALTA has been granted an elective Constitution. The Legislative Council of the Colony is to henceforth consist of twenty members, under the presidency of the Governor, six being official and fourteen elected members. Here is a pressing invitation to our Indian rulers to put their own edifice in order. In default, our people will not fail to take advantage of the logic of the fresh fact.

AT the Ahmedabad Levée, to avoid appearing bare-footed before His Excellency the Governor, some of the Hindoo officials clubbed together, hit upon a plan and purchased a pair of English boots from the joint fund. Each of these presented themselves before Lord Reay with the same pair of English boots. In the hurry of annexing the boots, very often these dignified officials indiscriminately used them in the right and the left feet. We are not told of the ultimate destination of the boots. The pair must have been resold by auction and the proceeds divided among the joint owners. What is the thrift of Sawney beside the prudence of the canny Gujrati?

M. BONNET has found antipyrin efficacious in sea-sickness. He administered it in no less than sixty cases with uniform success. The dose did not exceed one gramme and a half. M. Has anybody proposed it as a cure for cholera or rabies or snake bite? If not, there is a chance for ambition—a cheap opening for a discoverer's distinction. You could work miracles with this talisman, but no time should be lost. It will do anything for you, till, by and bye, it is elbowed out of the field by a more fortunate drug of the hour.

LORD BRASSEY, the globe-trotter in the Sunbeam, who had been to India, gave, on the 25th instant, at the London Chamber of Commerce, a lecture on the defences of the large maritime cities of the British Empire. His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge was present. Lord Brassey commented, among others,

"on the defences at present existing, and in course of erection, at Bombay, and the efficiency of the dockyard (?); but advised the employment of additional monitors and the organisation of crews to form a harbour defence flotilla; as Bombay, he considered, should be the chief naval station in the East. His Lordship strongly urged the formation of local batteries of Artillery, and the raising of regiments of Militia at Colombo and Singapur. These views of the speaker were fully endorsed by the Commander-in-Chief, who added that it was far cheaper in the end to make all preparations for emergencies in time of peace, instead of waiting till forced to do so by the near approach of war."

WE take the following from the I. D. News' Paris letter of the 30th December 1887 :—

"The wedding of Maurice Bernhardt, son of Sarah, the actress of wide-world fame, has been the social event of the week. It was all curiously suggestive of the levelling tendencies of the age, and extremely Parisian. It might also be regarded as the triumph of talent over tradition and convention. Sarah Bernhardt is the illegitimate daughter of a Dutch Jewess and an Englishman who lived at Havre. Her sister Jeanne is of no more lawful birth, neither is Jeanne's daughter, nor Sarah's son, who met his bride with that cousin in his mother's dressing-room on the night on which she first played in La Torca at La Porte St. Martin Theatre, fell in love with her then and there, and at the end of 40 days was married to her. Madame Maurice Bernhardt is née Princess Jablonowska, and was given the pretty Polish name of Terka at the font. Her late father was an aide-de-camp to Victor Emmanuel; her mother, née Princess de Bolonga, was in the household of the Duchess of Genoa, sister-in-law of that king, and caught her haughty manner. She is wrongly said to have Bonapartean blood. She is only connected with the Canino branch of the Bonaparte family, her mother having been Mdlle. Jouberton, daughter by a first husband of Lucien Bonaparte's second wife. The only members of the imperial connection at the wedding were Madame Ratazzi de Rute, whose second husband was the Italian statesman Rattazzi, and her daughter, Roma. Princess Terka became the devoted friend of Jeanne Bernhardt's daughter (also a Sarah) at Julien's drawing class, and used to be taken by her to the wings of theatres where the mother and aunt acted. Princess Terka is a piquante brunette, has the gift of gracefulness, is very pretty, beautifully moulded, small and winsome. She has the pale clear complexion of Southern Europe, with an under-glow coming through it of health and vitality, jet black hair, dark eyes, and features that would do for a cameo medallion. The course of true love in this instance has run smooth, owing to Sarah's readiness to share her last American harvest of £40,000 with her son. She halved it with him, and out of what remained to herself bought for the young couple a bijou mansion, with a large studio, wherein Maurice is to practise painting. Moreover, she gave the wedding dress, the lace on which cost £400, and pink and white dinner dresses with many other beautiful garments to Terka. The pink dress is of Chinese crape over satin. The former is embroidered and fringed with silver. The white dress is of moite antique, with an over-skirt of delicate gauze. Sarah can now well afford to be generous."

THE rate of exchange for the accounts between the Home and Indian Governments, for the year 1888-89, has been fixed by the Treasury, at 17 pence per rupee.

THE Home Remittances, from 1st April 1887 to 21st January 1888, were £11,948,200, the Budget estimate for the twelvemonth being £16,114,000.

THE Irish excitement over the imprisonment of Mr. O'Brien is equalled by the feelings evoked by his release. Reuter wires :—

"Everywhere in Ireland there have been rejoicings, bonfires, and illuminations in honor of Mr. O'Brien. Banquets are also in course of preparation at Cork and other towns. Government have forbidden a projected meeting at Kilrush, to celebrate Mr. O'Brien's release from Tullamore jail, to take place.

The great excitement produced by the enthusiastic reception accorded to Mr. O'Brien on his release, has quite prostrated that gentleman. He will attend the banquet given in his honor at Mallow, but otherwise will not be present at the numerous fetes that are being held all over the country. The proclamation forbidding the meeting to be held at Kilrush has been publicly burned in that town. The police extinguished the bonfires lighted to celebrate Mr. O'Brien's release from Tullamore jail."

RAO Bahadour Mahadeo Govind Ranade, C.I.E., has been appointed Special Judge under the Deccan Agriculturalists's Relief Act. He will draw only two-thirds pay.

LIEUTENANT-COLONEL Yate, C. S. I., reached Khamiab on the 14th instant. Telegraphing the next day he reports the weather as still warm and fair, but threatening to break. The work of demarcation has progressed quickly and the Boundary pillars were all but completed when the telegram was despatched.

The Prime Minister of Nepal is expected to reach Calcutta on the morning of the 30th instant.

The Prime Minister of Nepal who is expected to reach Calcutta on the morning of the 30th instant, will be accompanied by one Maharani, two Generals, 12 other officers, about 100 infantry, and followers, making in all one hundred and seventy five persons.

Information has been received through the Commissioner of Peshawar of a raid having been committed on the night of the 9th instant by the followers of Hashim Ali, a Hassanzai Khan, on the hamlet of Odigram near Ghamian in Agror. Two men are reported to have been murdered and two kidnaped. It appears that the raid was committed in retaliation for the arrest of a man who is now under trial for murder in connection with another raid.

Large numbers of labourers (5000 or 6000), mostly Hazaras and Ghilzais, have collected near the Khojkhak Pass to work on the military road and the Khwaja Anran railway extension. A Pioneer Regiment may be employed on the work in the spring. The Political Agent in Peshawar started on the 24th instant to go to the Khojkhak, but he was stopped by a heavy snow-storm and severe weather.

H. H. the Gackwar is expected to leave Brindisi on the 9th February.—Press Commissioner.

At Shillong, they celebrated the Saraswati Puja. The holy Ganges water and Ganges earth were specially brought up there for the occasion by Parcel Post. And the Shondesh and Tilakhaja—by steam despatch, we suppose? What is a Puja without the former delicacy? And the latter is the speciality of the worship of Wisdom. Has Civilisation made such progress at Shillong as to produce these there? Upper India, we fear, still wants these marks of refinement.

THE Court Martial on the Private at Poona, who had a simple altercation with a Lance Corporal who called him lazy and was d—d in return and told to do the work himself, has sentenced the offender to a year's imprisonment with hard labour, and to be discharged with ignominy from Her Majesty's Service. Talk of justice tempered with mercy! Here is justice with a vengeance! Well may the People's Friend be astonished that His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief of Bombay has confirmed the sentence! But then our contemporary forgets the old doctrine that what in the captain is choleric word is in the common soldier rank offence.

WE have received An Epitome of Clarke's Geography by Babu Charu Charan Mookerjee. The author is one of the Mookerjee Zemindars of Mozufferpore, who have established the Mookerjee seminary there, and who certainly deserve credit and encouragement in the new line of activity. The pamphlet is, of course, designed for students preparing for the Entrance Examination, and that it does not err on the side of brevity one is prepared to expect by the preface, in which it is said, rather naively, that there are many things in Mr. Clarke's excellent work which it is "impossible for boys to get by heart." The value of Mr. Clarke's book lies, however, in its copiousness, and surely it would be more valuable if it were more copious. But cui bono, so far as schoolboys are concerned? They must get by heart. The University system has brought them to that pass, and so long as this is the case, epitomes and abstracts shall have their day. Babu Charu Charan appears to have executed his task with care, and his work will prove useful to students by its arrangement and its condensed form.

NOTES AND LEADERETTES.

WE have always noted with pleasure the great strides which the Central Provinces are making in the race of political progress. This journal has devoted its attention to the affairs of that province with an especial interest, and it is with unfeigned pleasure that we have had proofs of its growing advancement multiplying upon us. The latest of such proofs is presented in the shape of an unusually able memorial which has been submitted by the Nagpore Malguzars' Association to the Chief Commissioner against the Patwari system. Indeed, the memorial is written and argued with such courage—there is so little of mincing matters, and everything is put so strongly and plainly—that one is almost led to suspect its indigenous authorship. Even, however, if it owed the excellence of its execution to European direction, that was nothing to be ashamed of. It is no small thing in our statu pupillari to know where to look for better guidance. It is proof of sound intelligence and true self-respect. The Patwari system is an anomaly, the officers being servants of two masters, and of course faithful to none. The recent proposition of increasing the Patwari Cess from Rs. 3 2 to 6 per cent. is the occasion of the present memorial, but a strong case has been made out for sweeping away the system altogether. It is of recent introduction, having been unknown to the Maharatta regime, and whatever its utility in the earlier stages of the British sovereignty, the Malguzars are now advancing in education and enlightenment to an extent to justify their being left to the unhampered management of their own affairs. The highest Revenue authorities with practical knowledge of the province, men like Sir Charles Bernard and Mr. Harry Rivett-Carnac, have put on record opinions on the subject which go to show that the system does more harm than good, and that it would be well to revert to the old Maharatta practice of resting the whole responsibility on the Malguzars. The political value of such a policy is thus set forth in the memorial :

"That the advantages accruing from placing the responsibility of the preparation and submission of the village papers solely and entirely on the village proprietors would in the long run, provided the plan was fairly tried and fostered, prove of incalculable benefit to the county at large in that it would be an incentive to the agricultural population to exert themselves and to take an active, intelligent, and earnest interest in their own affairs, instead of being dependent on the Patwari 'dry nurse.'"

In another place, they condemn it as "the incubus of the Patwari 'dry nurse' and 'go-between'" which, if the Government cared to encourage and foster, the moral revolution which is taking place amongst the landed proprietors would be swept away without hesitation.

Et tu Brute? It was, we believe, the all-accomplished Grant Duff who introduced the custom of historiographing the official tours of the Governor. There ought certainly to be a diary kept of such journeys and inspections by one of the staff, and a copy, in part if not whole, ought to be given for record and guidance to the Government. But the head of the administration ought not to be encouraged to literary dissipation at the expense of the state. There are obvious objections to the publication or even the record of Zeus's remarks on men and things. An Indian ruler may snatch a daily half hour or a full to keep a journal for regular transmission to his family or as a legacy to his children. The Marquess of Hastings left such a record, and it is a better vindication of his Lordship and more acceptable to the historian than all the official minutes of the administration or the volumes of Prinsep. But as a state paper it would have been an awkward anomaly, perhaps, a nuisance and a danger. Be that as it may, it has been an institution down South for the Governor to chronicle his tour as much as for him to undertake it; and not only so, but also to publish the account. Such is the statesmanship in the Benighted Presidency! This easy-going dieticianism is government in Madras! To complete the thing, the account is not published through the official organ of Government in the country, but appears in the Times!

The latter is a notable innovation, but it is gaining ground, and is by no means confined to Madras. Every body affects the Times. Our rulers are apparently growing ashamed of us. Any Indian magnate, who has a tolerably high opinion of himself, who has anything to communicate, flies to London, and first tries the Times. And thus the great journal is bribed to discover heroes and statesmen and successful administrators in India to the astonishment of their valets and neighbours! This is too bad. It may be true that there is no love lost between us and many of our Queen-Empress's agents. But so long as the official relation continues, there ought to be at least a show of mutual courtesy. This sort of treatment of the Indian community, is not only not fair, it is scarcely decent. If they must have the pat on the back of the London Press, let them bide their time, or, at any rate, make use of their own personal and their friends' influence; they must not sell Indian state news or papers, or the prior use thereof for attaining their fond object.

We see the People's Friend, which rarely misses a point, complaining, "What made our excellent Governor send the account of his last tour first to the English Press for publication? Is not Madras more interested in his work, official or otherwise, than the city of London? We are perplexed to explain the move. The chronicle is now given to the local Press after all its interest has passed by its appearance in the English journals."

There is no real perplexity in the matter; that is only a courteous vehicle for a just reproof. But really, if any Indian Governor might be expected to be above the weakness, it would be the ruler of Madras. His hearty simplicity seemed inconsistent with this sort of pettifoggery or puerility.

Let our leading brethren take care! Formerly, a paragraph in the Pioneer or a leaderette in the Englishman or a leader in the Times of Bombay or Madras, would have satisfied almost any ambition. Nothing short of a puff from the Thunderer will now do.

Ex Oriente lux. It is reported from Chittagong:—

"That on the 13th instant, Srimai Bidhu Mukhi, daughter of a Mukteary, Babu Juggodish Chuckerbuty, an inhabitant of Gogbaria in Thanna Putya, submitted a petition to Mr. Douglas, the Magistrate, requesting to set aside the proposal of her father to get her married to a Brahmin of low blood, residing in a village, called Kailash, in Satkama, with the expectation of getting Rs. 700 from the bridegroom. The case having been made over to the file of the Deputy Magistrate named Gobiind Babu, the case was decided in favor of the lady complainant."

While in the most advanced capital of the Empire, the reformers are fighting their battle over the grievances of a brave daughter of the carpenters, here, in the other corner of the Continent in the backwoods of Chittagong, appears a veritable young Brahmani her own mistress and champion of her sex to take the obstinate old bull of Hindu Conservatism by the horns. This is the beginning of the end. And even from the point of view of truly liberal conservatism and rational orthodoxy, it is not a bad beginning. 'It is the first sign of the coming Revolution. The old order changeth, giving place to new. The most selfish of us must learn to treat his womankind with respect, when Hindu daughters have commenced to assert their rights.

Another light nearer home comes from the so-called Benighted!

Mahamahopadhyaya Sri Krishna Thatha Charya of Conjevaram has given as his opinion that a Hindu can be readmitted into caste and society, on his undergoing certain penance, for crossing the seas, and accordingly Mr. S. B. Ramaswami Iyengar of Mysore, Barrister-at-law, having submitted to the ordeal, has been accepted of his caste fellows.

WHAT is there, we wonder, in the way of the Bengal Government redressing the loss suffered by many thousands of its subjects in the district of Jehanabad, from the breach at Jankuli in the Damooda Embankment? The yearly recurring loss of human life and of cattle is not inconsiderable, while the loss of crops and of house-property in one particular year has been roughly estimated at ten lakhs and ten thousand rupees respectively. It is really a dreadful state of things which cannot be too promptly remedied. So long ago, however, as March 1886, a representation was made on the subject by the people to the late Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, and subsequently reminders have been addressed without apparently any effect. What can be the matter?

THE latest liberality of the Bengal Government is the grant of Rs. 5 allowances to the Bistupur Rajas. These payments are becoming small by degrees and beautifully less at every decease. The Rajas must be thankful that their claim is still recognised. Let the sons prepare for the aliquots of Her Majesty's silver currency.

THE Southern Division Magistrate is entitled to the thanks of the poor respectable who abound in our community, for trying to keep the fraternity of gariwans straight. The other day, Mr. Reily fined a hackney carriage driver Rs. 20, for falsely prosecuting Captain Fisher, commander of the B. S. Albyn, for non-payment of Rs. 3-12 fare. The case against the Captain went ex-parte, the prosecutor being absent. The Captain complained that the gariwan had been on board his vessel and used provoking language. The Magistrate ordered the fine as compensation to the Captain, who wished it, when realised, to be placed in the poor-box. It is said in the report of the morning press, that the prosecuting hackney driver was in Court, but seeing the sturdy sailor in attendance with witnesses, thought it prudent to slink back. This is a well-known form of harassment and extortion. Honest people are first threatened with the Police or Small Cause Court. If they submit to terms to escape the annoyance and indignity, well and good. If not, a summons is easily obtained against them which usually conquers their reluctance to pay for nothing. If they do not appear, to answer the complaint, the cause is decreed against them with costs. If they appear, the plaintiff may be non est, or he may be there to provoke his victim with a pack of lies and lying accomplices. It is just possible these may deceive the bench. But suppose you win, what then? You have lost time and money, and, last not least, temper. It is these practices which give meaning to Mr. Reily's apparently extraordinary action of mulcting a cab man by (say) 40 shillings for claiming 7s. 6d. from a "fare."

TALK of Oriental vanity? Orientalism pure is modesty before the bastard Orientalism of some of the Southern Europeans, at home or abroad. The old travellers Linschoten and others notice the pride of pedigree of the Indo-Portuguese, and the passion for dress and jewellery of their women. These characteristics may be traced to this day. The great European names which are dishonored by the underserving—names which have lost their signification by being held by the lowest—may be referred to this fact. But vanity of an extravagant nomenclature seems a Lusitanian weakness through all time at home as well as abroad. The Anglo-Indians who sneer at the length of Hindu, Mussulman, or Chinese personal names, seem imperfectly acquainted with the curiosities nearer home. As a matter of fact, they are guilty of the injustice to give us Eastern dogs a bad name and hang us. They have not the knowledge nor the patience to distinguish our names from our straggling titles. They take the whole for a proper name and hasten to abuse us roundly for our barbarism. As a matter of fact, Oriental names are short if not sweet to English taste—Chinese names are often monosyllabic, as Kung, the designation of the famous statesman of the Blood Imperial. In Europe, on the contrary, the higher the pedigree of a man and wider his aristocratic connections, the more voluminous is apt to be his appellation—the longer the string of names he bears. Strictly speaking, perhaps we should say he owns rather than bears, so far at least as the more practical nations are concerned. For etiquette imposes no burden on them. The chief territorial designation or title of nobility alone is borne and suffices for use and identification—the personal name or names and rest of the territorial and titular distinctions are virtually suppressed or relegated to the safe keeping of Burke and Lodge. Not so in the South-Western Peninsula of pomposity. There the high-born Hidalgo or Don are still, in these practical days, doomed to the needless Alexanderine of a name that, like a wounded snake, drags its slow length along.

These reflections are suggested by the appointment of a new officer to the highest judicial office in the Indian possessions of Portugal. On the retirement of the last incumbent, a gentleman has been appointed glorying in a mile of a name. The Honorable Mr. Justice Jose Joaquim Borges de Azavedo Ennes has been gazetted Chief Justice and President of the Supreme Court of Portuguese India. If his acquirements and merits bear any proportion to the volume of his name, he must be an acquisition indeed, though Portuguese India might be too limited a place for the play of such a soul—or name. If the present empire of Portugal in India can not hold a candle to the glory of the British Indian possessions, the nominal grandeur of the Portuguese High Court of Judicature beats the British judiciary hollow. The Chief Justice of Upper India has a name of Chinese simplicity. Our Chief of Lower Bengal rejoices in a worthy polysyllabic appellation 3+2=5. As far as surname is concerned, he beats his very Hindu colleagues hollow. Ghose is a farthing rush-light—Mitter is a tallow candle—to the cumulative effulgence of Petheram. In Christian name, however, strange as it may sound, the Christian is no match for either of his Hindu colleagues.

IN Germany, they have introduced in the Reichstag two Bills, one proposing changes in the constitution of the Landwehr and the other for a loan of 280 million marks to carry out the changes.

FOR theft of luggage on the Jubbulpur platform, Mr. Justice Straight of the Allahabad High Court has sentenced a fitter Adolphus Woods of the Nagpur Railway, to two years' imprisonment.

To meet the Burma drain on the Indian exchequer, Government have added three strings to their fiscal bow. They have imposed the Income Tax, raised the salt duty by 25 per cent. and again mean to make petroleum dutiable by an ad valorem of 5 per cent. The official explanation for the last increase in revenue is the deterioration of Rs. 1,420,000 on the last Budget estimate, made up of

Exchange	720,000

SATURDAY, JANUARY 28, 1888.

THE TOWN CORPORATION IN COUNCIL.

A DECADE of the elective municipal franchise in Calcutta, has wrought quite a revolution in the attitude originally held towards the new system. What a change has come over the spirit of the dream! The ablest and best-informed member of the vernacular political press in Bengal, the Nababibhakar and Sadharani, has lately reminded the public of the genesis of the municipal franchise in Calcutta, and recounted the story of the struggle, in which the constitution of the present Corporation had its birth. And what a strange history it all now appears! Without a breach of confidence, we may now say that, in the consultations which we had with Sir Richard Temple and Sir Steuart Hogg on the chances of an elective constitution for the Calcutta municipality, it was no light task we had to dissipate the strong misgivings in the official mind as to how far the franchise which was proposed to be offered, would be acceptable to the citizens. The British Indian Association swore by the system of State nomination, and persistently opposed, through their organ, the Hindoo Patriot, the very idea of a popular constitution. Nor was the attitude of the Anglo-Indian community a whit more encouraging. The Indian League, however, stood to its guns, and prevailed in the end. Its views and calculations have been remarkably justified by the event. To Sir Steuart Hogg's anxious fears from the threatened abstention of respectable natives, we opposed our confident faith that all would come right on the Bill becoming law. As to the European community, we left Sir Steuart as the best judge. The Bill was passed, and there was immediately a change of front on the part of the native oppositionists. Baboo Kristodas Pal, the soul and guiding genius of the British Indian Association, the leader of the Justices of the Peace, constituting, under the former law, the Town Corporation, who, as a leading member of the Bengal legislature, had voted against constitutional reform, hastened from his final defeat to call a private meeting of his political associates and followers to consult on the next move. They were furious, but he was for putting the best face upon the matter. They remembered their angry protestations—their loudly expressed horror of descending to be their inferiors' deputies, or to sit with them as Government nominees. They were for maintaining a sullen attitude of discontent as the most dignified course. He reasoned with them on the futility of it, and reminded them of its consequence to themselves. Their power and influence in the metropolis would be at an end. He was for accepting the situation and taking as much advantage of the new law as they could. The wiser counsel prevailed in the end. The Hindoo Patriot at once sang truce, and, obedient to its call, the entire phalanx gradually drew in their horns, only with one notable exception. It was not without a show of fight that a few gave in at last. In one case a well-known fellow-townsmen disclaimed so much as to register himself as a voter, and now he is one of the prominent of the elected Commissioners. Only one man retired, and he could afford to do, Fortune having marked him for her own and paved the way to a higher ambition. But even he has since registered himself. The persistence of the Anglo-Indian community was of a more determined kind, but at every succeeding election it has shown signs of weariness, till at the present moment the cry is, there is not enough of European representation in the councils of the Town corporation.

The constitutional portion of the Amended Municipal Bill, is, we take it, framed in special deference to the demand of the Anglo-Indian community for more adequate representation. Calcutta is a European city, even more than a native town, and owes its position and prosperity to European influence. It is indeed a fairly debatable question as to which community—the native owners of the land and house property, forming with the poorer classes the bulk of the permanent population, or the handful of foreign nationalities to whose temporary residence and business it is indebted for its wealth and comfort—should have a preponderating voice in the administration of the municipal affairs. Our own writers and speakers are apt to forget the other side of the shield. But it were vain to ignore the fact, and for our own best interests it were well to recognise it and seek to give our European fellow-citizens their due weight and pin them to their share of responsibility. The main factor in the matter, after Government and bound up with it, is the great influence over the fortunes of the city exercised by European wealth and enterprise—greater, indeed, than what is due to the fact of its being the capital of the Province as well as the Empire. It is European commerce, in the main, which has made Calcutta what it is. Looking at the appearance of the city also, one cannot but attribute its beauty and its comfort to the initiative of European design. It is easy to imagine what Calcutta would look like if its Municipal government were not dominated in the past by European influence—how “cribbed, cabined and confined” would be all its avenues and alleys, and altogether uncomfortable as a residence for those foreigners to whom it owes most for the value of its property and its multifarious occupations and earnings. It is therefore with much genuine sympathy that we view any proposals for bringing to bear on the Municipal administration of Calcutta the just influence of the class who are the architects of its greatness. These must live in comfort to live at all. The predominance of native ideas—the resistance of abstract notions of native rights of property and of extravagant social and religious rights—must give way to the only practical wisdom which has achieved such marvellous results in the past.

Partial as we are to the just predominance of the European influence in the Calcutta Corporation, we must confess we are not prepared to accept the almost revolutionary method by which Sir Henry Harrison proposes, in the present Bill, to secure that predominance. The elective system has no doubt its weak points. With all the good it has achieved in this city, it has not succeeded in securing the return on the whole of the best representatives of the people. No one perhaps feels this more than Sir Henry Harrison himself. At times it seemed as if a fiasco or a discreditable contretemps was prevented only by the Chairman's tact and temper. By all means, let the constitution be re-adjusted so as to secure the representation of the best talents, but the system of plurality of votes is too drastic and reactionary for this object. It cannot fail to put back the clock of progress, and we cannot too strongly urge the Bengal Council to ponder the consequences of a violent departure.

To enable the reader to understand the exact nature of the change in contemplation, we give the provision in extenso. The Sections are:—

“10. A person qualified to vote under clause (b) of section 8 in respect of any house or land in any ward, valued at Rs. 300 or upwards, shall be entitled to vote according to the following scale:—

If the aggregate annual value of all the premises owned by him in the ward is not less than—

Rs.	1 additional vote.
600	1 additional vote.
1,000	2 " votes.
1,500	3 " "
2,000	4 " "
2,500	5 " "
3,000	6 " "
3,500	7 " "
4,000	8 " "
4,500	9 " "
5,000	10 " "

“11. A person qualified to vote under clause (c) of section 8 as occupier of a house or houses in any ward, valued at Rs. 300 or upwards, shall be entitled to vote according to the following scale:—

If the aggregate annual value of all the houses occupied by him in the ward is not less than—

Rs.	1 additional vote.
600	1 additional vote.
1,000	2 " votes.
1,500	3 " "
2,000	4 " "
2,500	5 " "
3,000	6 " "
3,500	7 " "
4,000	8 " "
4,500	9 " "
5,000	10 " "

A person living in his own house is entitled to the votes assigned to him as owner as well as to those assigned to him as occupier.

“12. A person qualified to vote under clause (d) of section 8 shall be entitled, if he holds a license under class IV of the third Schedule to as many votes as there are Commissioners to be elected, if in class III to one more vote, if in class II to two more votes, and if in class I to three more votes.

A person may give as many votes as he is entitled to under clauses (b), (c), and (d) of section 8 combined, up to a maximum of 10 additional votes in any one ward, but under no circumstances shall any person give more than 12 votes in any one ward, or 11 votes when there is only one Commissioner to be elected.”

The majority of the Select Committee quote some English precedents in support of these provisions in their report, as follow:—

“It has been the rule in England to recognise the plural vote in measures of local self-government. In the Parish Vestries as constituted by 53 Geo. III, c. 69, and 59 Geo. III, c. 12 and c. 85, the rate-payers can give from one to six votes, a vote being given for every £25 of rating. In the most important unit of local self-government, the Union as constituted by the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, the governing body consists of the resident Justices, who are nominated by the Government, and of guardians elected by the rate-payers; one vote in the election of guardians is given for every £50 of rating up to a maximum of six votes. Similarly in the urban districts, constituted local government districts under the Public Health Act of 1875, the members of the Board are elected by owners and rate-payers, plural votes up to a maximum of six votes being allowed: one vote for every £50 of rating.

It appears, therefore, that whether the practice hitherto obtaining in Calcutta is looked to, or English legislation, there is ample precedent for allowing plural votes; but the Committee base their decision far more on the intrinsic equity of the principle and its extreme importance in the best interests of a city such as Calcutta. It is difficult to conceive that it can be seriously contended that a person who just pays

Rs. 25 is entitled to an equal voice in the election of the Commissioners with the large commercial houses which are the chief factors in the prosperity of the town, or that a landlord of many of the largest and most heavily-rated houses in the town ought to have his vote balanced by that of a clerk in an office living in a house rented at Rs. 25 to Rs. 30 a month. Although the effect of this proposal will obviously be to assist the European community somewhat in election contests, as they on the average live in much more heavily rated houses than the native rate-payers, the Committee do not consider that it will make any very material difference in the nationality of the Corporation; nor do they mainly adopt it on that ground. In general the wealthier Europeans will be voting in the same ward with the poorer Europeans, and the wealthier natives with the poorer natives; but the Committee consider that the quality of the persons who will become candidates for election will be everywhere improved. If the one-man-one-vote principle is adopted, the Committee consider it certain that as the poorer rate-payers who will everywhere be the majority, learn to use their power, the status of those who present themselves for election will gradually but inevitably decline; while if wealth is given its due weight, better and more influential persons will be willing to offer themselves for election. The Committee hope that on fuller consideration the Association will see that the remedy which they suggest would be even worse than the disease, and would lead to precisely the opposite result to that which they wish to attain."

This is handing over the government of the town affairs to the hands of the plutocracy, and mainly of the European plutocracy. With all our confidence in European guidance, we must confess to the danger of making it unquestionable master of the situation. The Europeans in Calcutta are at best but birds of passage. They are constitutionally apt to take fire at an idea—to be carried away by a panic. A lady in high life falls ill and anon a cry is raised for extravagant schemes of sanitary improvement which could only be carried out by leaving heavy burdens on the shoulders of posterity. At one time the sanitary rage is against vegetation, till orchards are denuded of their valuable growth of years' fostering care, and as the years pass, the pendulum has oscillated to the other extreme, and we have these carbon-exhaling enemies of life crowded in all manner of places, till they invade the bed chamber itself. The impulsiveness of the European mind is in marked contrast with the stolid passivity of our countrymen. But though the natives are slow, they are sure. They are neither obstinate nor stupid. They are eminently docile—quick to learn. Perhaps, there is no race of man so amenable to reason. They are not the same that they were fifty years back, and in another dozen years they will be still better. The problem in municipal, as in national representation, is to find out the men.

✕ LOCAL SELF-GOVERNMENT.

A LAY SERMON TO THE NEW REPRESENTATIVES.

In another few days, the elected and appointed Municipal Commissioners in the country—those who owe their office to the people's choice or the confidence of Government—will proceed to exercise their valued right of electing the Chairman and Vice-Chairman. On the last occasion, in not a few cases, their predecessors had waived to exercise this franchise in favor of the Government initiative. Let no similar blunder be made now, unless there be any grave exceptional necessity for it. The non-official chairmanship is the most valuable part of the system. Upon that hangs the life of Local Self-Government. The liberal European press has its eyes on how our countrymen show their appreciation of the boon. We have always held, and often had occasion to express, the views which, in Friday week's issue of the Statesman, our contemporary has seasonably published on the subject of municipal administration. Nothing can be more true than that the quarrels and dissensions, which have unfortunately marked the conduct of not a few municipalities, should not be turned to political capital and any of several arguments whatever against the new system of Local Self-Government. They are but an inevitable stage through which it must pass, and effectively train itself for better things. That stage was not unknown in England, and Local-Self-Government there, old as it is, is not still free from some of the incidents at which our wise-acres stand aghast, and significantly shake their heads. Indeed, as our contemporary observes with true insight, the outbreak of faction itself is a proof of the vitality of the elective franchise, and, if the system is of value, chiefly as an educational instrument, it should not be hurriedly laid aside from impatience at what must be the necessary incidents of the early stage of every educational movement. Holding this view as we do, we must emphatically call on our countrymen to show their appreciation of the right they have received by sticking to the non-official régime. In those municipalities, where, on the last occasion, from faint-heartedness, they omitted to trust themselves to non-official Chairmen, let them retrieve their ground now. Disorders will happen in the best regulated households, and order is then only stable when it evolves itself out of chaos. Let them take to heart the lessons taught by history, and they will find in the words of the poet-laureate,

All the past of Time reveals,

A Bridal Dawn of thunder-peals,

Whenever Thought hath wedded Fact.

There has never been any durable progress but as the result of a struggle—at the expense of persecution and suffering. The reformer's path has never lain through roses, and, as in nature, so in politics, a storm only leads to a lasting calm. Viewed from this point of view, the factions which have raged in our Municipal Councils, ought not to be any surprise, or viewed with any apprehension. Worse things might take place without disturbing our equanimity. Evil as they are, have they not their uses in the economy of life? have they not already taught experiences of value? The worst of them is where they had a personal origin, but man never rises to a conception of public duties except through the narrow limited notions of personal interest. Altogether, there is no reason for faint-heartedness, and we trust the present occasion will not find our local bodies wanting in their duty.

Our faith in Local-Self-Government is the more confirmed by one redeeming fact. Notwithstanding personal differences and faction-fights, the cause of municipal improvement has not suffered anywhere. On the contrary, from all the information available to us, the municipalities appear to have made wonderful strides of progress, and the work of the last three years favorably compares with that achieved under the official régime in the past years. In this, the result has only been a repetition of what has happened in Calcutta during the operation of the elective system. No better authority than Sir Henry Harrison could be cited for speaking on this point. Sir Henry is not blind to the weak points of the elective system. Indeed, it is in his very condemnation of the parochial spirit induced by that system that he is bound to bear unequivocal testimony to the good in detail that it has at the same time done in the shape of town improvements. In one of his speeches in Council, in referring the Calcutta Amended Municipal Bill to the Select Committee, he said:—

"One objection he had to the present system of election was that its tendency was to give just the same type of men for most of the wards. In each case the ward elected the same type of Commissioner, some one who would give attention to its affairs. Hence the large amount of attention which was now given to the small wants of the inhabitants. In that respect he must say that the amount of good work done by the Corporation had been enormous. They were always being plied with suggestions for small improvements, which affected perhaps the convenience of a few hundred persons residing in the ward, such as making a path here, rounding off an awkward corner there, constructing a bathing platform in a third place, and small matters of that kind. The local convenience of the inhabitants had been studied a great deal, and as the result, it was hardly too much to say that various parts of Calcutta had in that way been improved in the course of the last few years to such an extent that the value of land had been at least doubled. Whilst on the one hand the Commissioners had done what their constituents expected them to do, viz., look after their own small wants, there was, he feared, no doubt that the spirit of the Corporation had been too parochial. That had been the difficulty. If a person had studied the constitution of the municipality scientifically, a priori, he would have anticipated the very defect which experience had revealed, viz., that whereas all small matters of local interest would receive the greatest possible attention and the greatest possible encouragement, on the other hand the larger requirements of the town would not receive equal attention. That was a result which must be expected if the Council could not see their way to get men to represent anything but small local areas, who would mainly look after their own local interests, and when elected would consider that they best discharged their duties by looking to the special wants of their wards. He at one time suggested that the town should be divided into larger wards, with a larger number of members to each ward. This suggestion met with but little support. It was curious to see how the same view prevailed in other places. In Bombay, where they had larger wards, the executive were most anxious to retain them in the new Bill; but one of the recommendations of the Corporation was to divide the town into smaller wards, so that each Commissioner should represent the wants of a small body. That showed a natural feeling that they preferred to have more clearly defined wants of small bodies to represent, and be brought nearer their constituents—a very natural wish and very good up to a certain point. It showed the same feeling there also on the part of the officers of the Corporation, who wished to obtain Commissioners with wider and broader views. Probably or possibly something between the two might be done which would be an improvement—a certain number of members to represent local wants and a certain number to represent metropolitan wants. This was a matter on which it was impossible for him to do more than to express a general opinion, and he presumed the Select Committee would take care to consider whether any improvement could be made, or whether, looking at all the difficulties and objections to any other course, they would think it best to leave the constitution of the Corporation as it was at present framed."

The above observations have a general importance, and may well be pondered by members of our country municipalities. Our present object, however, in referring to them, is to show that the parochial spirit which is at the bottom of much of the dissensions which have arisen in the mofussil municipalities, is not an unmixed evil. It has its good side too. These municipalities have, like the metropolis, benefited from the closer local attention to details brought to bear upon their affairs by the elected representatives. They have likewise been advanced in matters of broad general interest under the non-official system, which, in respect of local knowledge and patriotic feeling, must always have an advantage over official administrators.

MOKANNA UNMASKED—BY HIMSELF.

SIR LEPHEL GRIFFIN must look to his laurels. He has been cast into the shade by a greater ogre. The Avatar of the hour is a Mahomedan. Sir Syed Ahmed Khan has blown his counterblast to the Congress. By a single speech, the new Prophet, though an old enough man, has constituted himself a nine days' wonder. That Lucknow speech was studiously acrimonious. It has failed, however, of its purpose—it has not provoked an acrimonious retort from the Bengali press. The tirade against the National Congress and the Bengalis, has been received with the proper attitude—that of dignified forbearance. Therein is sore disappointment to the eager assailant. Not that he will go without his kudos from his Anglo-Indian friends, whom he evidently wants to please. His oration will be hailed in particular political circles, here and at home, and not a little augment, if possible, the popularity and reputation which he already enjoys. And, indeed, it is no wonder the words of a man of the hon'ble Syed's position and fame should command attention and respect. But if the truth must be told, Sir Syed Ahmed Khan has been a much over-rated man. We have no disposition to withhold him his due. He is possessed of great natural parts, which have been embellished by Oriental culture, as well as strengthened by great practical experience of men and things. But after giving him his due, and even more than his due, we must say he has never had the intellectual equipment for the arena of speculative politics. Indeed, politics has never been his line. The duties of a judicial officer in the N. W. Provinces, did not give full occupation to his active mind, and so he commenced authorship. It is only as a practical educationist, however, that, to the knowledge of the European and English-speaking public, he has held a position of some eminence in the ranks of Indian notabilities. His Alighur Institute is at once the monument of his energy and the stepping stone to his ambition. But a successful educationist or even an indifferent author, who aspires to be a reformer, is not necessarily qualified for the rôle of a politician. The initial outfit in knowledge and thought for the business of practical politics, not to speak of literature, even the warmest admirers of the hon'ble gentleman would not claim for him. And the consequence is what might be expected. Sir Syed Ahmed Khan has continually been tempted to what in his ignorance he conceived to be an easy rôle, but he has never dabbled in political discussions without presenting a sorry figure. He has always been fascinated by the notions in vogue—the idea of the hour. His sensitiveness to all the chances and changes of the political thermometer—the gusto with which he has always taken up every prevailing cry—his floating with the current of opinion—all betray not only original defect of education, but inherent inaptitude for grave problems of statecraft.

Thus we find him rapt in wild admiration of everything English, the moment he sets foot on English soil. Not of course that the sights and scenes to be met with in that land—its institutions and comforts—are not enough to extort admiration, but one having previous knowledge of the country and accustomed to thought, would be more soberly impressed, and be far from bursting forth into revelations of extravagant zeal.

Consistency of opinion can hardly be the effect of such preparation. In his present diatribe against Bengalis, Sir Ahmed has betrayed wonderful forgetfulness of his past attitude towards that devoted people. In his visit to Lahore, in 1884, he paid a glowing compliment to the Bengalis, calling them the pioneers of Indian progress, the lachet of whose shoes the other Indian races were not able to unloosen. But the Bengalis have now fallen into disfavor with a class of Indian society and the fashion has set in of playing off one race against another. Nothing so opportune now, therefore, as to fall savagely foul of them, without heeding the glaring inconsistency involved in the transition. But the most extraordinary thing in the antecedents of this respectable old fogey is that he commenced as an ardent political reformer. The National Congress itself is only now wearing with triumph his cast off weapons. Before many of our agitators were born, the Syed had fought the battle for native representation in the legislature. He had even talked of a Parliament in India. It would be a curiosity to unearth his pamphlet. That we are not talking nonsense, we call the present Lieutenant-Governor of the N. W. Provinces to witness—who, in his junior Civilian days, gave his friend the honors of an English translation. And now the successful weather-cock turns his back on his nobler self, for the purpose of reviling the very Bengalis who taught him his political primer. At any rate, Sir Ahmed cannot complain, if those whom he has so furiously denounced should appeal from Philip drunk to Philip sober, and quote chapter and verse to convict him out of his own mouth.

We have made the above observations with the object that undue importance should not be attached to the vaticinations of a seer who is not certain of his own mind for any length of time. Syed Ahmed is but a practical educationist, and whatever his claims to respect as such, he has no right to pose in the higher character of a politician. He has achieved the object he had in making his Lucknow speech—notoriety. His speech is the great topic of the day, but beyond that it should command no serious attention.

It is perhaps as well that the Syed has burst from his disguise. Nobody who knew anything, mistook who it was that inspired the fulminations of Mr. Beck. The veiled prophet of Khorasan has now thrown off his mask, and it is as well we should calculate him as an open enemy and an enemy of every good cause. His opposition itself may, however, be taken as the surest test of a righteous cause, and it is only when that cause has succeeded that the Syed may be expected to come round. But the importance of anything coming this quarter should not be exaggerated. The plain fact is the Syed should not be regarded as a representative of Islam. This may not be so generally known, but he is no Mussulman. With his thirst for notoriety, he proclaimed himself a Wahabi, but, for some years past, he has abandoned the last shreds of the faith, and at the present moment, there is not a good Mussulman in all India who does not revile and curse him.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

SATYABALA V. HARIDAS.

I have often heard it said that there is but one law in the world, big bones and large muscles rule, the weak go to the wall. It is something to find that for once the law in question has been made a dead letter. The suit of Satya Bala Dabi V. Hari Das Roy, which was a nine days' wonder during the last few months, a short account of which appeared in a recent issue of Rev., leads me to the above remark. Baboo Hari Das must be said to have been in the paradise of fools in supposing that he would be able to catch an old bird like the veteran Sub-Judge of Nuddea with chaff: the bruised reed has not been broken, on the contrary, the All-merciful has tempered the wind to the shorn lamb. For not only has Mr. Roy been called upon to disgorge the estate of his young widowed cousin-in-law, valued at a lac and a half and sold for Rs. 3,400, but has had to be out of pocket to the extent of Rs. 1,500. Verily he went for wool but has come home shorn. For, seeing that the Zemindars of Santipur are now only a wreck of their former selves, Baboo Hari Das can't afford to laugh off the loss as a mere flea bite. Hari Baboo, though he has lost the case, has, however, this consolation left that he has left no stone unturned to compass his ends. A good round sum was offered to the good Samaritan who took up the cause of Satya Bala, to induce him to leave her in the lurch, and even threats were held out, but he was a veritable knight-errant sans peur et sans reproche, and true blue, you know, will never stain. Now that the case has been finally disposed of, the order of the Sub-Judge not being appealable, it may naturally be expected that Baboo Hari Das will let bygones be bygones and make up with his cousin-in-law, inasmuch as he has reversionary interest in her property. But no, he is determined to kill the hen that lays the golden egg, and will fight out the quarrel like the Kilkenny cats who fought so fiercely that, when the battle was over, the tail of each was left.

Dame rumour has it that as soon as a short account of this unfortunate case appeared in your journal, Baboo Hari Das sent word to you, through a sturdy Vakil, that unless you surrendered at discretion on or before a certain date, he would meet you at Philippi. The ides of March have however come and gone, but you are not yet an inmate of the Presidency Jail. The impudence of an irreverent legal vulture hovering over a literary leviathan with a view to have a brush with the latter, is no less phenomenal than that of the gnat in the fable who was settled on the horn of a bull and inquired of the latter if he would like him to go. You, Mr. editor, are no respecter of persons and are nothing if not critical, and, as such, are a positive nuisance. In spite of the oft repeated cant of "not men but measures," you omit no opportunity of mercilessly exposing our big folks, men who are saints abroad and devils at home, but who pass muster as gentlemen, every inch of them, simply because distance lends enchantment to the view. "Could great men thunder as Jove himself does," you would have to shut up shop.

NO RESPECTER OF PERSONS.

AN EXPLANATION.

SIR,—A word of explanation about the mistakes that unfortunately crept in my last letter will suffice. It was written from my dictation by a school boy and sent by mistake without correction. Surely it was very uncharitable on your part to bring it out without correcting the mistakes.

A pedant would harp on the rules of orthography and syntax which every school boy gets by heart. But those who have escaped from the pedagogue's ferular can not bear to be corrected for not crossing their i's and dotting their j's.

Lastly, with great respect for your love of grammar and idiom, I would humbly remind you that fine feathers do not always indicate fine birds and good grammar and idiom (however useful in other respects) are no excuse for nonsense in writing.

Your old (not false to be sure) Friend,
S. BOSE.

Holloway's Pills.—Nervous irritability.—No part of the human machine requires more constant supervision than the nervous system—for upon it our health—and even life—depends. These Pills strengthen the nerves, and are the safest general purifiers of the blood. Nausea, headache, giddiness, numbness, and mental apathy yield to them. They dispatch in a summary manner those distressing dyspeptic symptoms, stomachic pains, fulness at the pit of the stomach, abdominal distension, and regulate alike capricious appetites and confined bowels—the commonly accompanying signs of defective or diminished nerve tone. Holloway's Pills are particularly recommended to persons of studious and sedentary habits, who gradually fall into a nervous and irritable state, unless some such restorative be occasionally taken.

Jamalpore, January 20, 1888.

The Jamalpore High English School lately held its annual distribution of prizes, under the presidency of the chaplain, the Rev. Mr. Butler. Christmas passed off quietly, but there were children's treats, magic lantern shows, and balls and dancing parties during the new year holidays.

A new missionary from England, the Rev. E. Clifford, was here and delivered an address in the Company's Mechanics' Institute, before the European and native public, on Christian work in England and India, illustrating his lecture with magic lantern-slides, showing views taken from the life of Christ. This gentleman has come out to India, for the purpose of preaching Christianity, in connection with the Church Missionary Society and, from his account, draws very large audiences. He is really a very able speaker. The meeting here was very well attended, the room being crowded almost to suffocation.

There is an indication of slackness of traffic on the East Indian Railway.

Burglary and theft are rife again. No less than half a dozen cases have come to our notice within the current month. A Bengali Babu and a Behari have been robbed very recently of their valuable things, such as shawls, jewellery, utensils, clothing, &c., to the value of Rs. 700 and Rs. 300 respectively. This is no doubt, very discreditable to the detective Police authorities. The citizens of the place are mostly of the labouring class and clerks in offices, and as a rule are at their respective vice benches and desks from morning to evening daily. The present crisis compels many of them to have no repose at night for fear of life and property. This reminds us of the olden days of—"Burgies." Should this state of things continue, I am afraid, matters will go from bad to worse. I understand that a memorial to the effect has already been made by some of the citizens of the place and forwarded to the District Magistrate for redress.

A peculiar case of juvenile prosecution or rather persecution took place here the other day. On the auspicious day of Sreepunchome Poojah, about half a dozen schoolboys in their teens, their ages varying from 5 to 8, went out to fetch flowers, mango blossoms, and ears of barley from the adjacent trees for the purpose of worshipping Ink Pots, &c., after the fashion of lower Bengal. Unfortunately, the mango trees being owned by the municipality and a Mahomedan chowkidar placed in charge, exercised his vigilance and zeal by arresting them and placing them before the chairman for orders, who fined the boys Rs. 2 and Re. 1 respectively, the older ones being fined Rs. 2 and younger Rupee 1 each, in spite of their guardians' remonstrances to the Chairman. This reminds me of an instance of appropriate leniency shown to a schoolboy by Colonel Wintle, then Cantonment Magistrate of Barrackpore. A boy having a fondness for lemons, asked the gardener in a gentleman's garden to let him have a couple of them on payment, but he refused, on which the boy snatched two of the lemons from the man's basket, leaving a piece for the same, and ran away. The lad was prosecuted and brought before the Colonel, who instead of punishing him, let him off, with orders to take away as many more lemons as he wanted and to go home, and lectured the gardener, saying that a man must not eat the choicest fruit by himself without getting others to join him, especially boys, and he will be the last person to see boys prosecuted for such trifling things.

Mr. Dickson, ex-Inspector of audit and accounts, has brought a suit against the East Indian Railway Company in the High Court of Judicature, Calcutta, for damages, to the extent of Rs. 75,000, for wrongful dismissal. Several officers and native office assistants attached to the Audit Office here have been summoned as witnesses. As the case is sub judice now, I must refrain from making comments on the points at issue for the present. All I can say, is that the case under notice appears to be a sensational one, and is rather of an unprecedented character.

OPINION OF THE PRESS.

Dr. S. C. Mookerjee, the editor of what is undoubtedly one of the ablest papers in the country in point of literary power is the author of a pleasant little book of Travels in East Bengal.....The author is master of a racy style of English which many an Englishman may envy. Humorous descriptions and caustic satire enliven every page. There is throughout a vigour and freshness of style that lends a charm to the veriest commonplace. If there were, however, a higher purpose in the publication of this book than to lighten the weary evening hours of the ordinary reader, we confess to a feeling that the author has failed in such an object. We are afraid there is not poetry enough in us to body forth in imagination the beauty of the scenes which the author has described in his voyages to and fro between Dacca and Tipperah. Humourist as he is Dr. Mookerjee will remind us of the words of the poet that the point of a "jest lies more in the ear of him that hears it than in the tongue of him that utters it." As with the jest so is it with the description. We do not say that the charge is unfounded. Prosaic as we are, drudging away at the desk, perhaps it is that we lack capacity to follow in imagination what the author has doubtless delineated with an admirable pen.

One of the chief impressions that a reader will receive from a glance at the book is the somewhat strained relation between the Babus and the Anglo-Indians. The author pours a flood of ridicule upon the lordly airs of our "rulers." He hits hard indeed in his account of the Colonel at waist enduring a Babu looking on, when on board the steamer, and of the white man's condescension in bowing to the black nigger. Happily we in the South are not so badly off in our commerce with the representatives of Western civilization. In spite of several instances of conflict and misunderstanding Englishmen and Hindus pull on agreeably together. But the author, notwithstanding his involuntary feeling of aloofness from the European, is no stranger to the blessings for which the West has laid us in debt. He has a keen appreciation of the enjoyments of this Westernized life of ours. He looks for ever forward and casts no longing lingering look behind at the things with which we have shaken hands and parted. His heart is in the continuance of British supremacy in the East. And agitation is his utmost weapon for the maintenance of his rights. But he will have nothing with spurious agitation. We extract below a paragraph of excellent advice to his brethren of the press. [Extract.]

The author recounts his adventure with the Railway officials of Sealdah with considerable humour. We feel an irresistible temptation to quote it in extenso, but space forbids. How the greenback was no legal tender, why silver of the Calcutta mint was wanted and how the currency question stood stiff and frowning despite the Editors and Magistrates who had accompanied the author to bid him good-bye at the station, and how again with the advent of the Justice of the Peace all objection to receiving the currency-note vanished, are all narrated in a style that is fittingly characterized only by the word "delightful." In another place the author introduces the reader to the Hindu belief in the auspicious hour for starting on a journey in language of such playful raillery that we make no apology for quoting it. [Extract.]

The author has some trenchant criticism on the insolation of the Englishman, which makes him inaccessible to the complaints of extortion or plunder by their menials. They are too absorbed to know all that passes about them and the wrongs that are committed in their names are unnoticed as mere trifles for they have rarely any idea of their magnitude. It is only too well known throughout the country how blackmail in the shape of money or provisions is levied upon the inhabitants when the Collector is on tour. It would be difficult to believe the thing could go on under his very nose without his connivance if we did not know his exclusiveness and his distaste for mixing with the people.

The author devotes the greater part of the book to a description of the people and the external aspect of the country that he passed through in his two trips to Tipperah from Calcutta and back. He has a good deal to say about the customs of some of the people he becomes acquainted with. He makes a discovery of the debris of a Portuguese colony in Tipperah that has become debased in morality and sunk in superstition. Although there is not much in the book that is instructive to the serious student, the grace of diction and the ease of style carry the reader pleasantly through. It would be difficult to rescue such a subject as he has chosen from dulness without his extraordinary command of language. We cannot promise more than a brief span of life to the book. It will prove what is abundantly clear to the readers of the Reis and Rayyet that the author is an adept in English composition. He is a lover of nature and he paints scenes and situations with an artist's pencil.—The Hindu, November 7, 1887.

.....this interesting book. We are justified in so regarding it, not on account of any romantic adventures that the author has to relate, nor of any very new discoveries in geography or natural history. There is something particular as regards ethnology; and a great deal of human nature in the book, shown to the reader with a simplicity and candour which bear testimony to its truth. Called from the busy haunts of men in the city to dwell for a time in Independent Tipperah as a judicious adviser to its Chief, Doctor Mookerjee relates his adventures during the several journeys to and fro in that capacity, without revealing the secrets of the State, like a good diplomatist. He has adhered strictly to the advice which he offers to his brethren of the Native Press, and has written what he saw and knows, without revealing all, considering what he might properly say and what withhold..... The above seems to be a curious passage to be found in a book of travels, and appears to have no connection with the subject. But it arises from a casual reference to a slaughter house, and a writer who "thundered weekly against the outrage of locating shambles in the immediate vicinity of a Hindoo temple"--- where, in fact, no temple could be said to exist. Hence, the Doctor advises his fellow-subscribers not to be Pharisees, righteous over-much, but to look and be sure of their facts. In the same spirit, he has written his book. He gives an account of his travels, which seem often to have been voyages, upon the wide-spreading rivers of Eastern Bengal which in the rains become almost inland seas. On these he philosophises on the nature of the country and the people, making careful observation of his facts; and though he sometimes fancies he knows better than his boatmen, and more than suspects that they are getting the better of him, he submits with a grace that would have done credit to Socrates, and accepts the apparently inevitable in the interests of peace. The Doctor is a close observer of nature, animate and inanimate, with an eye to the picturesque as well as to the sublime and beautiful. And although there is a vein of cynicism running through many of his observations, it is tempered by such evident good nature, that even a stranger would conceive him to be a laughter-loving rather than a stern philosopher. This is evident in his descriptions of his boatmen and others, while he denounces the lawlessness which has made the poor fishermen suspicious even of honest intentions, because they have so long been the helpless victims of marauders stronger than themselves. Their only defence is flight or deceit, and the latter is their justification as a mode of self-protection. We are shown not only the weakness of the people, but the shortcomings of the administration that leave these things possible..... The author is impartial in his censures..... There is much in the book to which space forbid us to refer. That it is not a prosy one may be gathered from the fact that, for its 300 pages, there are nearly as many index references. Many of the subjects are necessarily but lightly treated, but all sensibly and fairly. And Dr. Mookerjee is such a master of the English language that in the whole book we have scarcely found a phrase that might not have been written by an Englishman "to the manor born." There is nothing in it at which any one could reasonably take offence; and there is much from which both Englishmen and natives may learn greatly-needed lessons.—The Indian Daily News, Nov. 22, 1887.

"TRAVELS IN BENGAL. Such is the title of a most interesting little work published a short time ago. Its author is Babu Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee, the well-known Editor of the Reis and Rayyet, the most original, cleverly-written and interesting journal in India. Babu Sambhu Chunder is one of the veteran Indian writers in English. He is the master of a most happy, racy pleasant style, which you can easily make out from amongst the writings of a hundred different men. In racy humorous writing Babu Sambhu Chunder has no rival among his Indian contemporaries. He won his first laurels, we believe, by his writings in his own periodical, the Mookerjee's Magazine, now long-defunct. In this magazine articles of great learning and excellence appeared, mostly from the pen of Babu Sambhu Chunder. He has written several other booklets. His Causes of the Mutiny; Mr. Wilson, Lord Canning and the Income Tax; the Career of an Indian Princess, Her Highness the late Secundra Begum of Bhopal; and the Prince in India and to India are publications which attracted considerable notice. His latest production "Travels in Bengal" is a work of great merit. It is at once a most faithful and interesting picture of natural scenery and life in Bengal, although Mr. Mookerjee does not profess to write a picture of Bengal life and uses his pencil in its portraiture only in passing. The dedication is characteristic. [Extract.]

The "Travels" are travels in East Bengal, travels and voyages between Calcutta and Independent Tipperah. We do not believe many people in this side of India know that there is such an independent State as Tipperah. But nevertheless such a state exists. We will give here a summary of its history in the words of Mr. Mookerjee—He writes:—[Extract.] Mr. Mookerjee was Dewan of Independent Tipperah for some five years in all between 1877 and 1881. The travels are an account of his voyages to and from Tipperah.

Those who have travelled in Bengal, particularly in its Eastern districts, which are the districts described in Mookerjee's book, will bear him out in his statement that Lower Bengal is not stale, flat and unprofitable, that, on the contrary, she is the beautifullest country in the world. She has no high mountains, but she has rivers apparently as vast as the sea, to make her scenery grand and majestic. She has a hundred rivers ever overflowing with water, thousands of transparent lakes, covered with the lily and a hundred beautiful water-flowers, thousands of seas of ever-waving paddy fields, thousands of clusters of bamboo and of great trees dressed in beautiful creepers adorning the river banks, to make her the loveliest country in the world. Even a Bengali needs to see and travel Bengal to adequately know her thousand wondrous charms. For a foreigner it is well nigh impossible to get even an approximate idea of what they are like from description, however true and faithful. Let us hear what our author has to say on the subject. We read:—[Extract.] A paddy sea is thus inimitably described:—[Extract.]

We will quote a passage of another character:—[Extract.]

We could count many such gems. But space forbids it. We will, however, quote some passages of another kind. Our traveller, though old in years, is evidently young in heart, for no one in the romantic age of youth could be more appreciative of female charms than our traveller. In every other page you find our author describing in terms of enthusiasm some rural girl or woman of beauty. [Extract.] In the next page we find our traveller's attention [Extract.]

There is the description, physical and moral, of a Colonel, which we cannot resist the temptation of reproducing, although the article has already exceeded the usual length. [Extract.]

We have now given extracts enough to show that the little book of travels is most delightful reading. It contains graphic descriptions of natural scenery, faithful portraiture of men and manners, and happy, good humoured observations on them. There is not an ill-natured or unkind word in the whole book: it overflows in every page with the milk of human kindness. Every observation testifies to the author being a keen observer of men and things, as an example of which we can mention the instructive and interesting chapter on the Native Christians of Portuguese extraction in Tipperah. Again, although the book does not pretend to deal with life in Bengal, the glimpses of that life we find in it are very considerable and pleasant. We will now conclude by recommending the book to all who may wish to spend a few hours amidst happy thoughts and pleasant pictures.—

—The Tribune, Nov. 26, 1887.

If we have not before noticed Mr. Sambhu C. Mookerjee's Travels in Bengal, which was published some months ago, it is not because the little book is either dull or pointless. It contains, on the contrary, much interesting matter, though some of the incidents are over-weighted with detail in what is facetiously called a "little booklet." The author's view as a rule is, by the way, facetious: he is given even to punning; but he is also sentimental in the highest degree—"A naked Whiteman" hurts his susceptibilities; a Hindu girl, bathing in the river, throws him into an ecstasy of delight: "she had such large languishing eyes!" But he is nothing if not philosophical, and his reflections on this or that social and political subject are not without their moral. Mr. Sambhu C. Mookerjee was formerly Minister to the "last of the Nawabs Nazim of Bengal, Behar and Orissa" and afterwards Minister of the Maharaja of Tipperah. He is a man, therefore, of experience, and when he speaks his brethren should listen to him.... Travels in Bengal is a readable book, and it abounds in anecdotes which are often as instructive as amusing, and it is not spoiled by too many political allusions, though, of course, some few have crept in.—The Pioneer, Dec. 1887.

With our author, details about petty incidents in his journeyings to and from his zemindari management are only second in importance to details as to the difficulty of getting his valuable services dispensed with when he wanted leave from his employer. He never forgets that he is a first-class classical Baboo, and a Brahman of high degree, except when he considers that it is incumbent on his character for 19th century enlightenment to sneer at Hinduism, and exalt his personal pretensions at the expense of the old religion. Sambhu C. Mookerjee's book is valuable in a way, as showing the inordinateness of vanity, and what the Yankees call 'high falutin,' at which Baboodom can arrive, when not under the supervision of superior authority, e. g., our author's budgerow and cook-boat are always referred to as a "fleet." In his preface he refers complacently to "the mere English reader." At page 31 he ostentatiously laments that he cannot run away from Court, because he would do so "at the risk of causing something of an interregnum, so to say." In a similar key the record of vaingloriousness is carried on all through the book.

"It was with the odour of New Year's Day festivities still on me," says the Baboo, "that I proceeded to my work in the far East." Somehow, this odour does not seem to have recommended itself to his fellow-travellers. On board the steamer going to Dacca, for instance, the Baboo met a British Colonel with a pretty wife." Reference to this episode is made on the 6th page of the book. On the 9th page we are introduced to "a couple of fine healthy girls, with well proportioned, nimble limbs * * * * * sitting at the edge of the water, elaborately scrubbing and towel-drying their persons, and helping to clean one another." And so on. About 9 o'clock that same morning the Baboo "cleaned the cooking utensils and plates in the sands of the beach;" and at night the boatmen on board the budgerow sang without asking the Baboo's permission, although, says he naively, "I am known to be somebody."

Here is a quotation ex uno disce omnes. It refers to the Rajah's dilatoriness in giving our author his congè:

"Thus from day to day, finally from morn to noon, from noon to dewy eve, and again the following morning, from an amiable inability to make up the mind—a generous indisposition to part! Far from unpleasant is this dilly dally, where there is no ingenuity, no peremptory call to promptitude. British employes know not this "unbought grace of life." They will probably not appreciate it. They have not the happiness of serving men, but are mere parts of a machine. We serve flesh and blood. The position of officials in Native States has its disadvantages; many enough to be sure; but it is not without ample compensations, and this is one of them."

Is it possible for the men of the East and the men of the West to be sympathetic in idea? Be that as it may, unless the author of Justice Onocool Chunder Mookerjee's Memoirs adventures again into literature, we do not think that a siller book than Sambhu C. Mookerjee's Travels is likely to appear for a long while.—The Calcutta Review.

[Certificate.]

"I have known Babu Rajendra Nath Ghoshal kubiraj for upwards of 15 years, and I can bear ample testimony to the wonderful efficacy of his medicine in the treatment of diseases of the womb. While Assistant Surgeon of Monghyr and subsequently, I have known him to cure the most obstinate cases of uterine Leucorrhœa and other uterine derangements, organic and functional. I can safely call his medicine the Specific for Leucorrhœa and painful menstruation. Ladies who have been subject to these diseases for years and were barren have been cured and borne children.

CANTO II.

8

The Southern breeze is fair and strong
To waft the hostile fleet along.
The anchor's up, the sails unfurled,
And just upon the Eastern world
The radiant dawn of day is breaking,
And rosy light and life awaking.
And is it thus, when all around
Breathes peace in every sign and sound,
When from the wood soft cooes the dove
And Heaven's smile is bright above,
When ocean murmurs with delight
And crisps in beauty on the sight,
That man can go in warfare forth,
To desolate the peaceful earth,
Or stain the azure of the flood,
With streams of fratricidal blood?
Alas! for man, whose lust and pride
With ruin still go side by side,
And there where nature smiles in bloom,
Spread wars with horrors and its gloom.

9

Who leaneth o'er the vessel's side,
Intent upon the rolling tide?
'Tis dusky eve, and in the bark
No eye the Chieftain's brow may mark,
He muses on the field of fame
And kindles at each glorious name,
Which bright tradition brings,
Of warrior chiefs and hero kings,
Nor are his countrymen forgot
Who battled on the very spot.
Pacheco, whose great deeds and wrong
Still live in Camoen's lofty song;
Young Almeyda, the good and brave,
Who fought the Pagan on the wave,
And found a Hero's gong grave,
The father who revenged the son,
And rich Egyptian trophies won,
What time o'er Dabul's princely towers
He poured in rage his iron showers,
And smote the turbaned Turk whose fire
Had childless made the hoary sire.
He mused on all—when Lusian arms
First Eastward spread their fierce alarms,
And Gama in his new found world
The Lusitanian flag unfurled.

10

Sebastian lifts his eye above,
It greets the silver star of love,
And as he gazes on that star
His musings turn to Gulánar.
Most lovely is the planet's light
And dimly beautiful the night—
A night whose stilly aspect seems
For quiet thoughts and pleasant dreams.
And are they to Sebastian given
Like welcome gleams of peaceful heaven?
Ah no! ah no! his thoughts are drear
And desperate with hope and fear,
All gloomy as the tempest cloud
Whose depths the lightning's rage enshroud.
But hark! at once the pleasant chime
Of sweet guitar and choral song,
Made lovely by the place and time,
And borne on ocean breeze along,
Like music of another sphere
The voice so full, the tone so clear.

SONG.

Over the sea, over the sea,
In sunshine and in storm ride we,
No track above, no track below,
On, like a white winged bird, we go,
Undaunted boys, undaunted boys.

ii.

Over the sea, over the sea,
When wave and wind are rough, sail we:
Our arms are strong, our hearts are bold,
And on we go in quest of gold,
Undaunted boys, undaunted boys.

iii.

Over the sea, over the sea,
With Orient gems and wealth come we:
And eyes that speak, and hearts that burn
Await once more our glad return,
Our pledges boys, our pledges boys.

ii

Another and another lay,
Sebastian hears nor turns away,
For quick his ardent soul has caught
The spirit of his comrade's thought,
And in the gayness of the hour,
And by sweet music's spell-like power
He finds his burdened heart grow lighter,
And hope the syren, smile the brighter,
Oh well the Lusian loveth song,
And even doth the sweet guitar
Beguile his woe and soothe his wrong,
And banish bitter thoughts afar.

In the deep quiet of the night
 Is gained the destined shore,
 And by the moon's scarce welcome light
 Is seen many an anchored prore
 On traffic bound, they pass these by
 And steer to where no strangers lie.
 All silently they moor each bark,
 And well the shore's appearance mark,
 Lost unseen strangers mar their plan
 And spoil a work so well begun.

12

No time for rest or idle thought,
 The conquest must at once be sought,
 Ere break of day prepare the foe
 To guard against the coming blow.
 The men are armed, the boats all manned
 And rowing to the silent strand,
 Where nought disturbs the quiet save
 The measured breaking of the wave.
 All voicelessly with muffled oar
 Expectant eye, suspended breath
 As nerving for the work of death
 They row towards the woody shore.
 Another effort—now they land—
 Sebastian foremost of the band,
 Known by that nameless mien and look
 Which shows him greater than his kind,
 As though his form and features took
 The hue and impress of his mind.

13

Two hundred men are on that beach,
 And daring is the soul of each.
 The spirit of their fathers—those Who stood against unnumbered foes
 In burning Asia and Afrique,
 Who dared in unknown climates seek
 Newer delights and newer glory,
 To gild the page of coming story—
 Is in their hearts, and nerves each hand
 Among that fierce and desperate band.

14

"Comrades, look to your weapons well,
 So sword and carbine may tell—
 The heretics must feel to-night
 The fiercest horrors of the fight,
 Must learn to dread our arts and arms,
 And feel a vanquished foe's alarms.
 I know your hearts and that you need
 No urging to a val'rous deed.
 Be Albuquerque our battle cry,
 And woe to every foeman nigh.
 Now, by the flashing of your eyes,
 And by the blood I see arise,
 I know what vengeance ye will take
 For rooted wrongs and freedom's sake.
 But comrades brave, bear well in mind,
 We make no war on woman-kind.
 By Heaven! this right hand shall slay
 Who hurts a woman in the fray."

15

Within the fort scarce stirs a sound,
 The watchmen walk their measured round,
 Unmet by any warring sign
 Of coming ill or dark design.
 Old Yusuff hath his pillow prest,
 And each stout guard has sunk to rest,
 That scarce an eye or ear's awake
 To mark the coming tempest break.
 The moon is up and riding high,
 But dun thick clouds obscure the sky,
 That faint and misty is her light,
 And only at brief moments bright,

As though her soft and peaceful ray
 Disdained to light the midnight fray.
 The sentinel is at his post,
 Nor dreams he of the coming host ;
 Still measures he his wonted space
 With steady and unbroken pace.
 But now he halts, his ear hath caught Strange noises by the night wind brought.
 'Tis but the rustling of the trees
 Stirred by the rising Southern breeze,
 But hark ! again that sound is heard,
 And more distinctly than before,
 And yet no tree, no leaf is stirred,
 'Tis perhaps the tide upon the shore.
 But now he marks the sound again,
 It nears, it is the tread of men :
 The matchlock speaks the quick alarm
 And spreads the signal sound to arm.

THE Mail brings the intelligence that a band of Montenegrin raiders, under the command of a Russian ex-Captain Nabakoff—a noted organiser of pan-Slavist disturbances—crossed over to Bulgaria and landed from a Greek ship. Their object, it is stated, was to seize the

WE have received the following telegram from Cuttack :—

A public meeting was held yesterday (January 29th) at 4 P. M., to give a public reception to the two delegates to the last Congress, namely, Babus G. S. Roy and M. S. Das. It was a grand and enthusiastic meeting of nearly 500 persons, the Printing Company's hall and verandah were full and many men could have no access from want of space. The Oryas, Mahomedans, Bengalis, Madrasis, Marwais attended largely. Babu Kali Pada Banerjee presided. The President congratulated and thanked the delegates. The delegates explained at great length the proceedings of the last Congress, making reference to Sir Syed Ahmed's speech and exhorted the people to agitate all over the country in a manner becoming a nation loyal to British rule and grateful to the English nation, receiving rather forbearingly than giving offence, and to raise funds for agitation in England. The meeting expressed full sympathy with the doings of the Congress.

PURSUANT to a telegram from the Commissioner of Peshawur, two "Circassians" have been arrested at Lahore, on suspicion of being Russian spies.

WE read :—

"Russia has been having trouble with its Universities and at present all the Universities in Russia proper, excepting Kieff, are closed and occupied by policemen instead of students. The disturbance spread with rapidity from Odessa to Charkoff and St. Petersburg, embracing all the institutions for higher education in those towns besides the Universities. Everywhere the cause was the same; protests against the restrictive rules now in force being met by arrests, stronger protests, and finally by wholesale arrests. The Russian Universities are indeed in a bad way just now. Founded only in the last half of the eighteenth century, they were almost suppressed by Nicholas, then petted for a brief season by Alexander II, only to be again bullied afterwards, a treatment which in the present Czar's reign has been still further developed. It is indeed difficult to reconcile higher education and the aspirations it breeds with the existing regime in Russia. The Universities are not revolutionary. The protests are only the protests of education against a police supervision and a system of petty espionage. But the students who are driven into the streets become the recruiting-ground for Nihilism and Revolution."

THE French Chamber of Deputies have for the third time elected M. Floquet as their President

THE Pope is the owner of one of the largest cellars, containing, for one beverage, 50,000 bottles of champagne, made up of presents from pious or penitent Catholics throughout the world. A queer offering to a great Imaam or Mohunt! the Moslem, the Buddhist, the Vaisnav and Hindu will fancy. But they know not the part that wine plays in European salvation. The priest's mantra can change wine into the blood of God as his son Jesus, and the only difference of opinion is as to whether it really becomes actual blood or spiritual or symbolic blood. The Jewish Scriptures, on which both Christianity and Mahomedanism were founded, are partial to wine. So our Vedas too. The recent Tantrik reaction also revels in insubriating drink and all sorts of sottishness. Islam has discouraged it, no doubt, but with half a heart. At any rate, it promises abundance in Paradise, with its charm increased a hundredfold in the company of the loveliest houries. Buddhism and Hinduism in general are uncompromising

A CARVED ivory chair, composed of 25 elephant tusks, which was being made for the King of Burma, was completed after the annexation, and purchased by a gentleman of Rangoon. It has been sent to the Imperial Institute, London. These ivory chairs are no less beautiful than costly. There are some fine ones at Moorshedabad and at Agartala.

THE long lost Hwang Kan has turned up in Japan—Hwang Kan's Confucian Analects with all the ancient commentators' notes. It is 1,200 years old, and was missing in China for the last 700 or 800 years. The Chinese Minister in Japan has been ordered to borrow the copy for a careful copy thereof. An equally interesting discovery is reported nearer home. Mr. Atkinson in his parting presidential address at the Asiatic Society thus speaks of it :—

"Our Associate Member, Babu Sarat Chandra Das, is bringing out for the Society a hitherto unpublished work by the poet Kshemendra, entitled Avadana Kalpalata, of which we have the complete Sanskrit with an interlinear Tibetan version in a manuscript recently acquired from Tibet. It is intended to publish the Sanskrit and Tibetan texts in parallel columns, and the first fasciculus is in the press. The manuscript is in verse and was translated into Tibetan by Lochchhava Shonton Dorje and the Indian Pandit Lakshmi-kara at the Vihara of Gedran Shide in Manyul under the orders of Panchhen Shakyas Ssampo, ruler of Tibet, in 1279 A. D. The blocks from which the print used was taken were engraved by the direction of the Dolal Lama Nagwan Lossan in 1645 A. D. The work consists of 108 pallavas, of which 107 were written by Kshemendra and one by his son Somendra. The copies hitherto procured and now deposited in our library and that of the Cambridge University are imperfect, containing only the second part of the work, and a fragment of the first, so that the publication of this Sanskrit and Tibetan version of the entire poem will restore to India a portion of a valuable Buddhistic work that has been lost to it for some eight hundred years. Kshemendra is said to have been the court poet of Ananta, Raja of Kashmir, and undertook the work at the instance of his Buddhist friend Nakka. It is a veritable store-house of the legends as to Buddha's life and acts according to the Mahayana school of Northern Buddhism, and is written in a simple elegant style, quite free from the turgid verbosity and tedious repetition, usually characteristic of Buddhist Sanskrit works. The arrangement of the original and Tibetan version in parallel columns should give an impetus to the study of classical Tibetan and afford an accurate basis for further research."

THE Convocation of the Bombay University, held on the 17th ultimo, was signalled by the admission of a Hindu lady to the degree of Bachelor of Arts. Or should we not rather say Spinster of Arts?

THERE will be prospecting for gold in the Khassia and Jaintia Hills. The Assam Government has given permission to an English capitalist for the purpose.

A BRANCH of the Bank of Madras has been sanctioned at the town of Mysore.

LAST month, the visitors to the Indian Museum numbered—natives 39,017 males and 13,076 females and Europeans 1,444 males and 439 females, the daily average attendance being 2,342.

HERE is a revelation of the highest Court of Judicature in Mysore. Chief Judge Plumer, with him Mr. Justice Ramachendrier, in delivering judgment in the case of Hoondi Kristnama Chary vs. A Ananda Row, made the following remarks :

"Considering the facts that have come to our knowledge on perusing the record we feel it our duty to make a few observations in regard to the nature of the agreements proved by the defendant. It was with astonishment and pain that we read the evidence of the defendant and of the advocates that were examined as witnesses in this case. It would appear from the evidence that the plaintiff, a money-lender, found no difficulty in persuading a few of the advocates in Mysore to becoming his debtors, on the conditions that they should conduct all his cases without previously demanding their fees; that they should be paid whatever might be decreed by the Courts and that they should claim no remuneration for work if the decree did not award it. If this evidence was not before us we should not for a moment have imagined that any Advocate in the Province would have been guilty of such unprofessional and disgraceful conduct. We hope and we trust that this forms an exception to the rule. Such agreements are wholly derogatory to the dignity of the Bar. We trust that the observations we have made will put a stop once and for all to such objectionable agreements being made. We should feel it our duty to take very serious notice of their repetition."

We have no superstitious horror of champerty, but this is a form of it which ought by all means to be discouraged. We believe it is not unknown in British India. There is no need to be indignant over-much. Even in England, within this century, certain judges were used to be paid after the fashion of these Mysore lawyers.

AN unlettered Mussulman butcher has been elected in the late municipal election at Rampore Beaulah, to the great disgust of the other Commissioners who meditated resigning in a body. We are glad to notice signs of wiser counsels having prevailed. A similar election has taken place at Santipore.

M. MANES, Governor of Pondicherry, goes in the same capacity to Réunion, at the end of the month. M. Nouet from New Caledonia comes to Pondicherry.

NOTES AND LEADERETTES.

OUR readers attending the Investiture this day will please acquaint themselves with the Military Secretary to the Viceroy's notification published elsewhere. They are reminded to take the routes to the Government House indicated, and to be at their seats before 11-45 when the gates will be closed against carriages.

THE Petroleum Bill has been referred to Select Committee.

THE Petroleum Bill has had its immediate effect—on the consumers. At Bombay, the price at once rose from Rs. 5-8 to Rs. 9, for a case of the best oil. Fresh taxation being required, Government could not choose a more appropriate article for duty. It is vain to expect that kerosine will be driven out of the market, but the less it is consumed the better for the health and lives of the people.

THE Calcutta municipal Bill or the Constitution portion was taken up in the Bengal Council last Saturday. Dr. Gurudas Banerjee objected to the inclusion of the Suburbs into the town for municipal purposes. He was afraid the taxes in the Suburbs would be trebly raised, thus driving the poor to unhealthy bustees beyond the new municipal area. A large jurisdiction itself, the learned Doctor thought, was hindrance to proper and efficient administration. Lawyer as he is, he rested his final point on separate magisterial jurisdictions in the same municipality. The Hon'ble Kally Nath Mitter said he was "pledged to support the amalgamation." Does he mean that he owes his elevation to his adhesion to the Bill? Dr. Sircar supported Dr. Banerjee, for he could not be a party to any extension of the Drainage System with its train of typhoidal fevers. We believe the Bill is not imperative on this point.

The expansion of municipal Calcutta is a foregone conclusion. Government are already decided upon it. They have agreed to bear the entire cost of the Calcutta Police, thus setting free the Police rate for improvement of the Suburbs. The amendment was, of course, lost. Other amendments will be taken up to-day.

AT Hyderabad, while in transit by post, certain examination papers, notifying the results, have been tampered with.

NARAIN SINHA and Thakur Pershad are being criminally prosecuted at Benares for attempting to obtain certificates of proficiency in the Middle Class Examination at which they did not appear.

A GREATER Examination scandal is being enquired into at Lahore. Having raised a host of creditors against himself and been found out in Bengal, Mr. Frederic de Hocheplid Larpent was quietly sent away to the Punjab—to a wider field of usefulness to himself. At Lahore, he holds the official post of Deputy Accountant-General and also managed to be pitchforked into the office of Registrar of the local University. He found the new University a very convenient place for his practices, and made them paying too. He is understood to have held out hopes of passing candidates for the University examinations on payment of prenuums. He netted a large sum that way. He could not, however, keep to his contract. Many of the plucked demanded refund of the moneys paid and received, and in some cases, small repayments were made and the balance made up in notes of hand to third parties. There was an outcry, but it was confined to natives, and the Registrar had friends. The sturdy local Tribune cried itself hoarse for an enquiry. A committee was at last obtained and it reported against the Registrar, but after the retirement of Sir Charles Aitchison, there was an evident reaction among the University authorities. There was an attempt to hush up the inconvenient disclosures, and for some time it appeared that Mr. Larpent was to be let alone. But the Press was not silenced, and the Tribune was a host in itself. Government at last awoke to the gravity of the scandal, and a Commission under Act XXXVII of 1850, composed of Messrs. F. E. Elliot, District and Sessions Judge, Allahabad, and C. R. C. Kiernander, Deputy Auditor-General, Bombay, are at the present moment sitting at Lahore.

The charges against Mr. Larpent have been reduced to three items, namely, of receiving a bribe of Rs. 1,570 from Ram Saran Das to pass him as a Licentiate of Law, of employing Gunda Singh for inducing candidates to come to terms with Mr. Larpent for successful results of the examination, and of letting out examination questions beforehand.

Before the charges were read to him, Mr. Larpent desired the Commission to investigate them in camera, that he might not be prejudiced in his defence by publication of the evidence. Not an unreasonable application, though novel. The Court, however, ruled against him. Mr. E. W. Parker opened the case, and witnesses are being examined. By the time this issue reaches Lahore, the prosecution will have closed.

MR. PIRIE DUFF, formerly of this city as Senior partner of the well-known firm of Mackenzie Lyall & Co., who, having retired, had sought the honor of a seat in Parliament at the hands of a Scotch constituency, is coming to Calcutta again.

SIR AUCKLAND COLVIN is not likely to have an easy time of it in his new career. Nature is against him. At his very entrance into office, he is confronted by the apparition of a wide-spread food distress. In consequence of the sudden cessation of the periodical rains, the Rubbee crops were ruined. The prices are steadily rising. Already, they have reached a pinching point. Where in 1887 one purchased 21 seers for a Rupee, you get only 17 seers. Wheat, which sold last year at 16 seers a Rupee, is now 12 seers. The disproportion is still more striking in the other staples. The coarser rice is being sold at 10 seers in place of 15 seers in 1887. For 26 seers of grain for a Rupee it is 17 seers. Barley, 26 seers last year, is now 15 seers.

All this means deep distress throughout a vast population in the finest part of India. It will tax all the administrative capacity of the Lieutenant-Governor and all the resources at his disposal to meet the growing disaster.

COMMERCIAL estimates are not more reliable than Finance Ministerial forecasts. If the out-turn of a single valuable and limited produce like Cinchona within a limited area like the cultivation in a compact island like Ceylon, for instance, cannot be calculated within a respectable margin of certitude, how futile must be speculations on the estimates in regard to other articles of agriculture and commerce distributed between different parts of the globe! What must be the value of trade returns in general! The recognised experts put down Cinchona crop for 1884-85 for 8½ million lbs. The real yield was 11,700,000 lbs. The calculation for the next year was still discredited by the result. The estimate for 1885-86 was 9 million lbs., the actual yield was by 100,000 lbs. less than 15½ million lbs. It may be supposed that the experts would now take exceptional care to secure accuracy. But see the result! They estimated the crop of 1886-87 at 11 million lbs. But the same year the export ran up to 14,400,000 lbs! One would think that at last in mere shame the figurative gentlemen would shut up shop. But no—they are at it still, and have announced their estimate of the present crop at 9½ million lbs. Now who so poor to do them reverence again? Who so base as to believe in their dark foreboding in the face of the striking expansion of the cultivation? There seems a determined effort to underestimate among the prophets.

Hope says :—

"We often forget that a great part of the contempt we receive from foreigners is deserved. A nation, some of whose best educated men have lost all sense of nationality, some of whose most prominent men are the merest sycophants and self-seekers, whose ablest men have not yet been able to show any evidence of the originality that conquers the world—such a nation can never gain the respect of a people with whom despite all their faults, nationality is the strongest sentiment, whose originality is their trump card, and who by their enterprise and courage have conquered half the world. This is a point on which a great deal might be said, and we shall take it up in another issue. In the meantime we must point out in support of what we say that the Bengalis, being the worst sinners in the respects noted just now, are, of all Indian faces, the most despised by Englishmen."

We cordially concur with our contemporary, except in his concluding assertion. We must beg leave to correct the editor where he says that the Bengalis are the worst sinners in the toadying line. They are not. There are—and all the more shame to us as Indians—as great wretches of the kind in other parts of India as in Bengal. So far as we are able to judge, the Bengalis are stouter of heart and more self-respecting than the Indians of any other race or Province in the Empire. The point has more than a sentimental interest, and we would like to have the opinion of competent observers.

THE Amrita Bazar Patrika notices a heart-rending case of tyranny by a District Superintendent of Police exercised over a subordinate native officer, the details of which first appeared in Hope. We hope there is such a thing as Government in the land to do justice in the matter. Speedy interference might be the means of saving a fellow-creature, if not a brother—for the victim is a Baboo after all.

THE Amrita Bazar Patrika has taken to Nomenclology. There is no end to the vagaries of nomenclature. As usual, the anomalies of neighbours strike our acute brother, but the anomaly of self escapes even his keenness. Says he—

"The names which newspapers adopt for themselves must be a curious study. Reis and Rayyet is a paper neither for the one nor for the other, but the educated classes. The Bengalee is in charge of one who had gone to England and come back perfectly un-Bengalized. The Hindu talks of un-Hindu reforms. The Muslim Herald is conducted by a European. The Maharatta does not talk of Balaji or the battle of Maharajpore, but of technical education and import duties. The Englishman is such an Englishman that he hates representative councils, and the Pioneer is such a Pioneer that any slight advance on the part of India towards political reform subjects him to St. Vitus's dance."

And the Amritabazar? The Sphinx will be puzzled to solve the riddle of the name? There is no such place in Calcutta or near it, and the greatest of Minute Geographers could not guess its situation. Shall we say the Patrika is a mighty Griffin from the Land of Pratapaditya, whose mission seems to be to out-Griffin the Griffins and swallow all the Bears and Bugbears in the Empire? In fact, we are all in the same boat—misnomers all.

We wonder how our brother down South will receive the soft impeachment of being doubly a Feringi. The racial slang which forms the staple of his speech seems to betray him, but he may be Muslim all the same, call him a renegade or a covert, as you like. For his own sake, in this world as well as in the next, we hope he is.

THEY have solved the problem in the newest state in Europe. A sort of Jezin has been ordered against the social infidels who affect a life of single-blessedness and quote with approbation the naughty advice of Punch to those who are about to be wedded. All unmarried men and widowers without issue now in Servia must pay three times the tax levied on those who are married. Served right!

ON Wednesday afternoon, 8th instant, at 4-30, the Annual meeting of the Countess of Dufferin's Fund will be held at the Town Hall. The Viceroy will preside and many distinguished men are expected to address the meeting.

Meantime, the Queen's Register containing the names in MS. of all donors and collectors of cards, has just been bound in a handsome volume at Ulwar.

THE Silchar, the new organ of native enlightenment at the capital of Assam, is already going in for imperial politics. It clearly thinks that the people of India should have a voice in the appointment of the Viceroy, but is open to a compromise—for the present only, we suppose. Averse to constant change in the head of Government, the editor is for prolonging the duration of each vicereignty. He concludes—

"It is fit therefore that the opinion of the people should be consulted, if not in appointing, at least in fixing the term of a Governor's office."

TALK of the vagaries of Native jurors in India? In Catholic France, in the department of Indre, a man has just been acquitted by a sympathising jury of the charge of murdering his child of six months by pouring sulphuric acid down the poor infant's throat. There was no want of evidence. Indeed, the thing was admitted. The prisoner pleaded the burden of an increasing family as his justification. The jurors evidently thought the plea good in law and conscience. Suppose some Sonthals on the panel in a rural district in India had given anything like a similar verdict, would the fact not have been an argument in certain quarters for abolishing the Jury system and Local Self-Government into the bargain?

JUMBO'S consort Alice, Barnum's elephant, was dissected at Bridgeport, Connecticut. Her stomach disclosed 300 pennies, part of a pocket knife, four walking stick ferrules, and a piece of lead pipe. A strange old curiosity shop were this great lady's bowels! But does any one suspect how this show grew? Surely, elephants are not omnivorous. Even the proverbial ostrich's stomach would not take kindly to pocket-knives and lead pipes. We guess that these things were thrown to the noble captive in time of hunger to eat, and she took them up in good faith and tried to digest them as best she could, much as Sterne's immortal donkey exercised his jaws on the artichoke. We wonder whether any soul in America had the humour and humanity to offer her macaroni! The curiosity shop in poor Alice's stomach represents the practical "goak"ativeness of the sight-seeing public of the Great Republic.

REIS & RAYYET.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 4, 1888.

[To satisfy a general curiosity, specially as we are unable to supply the old number, we reprint from our first vol. the article we wrote on the late Nawab Ikblood Dowlah on his receiving, in 1882, the knighthood of the Order of the Star of India. Hereafter, we purpose giving other particulars.]

THE WANDERING NAWAB.

A GOOD deal of curiosity has been manifested in society about one of the recipients of the Birth-day honors. Ikblood-Dowlah has been made a Knight of the Star of India. But who is Ikblood-Dowlah? He must be noble beyond question—'Dowlah' settles that—but who is he? From his name, he may be either an Indian, or a Persian. Unknown to the Indian public, he is scarcely better known to the world outside. Yet, a man whom our sovereign delights to honor with one of the highest decorations at her disposal, must be worth knowing. We need, therefore, make no apology for giving an account of him.

Nor is the task unwelcome. The name recalls the lost glories of that kingdom whose despoiled Royalty pines away in inglorious seclusion at Garden Reach in the suburbs of Calcutta. It is associated with memories of Oudh as an independent State, when our rulers anxiously watched its attitude in respect of their policy, when even in the process of deliberately and systematically undermining it, they humoured it, when they stooped to beg of it for the means for carrying on the government of British India, when Lucknow was the Versailles of this Continent, where British proconsuls were wont to taste of the pomp and circumstance of Oriental empire. The man by himself, independently of these high associations, is not insignificant or wholly obscure. If not an important, he is certainly an interesting character. He is an original. His life has been more than ordinarily remarkable. His daily routine is a romance. There surely has not been another Asiatic of the kind. Such a career must be a profitable study.

Nawab Ikbaloood Dowlah Boorhan ul Moolk Muhsun Ali Khan Bahadur Nusrut Jung. Such is the name and titles in full. Indeed, we should not wonder if some honorific distinction was left out in the process of transcription. His father was equally exalted, and, of course, long named. Son of the late Nawab Shumsood Dowlah Nujumool Moolk Ahmud Ali Khan Bahadur Sowlut Jung, Nawab Ikbaloood-Dowlah is a grandson of the famous and able Ruler of Oudh, the Nawab Vizier ul Moolk Yemenood Dowlah Nazim ul Moolk Nawab Saadat Ali Khan Bahadur Mobariz Jung—the brother and successor of Nawab Asofood Dowlah and the son of the historic ruling Vizier, Shoojaood Dowlah Bahadour, the first important and powerful ally of the British in Upper India. As such, he was nephew of His Majesty Ghazi uddin Hyder Shah and and Mahanmad Ali Shah, the father of the late king Umjad Ali Shah. Of Nusseeruddin Hyder and Umjad Ali Shah, he was, of course, first cousin. The hatred of cousins is proverbial, and in 1833 or thereabouts, he fell out with his royal relative. It was an unfortunate quarrel. These royal grandees affected to despise the territorial barons, but their own position as pensioners on royal bounty was at best precarious. Once fallen under displeasure, they had no alternative resource to fall back upon. It was to remedy this state of things, indeed, that the famous provision for all her descendants was made by the Buhoo Begum. The evidence of Mr. Knighton's wretched mendacious compilation is nothing, but Nusseeruddin Hyder was far from an angel on a throne. Being master of the situation, he, probably with the object of bringing him down to his feet, stopped his cousin's stipend. Almost any other man in the grandee's position would have acted according to the king's expectation. But Ikbaloood Dowlah was made of sterner stuff than to whine about the palaces and gardens of Lucknow, praying for the intercession of women, young and old, and making interest with male, female, epicene and hermaphrodite. After a fruitless application to the British Residency in Oudh, he came down to Calcutta, resolved to lay his grievances before the British Government. This was no mean enterprise in those days—evidence of no small force of character for a man in that position. Our very progress is in the way of our doing justice to the achievement of the past. Every character and every deed should be judged of in relation to its peculiar circumstances. All our ideas are relative. In losing sight of the circumstances of the period, we fail in a right understanding of actors and actions. Modern enlightenment and improvements disqualify us from realising the difficulties, and consequently lead us to undervalue the triumphs, of former times. When almost every failed entrance examinee talks of going to Europe to become a barrister, we wonder our grandfathers made so much of Ram Mohan Roy or Dwarka Nath Tagore's visit to England. When every dancing girl in Lucknow or Delhi, in a dull season, purposes to come down to Bengal to ply her profession, we are unable to realize the enterprise of the men of Upper India who, forty or fifty years ago, made the Grand Tour to Calcutta. As yet, out of Calcutta, Bombay and Madras, geography was not taught either in vernacular or English. Travelling was cultivated neither as a pleasure nor an accomplishment. Nay, it was understood only as a pilgrimage or a penalty. Let us remember that in those days there were not only no railways but no convenience for communication at all, that where we have the electric telegraph, mutually connecting all parts of the empire, and connecting them with all civilized parts of the globe, there was an uncertain, costly, and tedious Post for transmission of letters, that the steam passage to England was an embryo in the brain or a new experiment, that ice, then the luxury of European Merchant Princes and the highest officials, was still made in the fields about the present railway station at Hooghly, that the roads were bad and dangerous, that people from Mymensing and Comilla going to Dacca hardly expected to return home, that about fifty per cent. of the Bengal pilgrims to Benares were sure to be robbed and murdered between the Doomoordah and Colgong pirates, that—not to talk of Nimsaran or Hurdwar or Pushkar—Baidyanath was more inaccessible than the elder Jwala Mukhi, that Lucknow was the capital of a Mussulman Kingdom whose Botany Bay was Cawnpore, that Calcutta itself was for the most part impassable and a sink of dirt and stink and disease and death, where crime and violence stalked about unpunished, and we shall be better able to conceive what was involved in the peregrinations of a Prince of the Blood Royal of Oudh in quest of justice. But there is no need for so much historical imagination. There is an instance in point in the later annals of Oudh itself. Some idea may be formed at once of royal degeneracy and helplessness in that classic kingdom and of the troubles of travellers in those days, from the fact that on the Annexation, in 1856, the indignant ex-King resolved to proceed with his whole family to England to lay in person his complaint at the foot of the throne. But the difficulties he experienced in moving down country and the hardships he suffered on the voyage to Calcutta, effectually cured him of all idea of venturing out on the wide ocean. Even so late as twenty years back, the respectable citizens of the Oudh metropolis, who were wont to despise the people of other parts of India as comparatively barbarous, used to flock around their friends returned from the service of His Majesty Wajid Ali Shah at Calcutta listening to the wondrous tales of houses in the water and discussing the possibility of such edifices. In 1862, a well known musician of Lucknow, who in his youth had been to the Dekkan in the service of the celebrated Dewan Chundoo Lall, having promised to accompany us to Calcutta, at the last moment backed out, because, as he said, with almost tears in his eyes, it was a deadly journey. We have ourselves known men who remembered the sensation caused in Oudh by the boldness of Nawab Ikbaloood Dowlah and of Syad Hussan Ali.

If in those days the difficulties of enterprise were great, it was not altogether without its compensations. There was no such antagonism between Native and European as since. It was the era of patronage—Natives looked up to Europeans, and Europeans were not above looking after natives. Native enlightenment was a relief to the surrounding darkness which oppressed the Europeans. It was too rare to dazzle.

Even native grievances were welcome to a society of Europeans cut off from Europe, pining in exilium. So when the apparition of a handsome young offshoot of the Royal House of Oudh dropped on this metropolis, "society" embraced it with open arms and made the most of it. The stranger became the reigning "lion." But this kind of thing never lasts, and soon as the young exile proceeded to open his portfolio, he began to prove uninteresting. It is creditable to the young man that his reception did not turn his head, so that he could bear with fortitude the subsequent neglect. He could do it all the better that, as in justice it must be admitted, some of the best of Anglo-Indians sympathised with him to the last—Sir Charles Metcalfe, Mr. Trevelyan (now Sir Charles) and Mr. Batten. For a man brought up in the stifling atmosphere of a haughty and superstitious court in those times, he showed a wonderful desire and aptitude for improvement. He early saw the need of knowledge of English for a better intercourse with Europeans, and, believing it must be useful to the conduct of his suit, he commenced to learn the language. He not only moved in society but enquired a good deal into the country and the Government. He must have been struck by the contrast between his native Oudh and British Bengal. He published his observations in Persian and English in a treatise entitled Ikkal e Fereng with a portrait of the author. The book is now extremely rare. It is a literary curiosity, but not worse than many works of scribbling plutocrats now or then. A suitor's éloge on the State to which he prays for mercy rather than justice, is, under the best of circumstances, not likely to be worth much. But the attempt is characteristic. As a measure for raising political capital, it was vain. The hate of his kinsman and King pursued him to Calcutta. Notwithstanding the interest created by him there, his petition to the Government of India met with scant success. Every effort was made by the court of Lucknow, through the Resident and its agents, to bully him to submission to the royal mercy. But Ikkalood Dowlah would not kiss the hem he had spurned. Nor did he despair, though in those days the Government of India was supreme and its decision practically final. He conceived the bold idea of repairing to London to try, if he could, to persuade the Home Government.

So he went to Europe. There he had a repetition of the first lionising and subsequent neglect. He swerved not from his purpose, but went to work steadily and quietly and remained at it. It was an arduous, nay, hopeless mission. But his perseverance at last triumphed. It cost him so much trouble and took him so many years, that, by the time he attained his end and might return to his country, he had lost his country as it were. Oudh had ceased to be a nation, and the court of Lucknow were dispersed as exiles. A young Irishman from the army might now send to prison the proudest noble at the complaint of the meanest mehter, or, for that matter, without complaint whatever, in the very capital which Ikkalood Dowlah and his compeers once walked as very gods. Meanwhile, he had become acclimatized, civilly and physically naturalized, in the land of his long sojourn. And there he elected to remain. He has led a roving sort of life. The continual necessity he had been under of shifting his residence from place to place, since he left Lucknow, at last gave him a wandering disposition. He has travelled through Europe more times than most European grandees have done. He has left no country untouched. As he has no business, he takes his own time and convenience about his movements. His is indeed the "business of pleasure." Numerous as have been the Indian travellers and sojourners in Europe, none have approached him in his line. Babu Dwarkanath Tagore and Prince Gholam Mahammad and the Nawab of Surat and Moonshee Buzloor Rahim and Raja Rampal Singh went to Europe twice each, the Moorshedabad Princes thrice some of them, but to little purpose. Ikkalood Dowlah alone knows life in all its variety throughout the West. He has friends in every capital and great city on that side the Persian Gulf. Throughout all the temptations of such a career, he has preserved his character in a way to make him worthy the friendship of the greatest and best and most righteous in every land. What we hold to be of more significance is that he has preserved his faith. Though a lover of mankind, in harmony with the followers of every creed, he is a Mussulman of Mussulmans. A citizen of the world, he is yet a kind of artificial Persian in sympathy, as he is a Shiah by religion; and for the last forty years and more, he has made his home at Bagdad near the shrines of the Martyrs. He occasionally goes round Europe, visiting his old friends.

We ought to add that he has always been of great help to not simply Indians but all Orientals visiting Europe on business or pleasure. His intelligence and vast experience and numerous connections are of priceless importance in advising and assisting foreigners in difficulty.

Why does not the Nawab end, as he began, as an author? His memoirs must be very interesting. A Mussulman Henry Crabbe Robinson who has travelled more than the Englishman talked, would certainly be an acquisition to literature.

THE CALCUTTA MUNICIPALITY BILL.

LICENSING OF CARTS.

WE must look to the Hon'ble Sir Henry Harrison in charge of the Calcutta Municipal Amendment Bill, to terminate the very unsatisfactory state of things that has so long prevailed in regard to the licensing of carts in some of the suburban towns. So far as the Suburbs proper and Howrah are concerned, the arrangement works well and without a hitch, and this because carts kept or used within the limits of Calcutta or Howrah, are registered and licensed in one place, namely, the Calcutta Municipal Office, and it is provided that "the total net proceeds of the fees half-yearly received by the Commissioners [of Calcutta] for the registration of carts shall be divided between the Municipalities of Calcutta and Howrah and such other Municipalities adjacent to Calcutta or Howrah as the Lieutenant-Governor shall think entitled to a share in such receipts, in such proportion as the Lieutenant-Governor may, from time to time, determine." In virtue of the latter clause, the Suburban Municipality and, we believe, the South-Dum-Dum Municipality also, are admitted into this common arrangement. The Municipalities of Baranagar, lately called North-Suburban, and of the South-Suburbs, do not participate in this scheme, and the result is a double and sometimes triple system of registration, and great inconvenience to trade. In consequence of the exclusion, for instance, of the Baranagar Municipality from the above arrangement, it has its own registration of carts. It registers carts kept within its limits as well as seizes Calcutta carts found plying within them. The Calcutta carts thus avoid these neighbouring towns, and the consequence is, when any one is in need of a cart to carry goods from Calcutta to Baranagar, he can hardly get hold of one. Messrs. George Henderson and Company, Agents of the Baranagar Jute Mills, often complained of this, and, failing to obtain a remedy, they have had cargo-boats and steamers of their own built at great cost for the carriage of their goods. The Calcutta carts are easily hired for traffic up to the Cossipore Jute Presses, but the Baranagar Mills are practically boycotted. To private individuals, the inconvenience is of daily occurrence. Unless one luckily comes across a Suburban Municipal cart, he has no chance of getting his goods conveyed, except by boat or men. The Suburban carts are available, because of an arrangement which is another hardship on them. They are doubly registered, once by the Calcutta Municipality and again by the Suburban Municipality, for plying outside the Suburbs into Baranagar, for which it receives a moiety of the proceeds, the other moiety being paid to the Baranagar Municipality. This is an arrangement between these two Municipalities which would cease, if Sir Henry Harrison took advantage of the opportunity offered by the amendment of the law to introduce one equitable comprehensive system for all these neighbouring towns.

But this is not all. Far worse oppression ensues from the operation of a certain provision of the Calcutta Municipal Act, which we find retained in the Amended Bill, and which is as follows:—Section 88 of the Amended Bill is a reproduction of the provision in question and exempts from registration by the Calcutta Municipal Commissioners, three classes of carts, one of which is enumerated thus: "which are kept at any place more than eight miles distant from Government House and are only temporarily and casually used within the Municipality of Calcutta or Howrah." The enforcement of this so-called exemption clause is a fruitful source of tyranny. There are carts kept within the North-Suburban (Baranagar) and South-Suburban (Behala) Municipalities which find sufficient employment to meet the local trade only. They never stray outside the limits of their own Municipalities to which they pay half-yearly registration fees for obtaining their local licenses. These, however, are often seized, and hauled up before the Calcutta Police Magistracy and fined, and forced to take out licenses from the Calcutta Municipality. The Calcutta police constables are often found visiting the places where these carts are kept, and marching them away to the police court. There would be some excuse if these carts were seized when detected plying within prohibited limits, although the law does not authorize such seizure in case of temporary or casual use. But what are we say when they are seized in their own quarters where they have a perfect right to be kept and used, and for which keeping and use they have to make two half-yearly payments to the local Municipalities! The class of cartmen are too poor and helpless to protect themselves, and the complicated procedure prevailing on the subject apparently makes their own municipal authorities equally helpless too, or they should have long before set the matter to right. We call on the Hon'ble Dr. Sircar to move in the matter.

The above clause should be omitted, or its operation should be stopped by executive order. Sir Henry Harrison is quite competent to remove this grievance, in his capacity of Chairman. As to the removal of double registration, the provision in the Municipal Act requires no material alteration, only the practice should be amended and the adjacent municipalities added by name to those of the Suburbs and Howrah and made to participate in one great common system of registration. The absence of such a system works great mischief and inconvenience which should not continue,

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

ELAHIGUNGE PHENOMENON.

DEAR SIR,—Having lately arrived here, from my native village to practise law in the Sub-Divisional Moonsiff's Court at Lalbagh, I was informed by several old gentlemen of the station of a curious phenomenon, observed by them, some years back, at a place on the other side of the river Bhagrati. As the same seemed to me worthy of publication, I could not refrain from sending it to your much esteemed journal. They say, that there is a snug garden of the Manjari plants (a plant of the Jessamine class) situated close to the public road, at Elahigunge, having a spacious tank within it, upon which the last moon (harana-chandra) an insignificant inauspicious dark constellation (not observed by Hindoos, two days, in the year, once in Bhadra and again in Kartick) according to the Hindu astrologers of the solar system, had suddenly shed its silver rays one night and produced so violent a tide, that the whole contents of the tank overflowing the banks, watered the roots of the plants, long barren, and made the latter fruitful. Strange to say, the tide lasted for some months only, after which it subsided. The plant, with its exuberance of flowers, bowed down, as if asking for help; on which a prop being promptly supplied it then grew to be larger. Last year, it was observed in a different position, causing great annoyance to the proprietor. An efficient remedy was, however, discovered, by some of the sages and great Pandits of the city, in conjunction with one residing in that village, which restored manjari-plant to its former position. But the cure, thus effected, was of a temporary nature and the plant has again been just the same as before. I am eagerly waiting for the result of this evil omen.

THE SANTIPORE ELECTIONS.

SIR,—In your issue of the 14th January last, a correspondent who signs himself 'An Onlooker,' has made certain statements regarding some of the representative men elected for the municipal board of Santipore. If these statements have been made bona fide for the public good, I can but ask him to give out the names. One can only wonder at the random shafts he has sent flying in all directions instead of taking aim at the target. For fairness' sake, he should have mentioned by name every one of those whom he wanted to vilify.

As his language appears to be highly defamatory, and his conduct liable to criminal prosecution, I challenge him to give out his own name. So long as one keeps in the cloud and conceals his identity, he is but acting the sneak. Such dastardly conduct is highly reprehensible, and I make bold to denounce your candidate (correspondent?) as a mere tool of a particular disappointed candidate.

No doubt your correspondent thinks that it is a thousand pities that the rayyets did not recognise his idol Sarat—(that 'inglorious commoner') as their friend, but we know too well the lines

Whenever I hear a knave commend,
He bids me shun his worthy friend;

and do not wonder at the rayyets' backwardness to vote on his side.

Lastly I must admit, I can not find anything preeminently attractive in Babu Mathur Mohun Mookerjee—as a member of the Municipal Board of Santipore—to make him deserve that much-coveted title, 'the uncrowned king,' as 'An Onlooker' chooses to invest him with, unless the expression comes to be applied as an abuse according to what the Grammarians call "Degradation of words through course of time."

Holloway's Pills.—Important for the delicate.—It is difficult to determine which is the more trying to the human constitution, the damp, cold days of autumn and winter, or the keen, dry, easterly winds of spring. Throughout the seasons good health may be maintained by occasional doses of Holloway's Pills, which purify the blood and act as wholesome stimulants to the skin, stomach, liver, bowels, and kidneys. This celebrated medicine needs but a fair trial to convince the ailing and desponding that it will restore and cheer them without danger, pain, or inconvenience. No family should be without a supply of Holloway's Pills and Ointment, as by a timely recourse to them the first erring function may be reclaimed, suffering may be spared, and life saved.

THE KHYBER MALIKS.

ON the 13th January, the Malikhs of the Khyber were entertained at a grand Indian Zaafut by Nawab Abdool Lutef Bahadour, C.I.E. The leading members of the Mahomedan community, including Princes of the Oudh and Mysore families, landlords, merchants, learned men and professional men, were invited to meet them. The Malikhs were accompanied by Kazi Syud Ahmed Khan Bahadour, C.I.E., Attaché of the Foreign Office. Fifty gentlemen sat to the sumptuous banquet. At its conclusion, Nawab Abdool Lutef Bahadour rose and addressed the Malikhs in Urdu, his speech being interpreted sentence by sentence in Pushto by Kazi Syed Ahmed.

He said that--- their visit to Calcutta had given much pleasure to the Mahomedan community at Calcutta, and their presence at the entertainment was a source of much gratification to the gentlemen who had come to meet them. The pleasure which all present had derived from the company of his distinguished guests, was chiefly due to the advantages afforded by railway communication; for had it not been for the speedy and comfortable means of travelling thus provided, it would have been very inconvenient for them to have undertaken such a long journey,--perhaps, he would be more correct if he said practically impossible. For such means and appliances of comfortable travelling, all felt an additional cause of gratitude to the British Government for linking together the different Provinces of India, indeed, for uniting India with neighbouring countries. Formerly, not only was there an absence of such means of communication, but people could scarcely believe in the possibility of such wonders as the Malikhs themselves had now seen. The extraordinary speed, ease, and convenience, with which they had travelled all the way from the farthest end of India down to Calcutta, must have struck them. But with all their great and varied knowledge of arts and sciences, the British would not have been able to construct these iron roads, if the state of the country had not proved favorable to such peaceful and civilizing undertakings. History tells us that India in days gone by did not enjoy uninterrupted peace, and that the lives and properties of her subjects were in constant jeopardy, because her rulers were always at feud with each other, endangering the peace of the country. To construct railway communications and to engage in other peaceful pursuits, would have been simply impossible. Thus it was, as he need hardly add, on account of the justice and impartiality of English officials, that the land was enjoying its present state of prosperity and contentment. Our just and benign Government, moreover, have provided every means for the facility, comfort, and benefit of their subjects of every religion, and all classes of their subjects, by reason of their rights being protected and comforts brought within their easy reach, were pleased and contented. If there had been no fellow-feeling among the different nationalities of India, the present peace would not have been maintained, nor could we be living amidst people of different religious persuasions and nationalities in peace and unity. Without such peace and harmony, it would have been impossible for his distinguished visitors present to come to this country so far with so much ease and comfort, and without anxiety, and the Mahomedans of the town, now assembled, would not have had this opportunity of being so extremely delighted.

The Nawab continued that there were 5 crores or 50 millions of Mahomedans in India, whilst, in the whole world, the Mahomedan population was 180 millions. According to this calculation, about one-third of this population inhabit India. There are not so many Mahomedans either in Turkey, Persia, Turkistan, Afghanistan, Arabia, China, or Africa. The Mahomedans in India perform their religious rites and the sacred duties and observances of their faith with comfort, ease, and complete freedom, without the slightest let or hindrance; and for this, if for no other reason, they are heartily thankful to Her Imperial Majesty, the Queen of England and Empress of India, who is the sovereign of the largest number of Mahomedans in the whole world. The Nawab repeated that the visit of the Malikhs to Calcutta had, indeed, afforded the Mussulmans of the capital the highest pleasure, and he was sure that they, too, being the followers of the same faith, must be pleased to see the freedom of worship and religious institutions enjoyed by their co-religionists here in peace and comfort in everyday life. The Nawab concluded by thanking his guest for having (as he modestly expressed himself) submitted to the inconvenience of his humble banquet. He next thanked the distinguished nobles and gentlemen of the Mahomedan community of the town, who had so kindly assisted him by their presence in giving a warm welcome to his honored guests. He finally expressed his hearty thanks to his esteemed friend, Kazi Syed Ahmed Khan Bahadur, for so kindly contributing to the success of the evening's entertainment.

The Nawab ended his address by praying to the Almighty, that through His blessing the Malikhs might have a safe and pleasant journey back to their hearths and homes, and that they might find their relatives and friends in a state of perfect health and happiness.

The Malikhs, in reply, expressed their best thanks for the hospitality shown to them by the Nawab, and the honor done to them by the leaders of Mahomedan society.

The Kazi Sahab interpreted the speech of the Malikhs briefly as follows:--"Nawab Sahab, we are highly thankful to you, and to the Princes and other gentlemen whom we have met here to-night for the kindness and attention which you have shown to us in this city. And if you ever visit our native land, we shall try to do our utmost to attend to your comforts there, and on our return home we shall relate to our people the kindness, fellow-feeling, hospitality, and generosity shown, and honor done to us, by our Mahomedan brethren in this metropolis."

OPINION OF THE PRESS.

Dr. S. C. Mookerjee, the editor of what is undoubtedly one of the ablest papers in the country in point of literary power is the author of a pleasant little book of Travels in East Bengal..... The author is master of a racy style of English which many an Englishman may envy. Humorous descriptions and caustic satire enliven every page. There is throughout a vigour and freshness of style that lends a charm to the veriest commonplace. If there were, however, a higher purpose in the publication of this book than to lighten the weary evening hours of the ordinary reader, we confess to a feeling that the author has failed in such an object. We are afraid there is not poetry enough in us to body forth in imagination the beauty of the scenes which the author has described in his voyages to and fro between Dacca and Tipperah. Humourist as he is Dr. Mookerjee will remind us of the words of the poet that the point of a "jest lies more in the ear of him that hears it than in the tongue of him that utters it." As with the jest so is it with the description. We do not say that the charge is unfounded. Prosaic as we are, drudging away at the desk, perhaps it is that we lack capacity to follow in imagination what the author has doubtless delineated with an admirable pen.

One of the chief impressions that a reader will receive from a glance at the book is the somewhat strained relation between the Babus and the Anglo-Indians. The author pours a flood of ridicule upon the lordly airs of our "rulers." He hits hard indeed in his account of the Colonel at whist enduring a Babu looking on, when on board the steamer, and of the whiteman's condescension in bowing to the black nigger. Happily we in the South are not so badly off in our commerce with the representatives of Western civilization. In spite of several instances of conflict and misunderstanding Englishmen and Hindus pull on agreeably together. But the author, notwithstanding his involuntary feeling of aloofness from the European, is no stranger to the blessings for which the West has laid us in debt. He has a keen appreciation of the enjoyments of this Westernized life of ours. He looks for ever forward and casts no longing lingering look behind at the things with which we have shaken hands and parted. His heart is in the continuance of British supremacy in the East. And agitation is his utmost weapon for the maintenance of his rights. But he will have nothing with spurious agitation. We extract below a paragraph of excellent advice to his brethren of the press. [Extract.]

The author recounts his adventure with the Railway officials of Sealdah with considerable humour. We feel an irresistible temptation to quote it in extenso, but space forbids. How the greenback was no legal tender, why silver of the Calcutta mint was wanted and how the currency question stood stiff and frowning despite the Editors and Magistrates who had accompanied the author to bid him good-bye at the station, and how again with the advent of the Justice of the Peace all objection to receiving the currency-note vanished, are all narrated in a style that is fittingly characterized only by the word "delightful." In another place the author introduces the reader to the Hindu belief in the auspicious hour for starting on a journey in language of such playful rallery that we make no apology for quoting it. [Extract.]

The author has some trenchant criticism on the insolation of the Englishman, which makes him inaccessible to the complaints of extortion or plunder by their menials. They are too absorbed to know all that passes about them and the wrongs that are committed in their names are unnoticed as mere trifles for they have rarely any idea of their magnitude. It is only too well known throughout the country how blackmail in the shape of money or provisions is levied upon the inhabitants when the Collector is on tour. It would be difficult to believe the thing could go on under his very nose without his connivance if we did not know his exclusiveness and his distaste for mixing with the people.

The author devotes the greater part of the book to a description of the people and the external aspect of the country that he passed through in his two trips to Tipperah from Calcutta and back. He has a good deal to say about the customs of some of the people he becomes acquainted with. He makes a discovery of the debris of a Portuguese colony in Tipperah that has become debased in morality, and sunk in superstition. Although there is not much in the book that is instructive to the serious student, the grace of diction and the ease of style carry the reader pleasantly through. It would be difficult to rescue such a subject as he has chosen from dullness without his extraordinary commend of language. We cannot promise more than a brief span of life to the book. It will prove what is abundantly clear to the readers of the Reis and Ryyet that the author is an adept in English composition. He is a lover of nature and he paints scenes and situations with an artist's pencil.—The Hindu, November 7, 1887.

OXFORD STREET (late 533, Oxford St.), LONDON.

.....this interesting book. We are justified in so terming it, not on account of any romantic adventures that the author has to relate, nor of any very new discoveries in geography or natural history. There is something particular as regards ethnology; and a great deal of human nature in the book, shown to the reader with a simplicity and candour which bear testimony to its truth. Called from the busy haunts of men in the city to dwell for a time in Independent Tipperah as a judicious adviser to its Chief, Doctor Mookerjee relates his adventures during the several journeys to and fro in that capacity, without revealing the secrets of the State, like a good diplomatist. He has adhered strictly to the advice which he offers to his brethren of the Native Press, and has written what he saw and knows, without revealing all, considering what he might properly say and what withhold..... The above seems to be a curious passage to be found in a book of travels, and appears to have no connection with the subject. But it arises from a casual reference to a slaughter house, and a writer who "thundered weekly against the outrage of locating shambles in the immediate vicinity of a Hindoo temple"—where, in fact, no temple could be said to exist. Hence, the Doctor advises his fellow-scribes not to be Pharisees, righteous over-much, but to look and be sure of their facts. In the same spirit, he has written his book. He gives an account of his travels, which seem often to have been voyages, upon the wide-spreading rivers of Eastern Bengal which in the rains become almost inland seas. On these he philosophises on the nature of the country and the people, making careful observation of his facts; and though he sometimes fancies he knows better than his boatmen, and more than suspects that they are getting the better of him, he submits with a grace that would have done credit to Socrates, and accepts the apparently inevitable in the interests of peace. The Doctor is a close observer of nature, animate and inanimate, with an eye to the picturesque as well as to the sublime and beautiful. And although there is a vein of cynicism running through many of his observations, it is tempered by such evident good nature, that even a stranger would conceive him to be a laughter-loving rather than a stern philosopher. This is evident in his descriptions of his boatmen and others, while he denounces the lawlessness which has made the poor fishermen suspicious even of honest intentions, because they have so long been the helpless victims of marauders stronger than themselves. Their only defence is flight or deceit, and the latter is their justification as a mode of self-protection. We are shown not only the weakness of the people, but the shortcomings of the administration that leave these things possible..... The author is impartial in his censures..... There is much in the book to which space forbids us to refer. That it is not a prosy one may be gathered from the fact that, for its 300 pages, there are nearly as many index references. Many of the subjects are necessarily but lightly treated, but all sensibly and fairly. And Dr. Mookerjee is such a master of the English language that in the whole book we have scarcely found a phrase that might not have been written by an Englishman "to the manor born." There is nothing in it at which any one could reasonably take offence; and there is much from which both Englishmen and natives may learn greatly-needed lessons.—The Indian Daily News, Nov. 22, 1887.

"TRAVELS IN BENGAL. Such is the title of a most interesting little work published a short time ago. Its author is Babu Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee, the well-known Editor of the Reis and Rayyet, the most original, cleverly-written and interesting journal in India. Babu Sambhu Chunder is one of the veteran Indian writers in English. He is the master of a most happy, racy pleasant style, which you can easily make out from amongst the writings of a hundred different men. In racy humorous writing Babu Sambhu Chunder has no rival among his Indian contemporaries. He won his first laurels, we believe, by his writings in his own periodical, the Mookerjee's Magazine, now long-defunct. In this magazine articles of great learning and excellence appeared, mostly from the pen of Babu Sambhu Chunder. He has written several other booklets. His Causes of the Mutiny; Mr. Wilson, Lord Canning and the Income Tax; the Career of an Indian Princess, Her Highness the late Secundra Begum of Bhopal; and the Prince in India and to India are publications which attracted considerable notice. His latest production "Travels in Bengal" is a work of great merit. It is at once a most faithful and interesting picture of natural scenery and life in Bengal, although Mr. Mookerjee does not profess to write a picture of Bengal life and uses his pencil in its portraiture only in passing. The dedication is characteristic. [Extract.]

The "Travels" are travels in East Bengal, travels and voyages between Calcutta and Independent Tipperah. We do not believe many people in this side of India know that there is such an independent State as Tipperah. But nevertheless such a state exists. We will give here a summary of its history in the words of Mr. Mookerjee—He writes:—[Extract.] Mr. Mookerjee was Dewan of Independent Tipperah for some five years in all between 1877 and 1881. The travels are an account of his voyages to and from Tipperah.

Those who have travelled in Bengal, particularly in its Eastern districts, which are the districts described in Mookerjee's book, will bear him out in his statement that Lower Bengal is not stale, flat and unprofitable, that, on the contrary, she is the beautifullest country in the world. She has no high mountains, but she has rivers apparently as vast as the sea, to make her scenery grand and majestic. She has a hundred rivers ever overflowing with water, thousands of transparent lakes, covered with the lily and a hundred beautiful water-flowers, thousands of seas of ever-waving paddy fields, thousands of clusters of bamboo and of great trees dressed in beautiful creepers adorning the river banks, to make her the loveliest country in the world. Even a Bengali needs to see and travel Bengal to adequately know her thousand witching charms. For a foreigner it is well nigh impossible to get even an approximate idea of what they are like from description, however true and faithful. Let us hear what our author has to say on the subject. We read:—[Extract.] A paddy sea is thus inimitably described:—[Extract.]

We could cull many such gems. But space forbids it. We will, however, quote some passages of another kind. Our traveller, though old in years, is evidently young in heart, for no one in the romantic age of youth could be more appreciative of female charms than our traveller. In every other page you find our author describing in terms of enthusiasm some rural girl or woman of beauty. [Extract.] In the next page we find our traveller's attention [Extract.]

There is the description, physical and moral, of a Colonel, which we cannot resist the temptation of reproducing, although the article has already exceeded the usual length. [Extract.]

We have now given extracts enough to show that the little book of travels is most delightful reading. It contains graphic descriptions of natural scenery, faithful portraiture of men and manners, and happy, good humoured observations on them. There is not an ill-natured or unkind word in the whole book—it overflows in every page with the milk of human kindness. Every observation testifies to the author being a keen observer of men and things, as an example of which we can mention the instructive and interesting chapter on the Native Christians of Portuguese extraction in Tipperah. Again, although the book does not pretend to deal with life in Bengal, the glimpses of that life we find in it are very considerable and pleasant. We will now conclude by recommending the book to all who may wish to spend a few hours amidst happy thoughts and pleasant pictures.—

S. K. C.

—The Tribune, Nov. 26, 1887.

If we have not before noticed Mr. Sambhu C. Mookerjee's Travels in Bengal, which was published some months ago, it is not because the little book is either dull or pointless. It contains, on the contrary, much interesting matter, though some of the incidents are over-weighted with detail in what is facetiously called a "little booklet." The author's view as a rule is, by the way, facetious: he is given even to punning; but he is also sentimental in the highest degree—"A naked Whiteman" hurts his susceptibilities; a Hindu girl, bathing in the river, throws him into an ecstasy of delight: "she had such large languishing eyes!" But he is nothing if not philosophical, and his reflections on this or that social and political subject are not without their moral. Mr. Sambhu C. Mookerjee was formerly Minister to the "last of the Nawabs Nazim of Bengal, Behar and Orissa" and afterwards Minister of the Maharaja of Tipperah. He is a man, therefore, of experience, and when he speaks his brethren should listen to him.... Travels in Bengal is a readable book, and it abounds in anecdotes which are often as instructive as amusing, and it is not spoiled by too many political allusions, though, of course, some few have crept in.—The Pioneer, Dec. 1887.

With our author, details about petty incidents in his journeyings to and from his zemindari management are only second in importance to details as to the difficulty of getting his valuable services dispensed with when he wanted leave from his employer. He never forgets that he is a firstclass classical Baboo, and a Brahman of high degree, except when he considers that it is incumbent on his character for 19th century enlightenment to sneer at Hinduism, and exalt his personal pretensions at the expense of the old religion. Sambhu C. Mookerjee's book is valuable in a way, as showing the inordinateness of vanity, and what the Yankees call 'high falutin,' at which Baboodom can arrive, when not under the supervision of superior authority, e. g., our author's budgerow and cook-boat are always referred to as a "fleet." In his preface he refers complacently to "the mere English reader." At page 31 he ostentatiously laments that he cannot run away from Court, because he would do so "at the risk of causing something of an interregnum, so to say." In a similar key the record of vaingloriousness is carried on all through the book.

"It was with the odour of New Year's Day festivities still on me," says the Baboo, "that I proceeded to my work in the far East. Somehow, this odour does not seem to have recommended itself to his fellow-travellers. On board the steamer going to Dacca, for instance, the Baboo met a British Colonel with a pretty wife." Reference to this episode is made on the 6th page of the book. On the 9th page we are introduced to "a couple of fine healthy girls, with well proportioned, nimble limbs * * * * * sitting at the edge of the water, elaborately scrubbing and towel-ling their persons, and helping to clean one another." And so on. About 9 o'clock that same morning the Baboo "cleaned the cooking utensils and plates in the sands of the beach," and at night the boatmen on board the budgerow sang without asking the Baboo's permission, although, says he naively, "I am known to be somebody."

Here is a quotation ex uno disce omnes. It refers to the Rajah's dilatoriness in giving our author his congé.

"Thus from day to day, finally from morn to noon, from noon to dewy eve, and again the following morning, from an amiable inability to make up the mind—a generous indisposition to part! Far from unpleasant is this dilly dally, where there is no urgency, no peremptory call to promptitude. British employes know not this 'unbought grace of life.' They will probably not appreciate it. They have not the happiness of serving men, but are mere parts of a machine. He serve flesh and blood. The position of officials in Native States has its disadvantages; many enough to be sure; but it is not without ample compensations, and this is one of them."

Is it possible for the men of the East and the men of the West to be sympathetic in idea? Be that as it may, unless the author of Justice Onocool Chunder Mookerjee's Memoirs adventures again into literature, we do not think that a sillier book than Sambhu C. Mookerjee's Travels is likely to appear for a long while.—The Calcutta Review.

INFALLIBLE SPECIFIC FOR LEUCORRHOEA.

A week's use of this medicine not only cures Leucorrhœa—the characteristic white, green and bloody discharge—but also removes the concomitant intense menstrual pains, and all the various complaints and symptoms incidental to menstrual difficulties and green sickness, and prepares the system for conception. Price: for a week's consumption, Rs. 2, packing and postage 4 annas.

There are capital medicines besides—for piles, all the 20 kinds of flux—such as spermatorrhœa, diabetes, &c.—diarrhœa, rheumatism, puerperal complaints, cataract of the eye, naera, asthma, &c.

[Certificate.]

"I have known Babu Rajendra Nath Ghoshal kibiraj for upwards of 15 years, and I can bear ample testimony to the wonderful efficacy of his medicine in the treatment of diseases of the womb. While Assistant Surgeon of Monghyr and subsequently, I have known him to cure the most obstinate cases of uterine Leucorrhœa and other uterine derangements, organic and functional. I can safely call his medicine the Specific for Leucorrhœa and painful menstruation. Ladies who have been subject to these diseases for years and were barren have been cured and borne children.

No. 310

SEBASTIAN.

A TALE OF THE PORTUGUESE IN INDIA.
[Concluded from P. 50.]

CANTO II.

16

The Chief arrives, his sword in hand
And followed by his chosen band,
Whose wrath is fierce against the men
Who'd beard the lion in his den.
Though unprepared, with foeman near
Nor chief, nor follower own a fear.
Well tutored long in war's fierce game,
With passions kindled into flame,
With Tartar blood within their veins
From sires who forged a nation's chains,
They suited well old Yusuff's life,
Whose glory was a scene of strife,
And eager were they all to wield
Once more their sabres in the field.

17

The walls are scaled, the foe have gained
The outworks and have half obtained
The fort, the guns are seized and manned,
So well the fierce surprise is planned.
All vainly do the Moors oppose
The progress of their daring foes,
Few turbaned heads escape the sword
And Moslem blood in streams is poured;
Revenge and hatred nerve each arm
And propagate the wild alarm,
But fiercer battles meet the foe,
'Tis Yusuff and his band, who show
The Lusian buccaneers, how dear
They barter life, how little fear
The boldest foe, the keenest steel,
How little heed the wounds they feel.
But vain the effort, idly vain,
No vantage can their courage gain
O'er that untamed undaunted crew,
Whose weapons still their best blood drew.
Now yielding to the fierce attack
The Moslem band is driven back.
They falter, now in haste retire
And scarce escape the Lusian fire.
Dismayed they reach the citadel,
Its strengthened walls may serve them well,
There 'gainst the foe they yet may stand
And haply crush the daring band.

The place is won, and save the few,
The dauntless few with Yusuff still,
There's none that will the fight renew
Or dare defy the conquerors' will.

But Yusuff would'nt tamely yield
Though shivered scimitar and shield.
The Chief had fought in times gone by
When youthful ardour fired his eye,
Beneath Akbar--the good and great;
And thinking on those famous times
When glory brightened Eastern crimes,
His heart grows proud, his soul elate,
He will not shame his noble sires,
Though age has dimmed his youthful fires,
He will not shun the fight and live,
To lose what life can never give.
Beware Sebastian lest the morn
Show arms subdued and banners torn.

19

Beleagured is the citidel,
And fierce attacks the foe have made;
But Yusuff and his band repel
Each hot attempt at escalade.
The morn has dawned--upris'n the sun--
And yet the fortress is unwon,
But now they bring the cannon's aid
Will wall and tower in dust be laid,
Yet Yusuff and his band have vowed
To conquer or to die.
Wide fly the gates, out pour the crowd,
And half the Lusians fly,
Allah ho Akbar is the cry;
But fainter and more faint it grows
As perish they whose voices rose;
The Chief has fallen by the hand
Of him who leads the Lusian band,
And one by one each turbaned head
Is bleeding stretched among the dead.
The fort is won, the struggle o'er,
And hostile weapons clash no more.

20

Now where is dark eyed Gulnar?
She who like some soft burning star,
Beaming benignly in the sky,
When not another star is nigh,
But clouds and mist and darkness round
Nothing lovelier near it found,
Moved on amongst her dark-souled race
The giver good of light and grace,
The one sweet spirit of the place.
Now where is she? she who of late
So sweetly soothed Sebastian's fate,
And won the soldier's love's heart
Till it became a pain of art,
Though vengeance proved his way,
And Freedom lit it with her ray.
Now where is she? She though smitten
With love more deep than ever was written

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money order if possible, as the easiest and most convenient medium particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No receipt will be given, any other being unnecessary and likely to cause confusion.

That it became a part of life
 Together growing and decaying
 Dissevered not by storm or strife,
 And all too pure for base betraying.
 Though smitten thus, could yet forego
 Such pleasant dreams and thoughts as flow
 From love thus deep, because she felt
 Her faith, her race, her name,
 Would take the taint of shame
 If linked along with him she knelt
 At other than the Moslem shrine,
 And deemed her prophet not divine.
 Where, where is she? Sebastian rushes
 Through vacant rooms, deserted halls,
 And still on Gulnâr he calls ;
 But that sweet voice of hers is mute
 As silent as her shattered lute.
 Ha ! who lies stretched all lifeless there ?
 'Tis she ! and from her bosom fair
 Oh God ! oh God ! the life blood gushes.

21

Like one who feels one moment more
 Of life not worth preserving,
 All hopes, all joys for ever o'er
 Life's pleasures undeserving,
 Sebastian gazed, and gazed again
 And felt unutterable pain,
 For never had he so adored
 Now leaning on his crimsoned sword
 With tearless eye, but heaving breast,
 His soul its anguish thus express,
 His eye still wildly fixed upon
 That form of grace whose talisman was gone.

22

"And is it thus each hope is crushed !
 Thus life's divinest music hushed !
 Gay youth of each fond tie bereft,
 And nought but death and darkness left,
 The long, long night which brings no day
 To chase the changeless gloom away.
 Sad fate ! but by that heavenly smile
 So winning and so free from guile,
 Still lingering round thy yet red lip,
 Where never more the bee may sip,
 I deem—nor idly do I deem
 Thy soul hath winged its blessed flight
 To that fair region where thy dream
 Of love shall be for ever bright,
 While at the fount of Sulsabeel
 Thy soul quaffs joy mine may not feel.
 Then blest art thou, fond maid :—but I Must live and move and feel like one
 Who, with a mind by love undone,
 Turns fondly to the gold bright sky,
 And worships some especial star,
 And in that madness wears out life.
 Thus must I live, lost Gulnâr,
 In spite of human cares and strife.
 Beloved girl !—I dared to think
 Fate might have riveted the link
 So strongly wrought—I fondly nursed,
 And thou awak'st the passion first—
 That feeling of a love divine
 My coarser spirit caught from thine.
 I hoped—that hope was vain indeed,
 And vanished—makes this bosom bleed
 I hoped that if I came in power,
 In war's array—I might that hour
 Have called thee mine.

Tis over now :

The hue grows paler on thy brow,
 And these vain words of mine reach not
 I fear that far and sacred spot

Where thy sweet spirit moves in light,
 Where dwells no ill, where comes no blight.
 Enough—a dark and wild career
 I have begun—nor dare appear
 Of broken heart, of spirit sunk,
 Although each desperate hope be drunk
 With recklessness. Why, what to me
 Can Life or Death or ought now be ?
 The charm is gone which made it worth
 My while to love this now dull Earth."

23

Henceforth, the wild Sebastian sought
 Oblivion to each bitter thought
 In battle field—rude was his fame ;
 But long the terror of his name
 Was felt and owned afar and near,
 Till neighbouring princes learnt to fear
 The arms of those fierce Portuguese
 Whose vessels swept the Indian seas.
 Men spoke of deeds too dark for song,
 Of tyranny endured too long ;
 But now it boots not to relate
 That bold man's crime—his life and fate.
 They say, though that at certain times
 'Twas doomed remorse for bygone crimes,
 He seemed for days as one possessed,
 Nor shared he food, nor took he rest,
 But ever from his lips there came
 In accents wild an unknown name,
 And ever as arose the evening star
 The one loved name he breathed was—

GULNAR.

NEWS AND COMMENTS.

A MUSICAL prodigy has arisen in France in a violinist named Henr Marteau, aged fourteen. He has been lately playing at Vienna where he has extorted the admiration of Herr Speidel of that capital.

OUR friends down South may now have some rest. They were furious at the Madras University having proposed white as the color for the academic costume. The Senate have now given in and declared for black—as the visible sign of Southern enlightenment.

DR. CONSTANTINE JAMES, a former collaborator of Magendie and Claude Bernard, has just published a work entitled L'Hypnotisme Expliqué dans sa Nature et dans ses Actes, in which he gives, from his observation of nervous patients, many curious facts to illustrate his theory of the influence exercised over them by those able to dominate their wills. The book is swelled at the end by a narrative of "Conversations with the Emperor Don Pedro on Darwinism."

ON January 23rd, Lieutenant-Colonel Yate, telegraphs from Khamiab, that he and Major Peacock have been permitted to return by the Russian railway. He expected to break up his mission by 28th January, and to proceed with a Russian party by boat to Chajui. His escort will march back under Subadar Mahomed Hussein to Quetta, which it should reach by about April 15th.

THE following telegram dated the 7th instant has been received from the Resident in Kashmir who is at Sialkot—"Cholera has broken out at Jammu, it commenced among troops ; and, during my stay up to the 4th February, there had been 40 seizures and 7 deaths in three days. Reports received yesterday and to-day shew on 5th February 17 cases and 11 deaths in the Army and 3 deaths in the city, and on the 6th February 48 cases and 10 deaths in the Army and three cases in the city. The Darbar has moved two battalions into camp at Baribanna."—Press Commissioner.

CHOWDHRI MAHDEO PERSHAD, Zemindar, Nanpore, in the district of Mozufferpore, has offered to bear the entire cost, estimated at

Rs. 27,000, of a new bridge over the Lakhundai river at Sitamarhee, and has paid Rs. 10,000 already.

THE King of Sweden who is one of the most prolific of royal authors, and a poet into the bargain, has in the press and nearly ready for publication a magnificent edition of his poetry including several pieces written within the last ten years. The book ends with a farewell in which the Bard confesses his trust in God and in His Providence in human affairs.

SOME balloons for the Italian Army in Africa have been tried with success in Paris, in a high wind without a hitch, each balloon being worked by six men. For signalling purposes during the night, each aerostat—as the whole machine is called—carries a lamp equal to seventy candles in power. The balloon and its appurtenances are coiled up in a box and placed on a four-wheeled vehicle, a pulley which lets out the cable and acts as an anchor to the aerostat, being placed at the back of the carriage. The cables are interlaced with wires for telephonic and telegraphic communication with the aeronaut. To make it independent of local water supply, gas is packed in steel tubes—forty of which will float a balloon.

FROM a letter in the Eastern Herald, it appears that the Mahomedans of Mhow are divided into two parties, one headed by Kazi Hafiz Mahomed Akrum and the other lead by Moonshee Imdad Ali and Moonshee Abdulla, and that they are frequently in hot water and manage to keep native society in a ferment. Some of the latter representing that a dispute was likely to take place in connection with a mosque, the Cantonment Magistrate, on the report of the Police, has closed the mosque in Tinguli, Mhow. The correspondent complains of the step and says that on a previous occasion a similar representation was made but no notice was taken of it. According to him, the Moonshees are jealous of Kazi Akrum and are bent upon ousting him from the Kaziship and the application about the mosque seems to be part of the plot. They have applied for the introduction of the Kazi Act, which is said to be distasteful to the Mahomedans of Mhow.

THE Calcutta Correspondent of the Moulmain Advertiser, writing on the 18th January, says—"Today is the Pen-and-ink holiday, the Suruswatee Pooja of the Hindus." Such is the influence of a great example! Our contemporary's correspondent, of course, got the description of the Suruswatee Pooja from the late Kristo Das Pal. It was one of the weaknesses of that lamented publicist every year to speak of the Pen and Ink Festival, and although we corrected him at last, we see the mistake survives. Suruswatee Pooja is the worship of the goddess of Science and Art. Pens and inkstands and books and instruments are used as symbols, but no ink. The ink-pots are carefully cleaned of every drop or spot of the black fluid or any kind of ink. The goddess herself is spotless white. All writing and reading is forbidden on that day. If writing be absolutely required, the proper rule is to write with some improvised instrument dripped in a red fluid not ordinarily employed for ink. It would be more correct to call the Pooja the "No-Pen-and-ink Festival"!

ACCORDING to the Morning Post, Cashmere is threatened with a new disaster—air-quake. The description given of it is that it is "almost indefinable. The atmosphere seems convulsed at times, and you feel as if an invisible agency were striving hard to off with your head." That informant is clearly in danger, and he knows it, poor man!—the second person being figuratively used for the singular first. As for the country, there need, perhaps, be no great anxiety respecting an evil too impalpable for definition.

THE People's Friend notices the last administration Report of the Vizagapatam Agency (for 1886-87). Our contemporary admires the literary workmanship of Mr. H. G. Turner, the Agent to the Governor. It adds—

"With the exception of Mr. Carmichael and Mr. Sullivan, former Government Agents, there are none in the Service who write in the pleasing, unofficial style; that is, for fear of being snubbed as flippant, they give us bare facts and statistics in the baldest language imaginable."

We are told that the literature of the Report "has not been acceptable to Mr. Secretary Stokes, whose G.O.'s are epigrammatic." Is that last word a loyal periphrasis for jejune? Or does our contemporary mean simply laconic, without implying brilliancy or neatness?

DR. P. M. GUPTA, Civil Surgeon, Tura, has been invested with the powers of a Magistrate, Third Class, under the Criminal Procedure Code, and with those of an Assistant-Commissioner under the Garo Hills Rules, within the Garo Hills. Dr. Gupta belongs to a rather remarkable family of East Bengal. He is himself a worthy man of rare modesty.

NOTES AND LEADERETTES.

THE Mandalay Herald draws attention to the admirable silk that is produced in Upper Burma from the Tussore Moth. It seems finer and more uniform in quality than the Indian silk, while the very rude methods of Burmese manufacture succeed in producing a far more even texture than in the Indian article.

From time to time attempts were made to start mills in Mandalay; and the enlightened and doubly versatile Mindon Min, who dabbled in all sorts of experiments, did not overlook this industry, but, as usual, nothing came out of his attention. The industry remains in almost its primitive state. Scarcely any care is taken in saving the cocoons; and no effort is made to prepare the raw silk for the European market, where its fine thread, good colour, evenness, strength, elasticity, and readiness to absorb dye, should command a high price.

Our contemporary suggests the exportation of the silk, for which there is a considerable demand in England and the Continent as well as Australia. The supply of the worm may be indefinitely increased. Enormous quantities, brought to the markets by the villagers of the woods, are eaten. Lightly fried, the caterpillar is good eating.

Meanwhile, a brisk trade might arise if European Society in the East can be induced to appreciate the durable qualities, in substance and colour, of the silk goods of Burma, which may be produced to any patterns prescribed to the native weavers. The ordinary stuffs lack body, but the superior descriptions are quite substantial, while all kinds are pure in material and soft, and, besides, drape well. According to the writer:—

"A couple of matched putsoe lengths, though expensive, would prove a far more acceptable present than the coarse jewelry of the country; and a far wiser investment than the purchase of the sham or valueless rubies with which the local market is flooded. Besides these cummerbunds, handkerchiefs, and all manner of materials can be purchased; and any one anxious to reap smiles (and who is not?) would do far better in the Zuyoe, than by embarking his hard-earned rupees in the purchase of boxwallas' goods, which can be brought at half the local rates in any Indian bazaar."

If the silks are so good as represented, and not too costly, we can promise a market nearer home, to begin with. We certainly see the numerous Burmese prisoners of state brought over, and the respectable fugitives who have followed in their wake, clad in beautiful stuffs, but whether they are indigenous or foreign it is difficult to say. We should like to have an opportunity of examining some samples of native manufacture. China is the source of sericulture throughout the world, and it still maintains a considerable reputation. The extra-Gangetic Peninsula is the natural tail of the Flowery Empire, ethnographically as well as geographically. What wonder that it should follow the trunk country!

THE Pioneer has formed the following opinion, as at present advised, of the ruling Chief of Indore:—

"A crisis will ere long occur in the Indore State unless Maharajah Holkar chooses to set his house in order, and live like a reasonable and reputable person. We understand that he does no work whatever, and that his whole time is given to the society of persons of whose character the less said the better to ears polite. He has quarrelled with all his relations and receives no visitors, not even his Minister, Dewan Raghonath Rao, a man of worth and high attainments, who does his best to prevent matters coming to deadlock. But he is anxious to leave the sinking ship, as are all officials of any character. The Maharajah is entirely in the hands of astrologers, and he does not three days in a fortnight on which he is not afraid to take action for fear of the anger of the stars. That his abject superstition is taken advantage of by his shameless favourites for their own interest is a matter of course, and the scandal which the personal habits of Holkar and his absolute neglect of his State duties produce will ere long necessitate the active interference of Government."

We have a little question to interpose in the poor Maharajah's behalf and in that of his fellow Indians in general. There seems, in that passage, a disposition to sneer at our people for their folly and basenesses, but these are by no means peculiar to them. Superstition, for example, is not confined to Indore, nor are stars a bugbear only in the East. The appearance of a comet, as the occurrence of a destructive earthquake, causes anxiety in the breast of millions in Christendom as in Heathen lands. In the present instance, the geographical source of the superstition may well be a point in issue. Which astrology does the Holkar swear by, European or Asiatic? Does the Prince regulate his movements by the system of Tycho Brahe or that of Varaha Mihir? Is the almanac of Zadkiel or Moore followed by the Indore Court, or the almanac of the Mahratta Sastris?

The Pioneer evidently regards a Prince's astrological proclivity a bad sign in his political horoscope or horizon. It probably remembers that Tiberius showed the same disposition. But history in this matter is like the High Court—rich in contradictory precedents. Our contemporary might, if it chose, also recollect that Domitian—a scarcely more savoury name than Tiberius—banished astrology from the Empire by edict. In the East, astrology has always been officially recognised and established. Not only the Hindus but all the Moguls, great and small, firmly believed in it. Mahomed Shah may have been weak, but neither Aurungzebe nor Akbar ever ordered a movement without leave of the stars ascertained through the Court astrologers, or without consulting the other experts in divination. Nor is it a weakness of Orientals only. Not to mention Queens like Catherine deMedici, the illustrious ancestor of our present Premier was himself a famous professor of astrology. May not a Holkar show a preference sanctioned by the great name of Burleigh?

We have no desire to support any of our Princes in misgovernment, but they should not be made the victim of what, though reckoned as a sign of enlightenment, may possibly be a modern prejudice.

NOTWITHSTANDING the progress of international knowledge, by reason of the facilities for inter-communication and the fashion of travel in recent years, the nations are still but imperfectly informed of even the commonest concerns and conditions of other countries. Even professional politicians in England, from time to time, discover the most hazy notions of the political systems in vogue on the Continent, specially among the lesser Powers and minor states. Of the actual working of the constitutions, they are still more ignorant. Relying upon the indifference of their constituency, the recognised suppliers of foreign intelligence in the Press do not care to keep strict watch over the home affairs of any but the principal nations. In India and the Colonies, we are worse served.

We have been led to these remarks by the little interest which has been taken in the exciting parliamentary contest lately and possibly still going on, in Sweden. That country has been in the throes of a political struggle, as yet bloodless indeed, but which may any day develop into a fiercer demonstration. Without speculating on the future, it is clear that one of the European Constitutions is being strained to the utmost and may snap. Perhaps the democratic theory itself is on its trial. We sons of Hind who aspire to representative institutions, may well profit by the experience of others and learn a lesson of cautious deliberation.

The Swedish Parliament is composed of two Chambers of Deputies, both of popular election, the First of 136 and the Second of 204 representatives. Of these 204 Deputies, Stockholm alone sends twenty-two. As the procedure of election is by scrutin de liste, all the twenty-two are voted for en bloc. The necessary consequence of this absurd method is, that the ineligibility of a single unit of the body of representatives so elected vitiates the whole body. Not only that, but the next ticket or batch has the chance and is reckoned to be elected, subject, of course, to being set aside on the same objection. One would suppose, specially from our experience of the loose way in which candidates for municipal election in town and country are passed in this country, that such invalidation must often occur. As a matter of fact, such a case has happened. The Stockholm election of September last was, questioned on the same ground. Any elector can bring the question before the Courts. Thus a workman who was elected has been challenged on the ground that he did not pay his taxes for 1881 and 1882. A similar point arose in the first election for the Calcutta Municipality in 1876, but Sir Stewart Hogg took upon himself to smooth matters by his ruling and the town was content to abide by it. In Sweden, however, there was a fierce party contest and the defeated party stuck to the letter of the Constitution. The Court supported their contention, and ordered the next set of twenty-two to be counted. Now that is "no joke." It is usually a disaster, and may be destruction. It means devolution of power from one Party to another. In the present case, involving as it does the ejection of Free Traders in favour of Protectionists, it means the triumph of a principle—an evil principle as we all have been taught. The only hope in the situation lies in the fact that the arbitrament of the courts is not yet determped. The judgment of the court of first instance has been carried to, and is being fought before, a higher tribunal. It may possibly be upset there. If the judgment is finally confirmed, it will tax all the prudence of the Scandinavian Teutons to prevent a crash or a collapse.

WE have received Dayaram Gidumal Shahan's Life and Life-work of Behramji Malabari, and shall try to notice it another time. Meanwhile, we are exceedingly glad to see the excellent spirit which the opponents in the press of the hero of the book are showing in the connection. Difference of opinion cannot be helped, and is, indeed, a necessary discipline. What is bad is that, under it, we should lose sight of facts and hold of reason. The nations of the West are far from presenting a good model for imitation. Still, in Europe and America, they have the wisdom to cultivate directly good relations with one's own party. In India, we of the soil, are a host without a head—a rabble of units without cohesion. No respect is lost between us, because none ever existed. Differences lead to estrangement, because they are recklessly cherished and bitterly expressed. We are apt to ignore the unity under diversity, and to exalt trifling personal regards and personal antipathies. We rejoice at the good example shown by the Mahratta. That journal has fought Mr. Malabari more determinedly and valiantly than any other. The organ of the powerful intellectual Brahmanocracy of Poona, it has, throughout the long agitation for widow marriage and against polygamy and infant-marriage, scouted the pretensions of the great Parsee Reformer of Hindu social usages and sought to expose his errors. But now when the question is reduced to the worth of the man, no one is more ready to do him justice. We quote the opening sentence of the tribute:—

"Whatever opinion one may have of Mr. B. M. Malabari and his social reform agitation, it can not be gainsaid that he has made a name for himself, that he has achieved his eminence by no backstairs influence and that he is a man of singular capacity, intelligence and perseverance."

Our contemporary does not hesitate to say that the much-abused Parsee "is honestier than many a would-be reformer among our people." It adds—

"It was necessary that the life of such a man should be briefly but forcibly sketched by some able hand, and we congratulate Mr. Dayaram Gidumal Shahan on the very excellent way in which he has discharged his duty of biographer."

THE opening of a railway and the laying of the corner-stone of a new settlement, must make a week memorable in the annals of a Native State. Such, towards the end of last month, has been the good fortune of Junaghad. A still more striking evidence of luck is the fact that the new settlement has been christened Wodehousepore, not out of respect to a past Governor of the Presidency but to commemorate the present Political Agent, who is said to be a popular officer.

The Indian Spectator says:—

"We notice with much pleasure the unity and concord existing between the Mahomedan and Hindu subjects of the Nawab, enrolled, as they are, under a common standard, owing fealty to the same ruler, and living peaceably as citizens and neighbours of the same country, making their interests identical the one with the other. These facts are a valuable set-off, at the present moment, against the representations of those who persists in showing up, on every possible occasion, the want of sympathy between the two races, so widely different, as they are, in their religious convictions, in their habits and usages."

That is not a party "dodge," nor a random bit. It is a simple fact that in the Nawab's territory both sects live in peace and harmony. Only on Wednesday last, we were visited by a brace of Hindu Fakeers from that State who, in answer to our inquiry, not only showed good feeling towards Mussulmans but also their satisfaction with the administration. Were the Hindus well treated? Was there no oppression or harshness? we asked. The answer was brief but pregnant. Harshness there was, but only towards evil doers—thieves, brigands, murderers and so forth, said they; as for the Hindus they were well protected, encouragement being shown in especial to pilgrims and religious men of every denomination.

WE are so accustomed, freely and without stint, to exercise the noble privilege of criticising the Government we have the happiness to live under, that it would be unfair and undutiful to withhold a bit of testimony in its favour obtained by us in this connection. We asked the Sanyasees whose usual abode is the Girnar hills, how many of them started and travelled together? They did not understand us and almost resented the idea of their fraternising with lay travellers. We said there may have been other pilgrims or at least other Sanyasees. There were none, and they recognised no necessity of combination. They almost thought us incoherent. Such is the difference that a few short years may make! There could not be a greater proof of the blessings of British Government. We now came upon them with our claim for that Government. This freedom and security of travelling alone and unimpeded, without risk or anxiety, all the way from one end of India to the other, which they had themselves enjoyed, was due simply to the British in India—to the peace they have established and the crime they have stamped out. It is not so very long since the period when in India, as in Central and Western Asia at this day, it was necessary for travellers, commercial and other, to go from place to place in Kafilas. Even pilgrims and mendicants were reduced to the same precaution. And now we are got so used to our happiness that a Sanyasee does not grasp the meaning of inquiry into the numerical strength of the party with whom he has journeyed from Katiawar to Gunga Saugor and Pooree!

They readily and cordially admitted all that we said in praise of our Government. It is not at all necessary, they said, to wait for any body else's convenience or to crowd together on the way. There is no danger and no difficulty. The roads are first class and protected, to say nothing of the wondrous road of iron.

PERHAPS many of our readers—of the more reverent disposition—will prefer to hear of religion and the mystery of the universe in connection with our visitors. They may well wonder whether we have nothing wonderful to relate. We have. At any rate, we shall mention, for what it may be worth, one of the things we saw. Before doing so, we must state a few particulars. The two men form one party, composed of the principal or the Mahatma and his disciple, who acts as guide and servant. The latter is by far the senior in age—the former is almost a boy—not more than eighteen or nineteen years of age. He is a taciturn young man of apparent simplicity and purity, without the excessive punctiliousness of other Brahmans. He took his seat and lounged on a bed used by men of all castes and races. He was offered something to eat. He declined, but this was nonsense, for he was doubtless prepared by the person who brought him. But he did not give us the trouble of coaxing him for any length. A "dish" of sweetmeats steeped in syrup was brought by a man with shoes on and laid on the bed. He complained they were too many. He was told that it did not matter, he might take as much as he could. He submitted with a smile and called for water, which was brought in a brass pot (loti). He took some of the water and washed his hands and mouth, and then, strangely enough, and with ease, he brought forth by the mouth, from his stomach or some inner cavity, a small Saligram or somewhat oval-shaped stone used as a symbol of Vishnu for daily worship by Brahmans. Towards this pebble he observed a simple form of worship, muttering some mantras, and offered it the sweetmeats. After this, the divine stone was put into the mouth and was apparently swallowed up again.

THE vanity of literature on which Henry Rogers eloquently discoursed in the Edinburgh Review in 1849, and in respect of which writers like the elder Disraeli have collected so much information, is vividly illustrated by the conclusion which has been arrived at by a recent inquirer:—

"That only 50 books out of every 1000 survive seven years' publicity. Only about 60 books of the 50,000 publications of the 18th century are now in print."

Holloway's Ointment and Pills.—Travellers and Emigrants.—Those who cross the seas change the climate, but they do not change the constitution. The altered conditions of life, the exigencies of travel and other causes render the traveller and emigrant peculiarly liable to diseases and accidents when far from efficient medical aid. With these associated remedies at hand they may be said to have a physician always at their call, and they may be certain that situations will be constantly arising in which they will require a ready resource in time of need. The directions for use which accompany each box and pot of Holloway's Pills and Ointment are written in plain and simple language, and are applicable in all cases.

FROM a comparison of returns, it appears that the number of readers in the British Museum is more than double those in the National Library of Paris, while each of the former borrows from two to three times as many books as a French reader. The difference is easily explained. In Paris, the number of volumes issued to a single reader in a day, is limited to three or four, while in London a reader can have as many as he likes. A more fruitful source of difference is the fact that in the French Library a reader is not allowed to examine the catalogue; this is done for him by officials. He writes the name of the book he wants and learns twenty minutes after if the work is procurable; if not, he writes another name, waits another twenty minutes, and so on. In London, the catalogue is open to every one, and books are delivered by attendants at readers' seats. The economy of time and temper is obvious. Herein clearly they do not order the matter better in France.

LORD DUFFERIN has again passed the Indian test of an auspicious reign. There was rain all day and night on Thursday, incessantly, if not in torrents. It was a cold and cheerless day and for those who were forced to go out, a nasty one. Luckily the sun rose next morning as glorious as ever and not quite formidable as usual.

A few days earlier the rain would have spoiled the late Chapter of the Order of the Indian Empire which, originally announced to be held within doors at Government House, was at the last moment relegated to the grounds, and under canvas. It passed off without a hitch on last Saturday at about noon. We are glad to see the claims of the Nawab of Moorshedabad and the Maharajas of Vizianagram and Durbhunga recognised. As three of the most eminent Princes and Chiefs of the right section of the inverted triangle, their connection gives honor and importance to the Order itself.

Both the Home Member and the Law Member, as well as the Lieutenant-Governors and Governors of the day, evidently recognise the understanding which gives the children of the soil a claim upon officials in such exalted positions, over and above the ordinary duties of their several offices. They lately visited the Kumboliatola Boys' Reading Rooms, an institution which owes much to the interest and liberality of Professor Stack of the Presidency College (now Principal designate, we believe, of the Krishnagur College) and Mr. Justice Norris. They were at the Oriental Seminary too. Mr. Scoble presided at a young men's debating society, delivering a good address. In that position he naturally delivered the staple remark on the usefulness of such associations—though there is another view of the matter—but he made one noteworthy point that we remember, namely that the people fail in a spirit of independence. It is however important enough to bear separate treatment hereafter.

The Lieutenant-Governor has been distributing school prizes. At the Oriental Seminary, His Honor made a remark much to our taste on the frivolity of speech-making and the weakness for speech-hunting. Sir Stuart Bayley braved all the horrors of Thursday's weather in order to take the chair at the Madresse anniversary.

THE most important meeting of the week was that of Lady Dufferin's Fund for the supply of medical relief to the women of India. The Viceroy presided. The Hon'ble Mr. Scoble in moving the first resolution gave an account of the finances and the operations. He was followed by Dr. Sircar in an ingenious and well-delivered speech. Lord Connemara spoke briefly and well for Madras, reminding one of his lamented brother who once ruled over India. The Lieutenant-Governor maintained his growing reputation as a speaker. The other speakers were Durbhunga and Moorshedabad and the Syed Ameer Hossein. The Chairman closed with a most animated address in which he made a graceful allusion to his zenana. With true knightly courage, yet without any unchivalric self-consciousness, he gave his personal testimony to his illustrious consort's zeal and absorbing interest in her philanthropic work. In fact speaker after speaker rose to testify to the head and heart she devoted to the Association. The Viceroy from the necessity of his role dealt in thanks and showered compliments all round, so that his speech reminded one of Sydney Smith's parody of the weak side of Mackintosh's oratory. But there was no true resemblance between the two. His praises were all thoroughly deserved by their respective objects, not the least deserving among whom is Major Cooper, the Honorary Secretary, who has worked with singular earnestness and judgment.

THE Chapter was followed on Tuesday evening by a party at Government House which was more numerously attended than any in this season. There was more ethnic variety too, and of course a more interesting display of costume. On both occasions we missed the presence of our Academician who would have delighted in the scenes, and possibly enriched art by fixing them on canvas. Unfortunately Mr. Archer was ailing during the whole period. We hope he is all right by this.

WE rejoice to be able to report that Raja Dr. Rajendralala Mitra is doing better.

Our good neighbour Baboo Srinath Dass's brilliant but wayward and unfortunate eldest son Baboo Upendra Das, we are glad, is coming back to his native land.

A GREAT retired Indian and a famous jurist and journalist has passed away in Sir Henry Maine, whose death is telegraphed from London.

THE Government of India has just received a telegram from Teheran dated the 9th instant reporting the arrival of Lieutenant-Colonel Yates in Tiflis. His party appears to have been exceptionally well received and entertained by the Russian Transcaspian authorities.

NOTES AND QUIRIES.

WANIFD - A SYNONYM.

From the time of the early reformers so much has been talked regarding the remarriage of women after the loss of a husband, that many men are ready to go to fits at the sound. Widow-marriage, it must be admitted, is a vile compound of a word. It was time enough for a handy synonym in the gamy series. Why not have vidogamy? Suppose you started widowgamy, the second w would soon be dropped as a superfluity, and the first is naturally changeable to v. After all, our old friend Mr. Weller, Senior, is one of Nature's creation, and his lingo quite conforms to Grimm's Code.

When a Bengali-speaking gentleman describes the importunity of another in connection especially with any request or solicitation, he describes the other as Sapi Debi, Sud Debi karila. Numerous as are the gods and goddesses of the Puranic pantheon, have you, Mr. Editor, ever heard of any goddesses called Sapi and Sari? Whence then this saying? Will any of your numerous readers answer?

REIS & RAYYET.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 1888.

THE VICEREGAL NOTICE TO QUIT.

THE news of the week is the resignation of Lord Dufferin. The following official intelligence was circulated by the Press Commissioner on the 8th instant:—

"The Earl of Dufferin having requested Her Majesty's Government to permit him to resign the Viceroyalty of India at the expiration of the fourth year of his term, he will be succeeded by the Marquis of Lansdowne the present Governor-General of Canada who may be expected to arrive in India towards the end of the present year."

Regard being had to the nature of the subject and considering that a number of communications must have passed between Lord Dufferin and the Secretary of State—even though in the shape of cypher telegrams—the secret must be confessed to have been very well kept. Nor has there been any favoritism, either in this country or in England. This is the first time that important intelligence of this kind is communicated to the Indian public frankly and freely, and without partiality. We hope we shall not again be condemned to the reproach of getting our Indian news through the Times or Vanity Fair.

Various speculations are afloat as to the causes of such a sudden step. Many are those who attribute it to differences with the Conservative Cabinet. It is certainly difficult to assign political acts to other than political causes. But so far as our information goes, private claims have decided Lord Dufferin. The demands of property may be as urgent as the responsibilities of public duty, and even the temptations of private fortune it may sometimes be simply Quixotic to resist. They who are blessed with abundance of the good things of this world must submit to the burdens imposed as they enjoy the benefits.

No man of delicacy will fail to recognise the prudence and propriety with which this important news is conveyed. The communication is made a sufficient time after the important fiscal measures of this season have been launched. Freedom of opinion has had full play. Public criticism has not been stifled before-hand by the announcement of a "farewell night," as it were, in the theatre of public affairs. Above all, a sufficient chronological margin is left to obviate violent private disappointment as well as to prevent the slightest disruption of public interests.

We only fear the margin may not be sufficient for making up for Lord Dufferin as great a name in Indian history as his magnificent powers and accomplishments are capable of earning.

The news has created a sensation. Few men have ever been brought within the range of the Viceroy's personal influence without feeling it profoundly. Many in all parts will receive it with almost a sense of personal bereavement. Even political oppositionists who are worth anything know that the loss of a finished statesman who has passed his local noviciate, is not easy to replace. It is intolerable that just as our Proconsul, ceased to be a griffin and was thoroughly seasoned for his great office, he set himself to negotiate for a successor to make over charge. For one thing, Lord Dufferin has added to his many accomplishments and means for successful Eastern administration a good knowledge of Oriental languages, including a familiarity with what may be called the French of the East. He is the only khas importation of a Viceroy who has had this advantage. None else could converse directly with a native of the country or an Indian Prince or a representative of any Asiatic Power.

[Since this article was in the press, we turned with trepidation to His Excellency's speech in Council yesterday, on his resignation. Luckily we have nothing to alter.]

ZEMINDARY ZOOLUM.

THE French say there are faggots and faggots. We say there are Zemindars and Zemindars. Strong as our sympathies are on behalf of the Zemindars as a class, and jealous as we always are of legislative attacks on their undoubted rights, we are constrained to admit that there are those amongst them whose conduct almost justifies the revolutionary legislation of the period and the prejudices entertained against them as a body by men in power. Happily, however, for the interests of the order, the black sheep are few and may be counted on the fingers' ends. Utterly forgetful of their critical position at a time when the whole statesmanship of Lord Cornwallis is openly called in question, when, in fact, a deliberate covenant, hoary with the solemnity of age, and made with every formality that could impress the world with its binding force, trembles for its existence in view of a specious sophistry impatient of argument, they persistently provoke by their conduct the very friends of the cause to throw them over-board and keep their enemies in countenance.

A memorial addressed to Sir Stuart Bayley is lying before us, signed by over two hundred persons, veritable rayyets dependent on the produce of their fields, which discloses a pitiable state of things. It is certainly an ex parte statement presenting only one side of the picture. But supported as the allegations are by a tabulated reference appended at the end, and consistent as they are with what we ourselves know of the arts employed for breaking the spirit of an independent tenantry, we have little reason to suspect their truth. The case is eminently one that demands a prompt and searching enquiry, and we have no doubt the Government of Bengal will do its duty.

Baboo Harihar Mookerjee of Uttarpara, who enjoys the unenviable distinction of having gone to law with the very author of his being and fortunes, and who is a brother of that Monohar alias Jogendranath Mookerjee whose treatment of the rayyets of Gangadharpore immediately occasioned many of the drastic sections in the present law of landlord and tenant for Bengal, owns a village in darpaini, by name Uttarbarh-jhampardah, not many miles to the west of Howrah. Many of the jummas owned by the rayyets of Jhampardah have been stated to be ancestral ones, held from generation to generation, dating back, if not really, at least under presumption of the law, to the Permanent Settlement. Without vouching for the truth of the statement made in the memorial, that ever since Babu Harihar has entered into possession of the village, he has left no means, including even physical violence, untried for enhancing the rents of the rayyets, there is unmistakable evidence to show that the Babu, like his brother in the case of the Gangadharpore tenants, has done his best to convert the Civil Courts into an effective engine of harassment and oppression for gaining his end. Kist after kist, four times during a year, the rayyets of Jhampardah have been depositing their rents in Court for the last eighteen years. In spite, however, of such deposits, presumably occasioned by the landlord's refusal to accept the rents when tendered in the village cutchery, suits against the rayyets for arrears are instituted, not by dozens but by hundreds. The history of this Civil litigation, the memorialists divide into three periods, which they respectively call the Ampta period, the Howrah Period under Act VIII of 1869, and the Howrah Period (not yet ended) under the present law of landlord and tenant. The two first periods do not call for any particular remark, except that, during what is called the Ampta period, when Jhampardah was within the jurisdiction of Ampta, a heroic effort was made by Babu Harihar for introducing monthly kists. Suits from three to four hundred in number were instituted and carried in appeal up to the High Court. The result was a failure to enforce monthly kists. Quarterly kists were the custom of the village, and were affirmed by the highest court of appeal. Baulked in the acquisition of his great end, the landlord began next to institute quarterly suits against his tenants. He was, however, met by judicial officers who knew their duty. Babu Baloram Mullick, Purno Chandra Shome, Taraprosunno Bannerjee, and Kedarnath Roy uniformly dismissed these suits, on proof of deposit in Court by the defendant rayyets. Many of these officers, again, by private interference, induced the landlord's agents to accept the rents brought for deposit. Sometimes, indeed, the landlord sued original proprietors who had transferred their tenures, even after recognition of the transferees by acceptance of rents from them.

These suits, however, were all promptly dismissed, and the penalty clauses of the law inexorably enforced. In fact, whatever the arts employed by the landlord during the two first periods (1871-1886), the rayyets were protected as far as they could be consistently with the law under which they lived.

During, however, what has been called the Howrah Period (not yet ended) under Act VIII of 1885, the rayyets have been subjected to a course of treatment that is simply astounding. We do not know which to condemn most, the unscrupulousness of the landlord, or the carelessness and indifference of the judicial officers which have made that unscrupulousness possible. Suits against original proprietors of tenures, notwithstanding the previous recognition of the transferees, are common. Rayyets again, are constantly sued for arrears in spite of deposits by them in Court. All these suits are decreed by the Moonsiffs on grounds that are simply extraordinary. Unable to scrape together the amounts payable by them, together with the costs both authorised and nameless, till within a few days of the expiry of the kist, the tenants, even after they have got the amounts in hand, have to wait for the leisure of the more knowing and intelligent ones among them to escort them to Court for superintending or otherwise facilitating their deposits there, for it is not every man having his rents ready and the costs of deposit that can actually deposit them in Court. No wonder, therefore, that the applications for deposit are generally made within only a day or two of the expiry of the kist. These applications require to be numbered and registered before actual deposits are permitted to be made or accepted. Considering the number of the applicants and the insufficiency in general of the ministerial establishments of the Civil Courts, two or three days elapse before the numbering and registration of the applications are completed. The landlord, however, being ready with his complaints, files them on the very first day after the expiry of the kist and, therefore, a day or two before the deposits are actually made. Having a well-paid legal agency on the alert, aided, besides, by a zealous establishment of mohurirs, he can always outstrip the rayyets in their race for time, making, if necessary, the amlah more dilatory than usual. When the cases are called, the defendants urge the Court's own laches for explaining the delay in deposit, but this avails them nothing. The landlord's complaints having preceded these deposits, the suits are all decreed. Sometimes, again, evidence of actual tender at the village cutchery is called for, before holding the defendants entitled to deposit. In vain the latter urge that they have nothing to gain on earth or in heaven by coming all the way from their village to court for depositing their rents, incurring additional costs, worry and annoyance, and loss of time, all of which they would escape if their rents were actually accepted in the village cutchery. The sapient Judges, however, who administer the law at Howrah are inexorable. They cannot presume anything, no, not even the disadvantages the defendants suffer by coming to Court kist after kist for depositing their rents. They must have evidence of actual tender at the landlord's cutchery. And then by a rule of evidence invented on the Surrey side of the river by these luminaries of the law, the evidence of witnesses who have themselves been sued by the landlord, if not actually inadmissible, is at least unreliable. It is difficult to say all we feel at conduct such as this.

Although the catalogue of the rayyets' woes would, without anything further, be complete, yet this is not all. What comes below would transcend belief but for the memorialists citing chapter and verse. In a great many instances, the amounts sued for are veritable trifles, being fractions of Her Majesty's copper currency in India and aliquots of indigenous couries. These again are reduced further in the fine scales used by the Howrah Ganaliels, which would be harmless as only proving the infinite divisibility of matter, but for the costs of the proceedings, which sometimes swell to a hundred times the amounts decreed. In decrees, again, so made, executions are issued against the persons and properties of the judgment-debtors, although sums sufficient to satisfy the decrees are all the while held in deposit in court. To save themselves from ignominy, they have on these occasions to satisfy the decrees by fresh payments, with liberty (which, it is to be hoped, they highly prize for its evident simplicity) to withdraw their deposits in court, incurring additional costs and loss of time. Worse still, sometimes the landlord, having withdrawn the amounts to his credit in court, takes out executions afresh and compels the judgment-debtors to pay him once more. We hope a sifting enquiry will be made into the truth of these allegations in particular, and if, as we believe, they are found to be true, nothing less than criminal prosecutions should be ordered for checking their recurrence in future. Averse as we constitutionally are to see civil proceedings terminate criminally, there are cases in which we feel bound to surrender our feelings.

BOOK-WORMS & FRUIT-WORMS.

"A BOOK-WORM" writes to the Statesman :—

"In my library of some two thousand volumes, a considerable number of the books have been attacked by book-worms and other insects which reside in and consume these treasures. The curious point is this, that of the volumes bound in England and other countries of Europe, very few indeed have been touched by the insects, while all of those bound in India have been attacked by them. The cloth, moreover, of the volumes bound in this country is covered with, what the bookbinder will understand if I call it, 'white leprosy.' The inference evidently is, that there is something in the paste used in Indian book-binding which the insects are fond of; or, conversely, that there is something in the paste used by binders in Europe which these creatures do not like. Now, it strikes me that if some enterprising Indian binder could ascertain what the substance is that keeps these destructive creatures away from books bound in Europe, he would be a benefactor to the public, and would greatly increase his own business if he were to adopt the specific."

The two chief enemies of literature are the silver fish and the white ant, and their ways are different. Both seem partial to the mealy Indian lei or kāi. But they are by no means content to feast upon the substance of the binding only, but make havoc upon the books themselves. Therein the white ant is the greater sinner by far and a truly formidable pest. The silver fish is a pretty little dear, fleet like a gazelle, and beautiful like a miniature hilsa, living upon the ambrosia of muslin and gauze—the richest and highest velvet and satin, and delicate like a hectic heroine of romance. Were it not for the injury it does to the best treasures of mankind, it would be entirely a lovely and beloved thing. Still its depredations are feeble and limited compared with the ruin caused by the white worm. The silver fish hovers about the precincts, confines itself to the boards—with occasional excursions into the interior. The white ant is bolder and frequently cuts through a book from cover to cover. But it is not every kind of letterpress that attracts it. We have seen it frequently pass over intermediate volumes to fix itself on more congenial literature. The truth is, it delights in certain kinds of paper. All kinds are not equally repulsive or equally welcome. Its taste is akin to that of students among men. Some books it will feed upon for nourishment, without particular pleasure. Others, it takes to with enthusiasm. Ordinarily, it bores tunnels through your books; but some volumes it not only devours but actually builds upon and settles upon. Builds upon, did we say? It builds into them, digging subterranean chambers, converting your pages into elaborate structures of unglazed earth, evolved apparently out of the depths of a mysterious laboratory. It is a sad sight to see volumes to which the white ant has taken a fancy for some little time. They are a heap of ruins.

From this Vandal there is no preservative, except constant inspection and weeding. Neither camphor nor turpentine scares it away; neem leaves and jeera it eats through. Lime is no good. Highly arsenicized paper such as is used in Sanskrit MSS. alone seems to keep it out for any length. Still, as there are many books which it evidently avoids, there must be something in the quality of some descriptions of paper which repels it. Such books ought to be examined, and the paper used differentiated from other kinds, and books printed by preference in those which resist the encroachments of the enemy. We offer these desultory observations for what they are worth. The whole subject should be regularly studied. The habits of the book-worms ought to be watched. Considering the great part that printing and stores of printed matter play in our modern civilisation, considering the mere money sunk in the production and preservation of inscribed paper, &c., to say nothing of the dependence on them of human enlightenment and progress and happiness; it is a wonder that no systematic inquiry has been made into the matter either by individuals or by bodies of men or by states. The subject is one eminently worthy of our new Microscopic Society. We drew public attention to the ravages committed by insects on two of our noblest and most valuable fruit-trees—to the cocoanut and the mango. Whether Government took any notice of our cry, we do not know; but it was not altogether unheard of of the public. At least one enthusiastic student of science took up the inquiry and he seems to have achieved some success. Mr. W. J. Simmons, we see, read on Monday at the Microscopic Society a paper on the Mango Weevil. Some other microscopist might well pursue the book-worms, and if he can tell us what they positively shun, he will be a real friend of knowledge and a benefactor of his kind.

MONGHYR.

Jamalpur, February 7.

The 12th anniversary of the Monghyr Arya Sava went off with great eclat this year. The ceremony in connection therewith lasted four days. Two Hindu Missionaries attached to the Bharatpora Arya Dharmo Procharini Sava, Benares, viz., Sree Krishna Prasano Sen, and Ambica Dutta Byas, were invited on the occasion. They delivered a series of lectures and sermons in Bengali and Hindi respectively. There was a Sunkeertan procession, after distribution of prizes to the pupils attached to the Sanscrit Patshala and reward given to the Behari Brahmin Pandits according to their respective honors of titles—and alms to the poor.

The culprits who attempted the murder of Modho Dass, and the Behari woman respectively, of whom allusion was made in my previous letters, have feigned insanity and are now in the Lunatic Asylum.

A horrible case of murder took place on the night of the 6th instant in Keshabpur in the vicinity of Jamalpur. A Behari elderly woman had some jewellery in her possession and partly worn on the person. Some Budmashes, with a view to rob them, managed to come into the house at dead of night and serve their ends, but having had to struggle for a silver necklace that was on her person for a length of time, they gagged her mouth and subsequently strangled her with a rope. This is a case that requires serious attention. What are the Police about?

OPINION OF THE PRESS.

Dr. S. C. Mookerjee, the editor of what is undoubtedly one of the ablest papers in the country in point of literary power is the author of a pleasant little book of Travels in East Bengal. The author is master of a easy style of English which many an Englishman may envy. Humorous descriptions and caustic satire enliven every page. There is throughout a vigour and freshness of style that lends a charm to the veriest commonplace. If there were, however, a higher purpose in the publication of this book than to lighten the weary evening hours of the ordinary reader, we confess to a feeling that the author has failed in such an object. We are afraid there is not poetry enough in us to body forth in imagination the beauty of the scenes which the author has described in his voyages to and fro between Dacca and Tipperah. Humourist as he is Dr. Mookerjee will remind us of the words of the poet that the point of a "jest lies more in the ear of him that hears it than in the tongue of him that utters it." As with the jest so is it with the description. We do not say that the charge is unfounded. Prosaic as we are, drudging away at the desk, perhaps it is that we lack capacity to follow in imagination what the author has doubtless delineated with an admirable pen.

One of the chief impressions that a reader will receive from a glance at the book is the somewhat strained relation between the Babus and the Anglo-Indians. The author pours a flood of ridicule upon the lordly airs of our "rulers." He hits hard indeed in his account of the Colonel at whist enduring a Babu looking on, when on board the steamer, and of the whiteman's condescension in bowing to the black nigger. Happily we in the South are not so badly off in our commerce with the representatives of Western civilization. In spite of several instances of conflict and misunderstanding Englishmen and Hindus pull on agreeably together. But the author, notwithstanding his involuntary feeling of aloofness from the European, is no stranger to the blessings for which the West has laid us in debt. He has a keen appreciation of the enjoyments of this Westernized life of ours. He looks for ever forward and casts no longing lingering look behind at the things with which we have shaken hands and parted. His heart is in the continuance of British supremacy in the East. And agitation is his utmost weapon for the maintenance of his rights. But he will have nothing with spurious agitation. We extract below a paragraph of excellent advice to his brethren of the press. [Extract.]

The author recounts his adventure with the Railway officials of Sealdah with considerable humour. We feel an irresistible temptation to quote it in extenso, but space forbids. How the greenback was no legal tender, why silver of the Calcutta mint was wanted and how the currency question stood stiff and frowning despite the Editors and Magistrates who had accompanied the author to bid him good-bye at the station, and how again with the advent of the Justice of the Peace all objection to receiving the currency-note vanished, are all narrated in a style that is fittingly characterized only by the word "delightful." In another place the author introduces the reader to the Hindu belief in the auspicious hour for starting on a journey in language of such playful railery that we make no apology for quoting it. [Extract.]

The author has some trenchant criticism on the insolation of the Englishman, which makes him inaccessible to the complaints of extortion or plunder by their menials. They are too absorbed to know all that passes about them and the wrongs that are committed in their names are unnoticed as mere trifles for they have rarely any idea of their magnitude. It is only too well known throughout the country how blackmail in the shape of money or provisions is levied upon the inhabitants when the Collector is on tour. It would be difficult to believe the thing could go on under his very nose without his connivance if we did not know his exclusiveness and his distaste for mixing with the people.

The author devotes the greater part of the book to a description of the people and the external aspect of the country that he passed through in his two trips to Tipperah from Calcutta and back. He has a good deal to say about the customs of some of the people he becomes acquainted with. He makes a discovery of the debris of a Portuguese colony in Tipperah that has become debased in morality and sunk in superstition. Although there is not much in the book that is instructive to the serious student, the grace of diction and the ease of style carry the reader pleasantly through. It would be difficult to rescue such a subject as he has chosen from dulness without his extraordinary command of language. We cannot promise more than a brief span of life to the book. It will prove what is abundantly clear to the readers of the Reis and Rayyet that the author is an adept in English composition. He is a lover of nature and he paints scenes and situations with an artist's pencil.—The Hindu, November 7, 1887.

.....this interesting book. We are justified in so terming it, not on account of any romantic adventures that the author has to relate, nor of any very new discoveries in geography or natural history. There is something particular as regards ethnology; and a great deal of human nature in the book, shown to the reader with a simplicity and candour which bear testimony to its truth. Called from the busy haunts of men in the city to dwell for a time in Independent Tipperah as a judicious adviser to its Chief, Doctor Mookerjee relates his adventures during the several journeys to and fro in that capacity, without revealing the secrets of the State, like a good diplomatist. He has adhered strictly to the advice which he offers to his brethren of the Native Press, and has written what he saw and knows, without revealing all, considering what he might properly say and what withhold. The above seems to be a curious passage to be found in a book of travels, and appears to have no connection with the subject. But it arises from a casual reference to a slaughter house, and a writer who "thundered weekly against the outrage of locating shambles in the immediate vicinity of a Hindoo temple"—where, in fact, no temple could be said to exist. Hence, the Doctor advises his fellow-scribes not to be Pharisees, righteous over-much, but to look and be sure of their facts. In the same spirit, he has written his book. He gives an account of his travels, which seem often to have been voyages, upon the wide-spreading rivers of Eastern Bengal which in the rains become almost inland seas. On these he philosophises on the nature of the country and the people, making careful observation of his facts; and though he sometimes fancies he knows better than his boatmen, and more than suspects that they are getting the better of him, he submits with a grace that would have done credit to Socrates, and accepts the apparently inevitable in the interests of peace. The Doctor is a close observer of nature, animate and inanimate, with an eye to the picturesque as well as to the sublime and beautiful. And although there is a vein of cynicism running through many of his observations, it is tempered by such evident good nature, that even a stranger would conceive him to be a laughter-loving rather than a stern philosopher. This is evident in his descriptions of his boatmen and others, while he denounces the lawlessness which has made the poor fishermen suspicious even of honest intentions, because they have so long been the helpless victims of marauders stronger than themselves. Their only defence is flight or deceit, and the latter is their justification as a mode of self-protection. We are shown not only the weakness of the people, but the shortcomings of the administration that leave these things possible. The author is impartial in his censures. There is much in the book to which space forbids us to refer. That it is not a prosy one may be gathered from the fact that, for its 300 pages, there are nearly as many index references. Many of the subjects are necessarily but lightly treated, but all sensibly and fairly. And Dr. Mookerjee is such a master of the English language that in the whole book we have scarcely found a phrase that might not have been written by an Englishman "to the manor born." There is nothing in it at which any one could reasonably take offence; and there is much from which both Englishmen and natives may learn greatly-needed lessons.—The Indian Daily News, Nov. 22, 1887.

"TRAVELS IN BENGAL. Such is the title of a most interesting little work published a short time ago. Its author is Babu Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee, the well-known Editor of the Reis and Rayyet, the most original, cleverly-written and interesting journal in India. Babu Sambhu Chunder is one of the veteran Indian writers in English. He is the master of a most happy, racy pleasant style, which you can easily make out from amongst the writings of a hundred different men. In racy humorous writing Babu Sambhu Chunder has no rival among his Indian contemporaries. He won his first laurels, we believe, by his writings in his own periodical, the Mookerjee's Magazine, now long-defunct. In this magazine articles of great learning and excellence appeared, mostly from the pen of Babu Sambhu Chunder. He has written several other booklets. His Causes of the Mutiny; Mr. Wilson, Lord Canning and the Income Tax; the Career of an Indian Princess, Her Highness the late Secundra Begum of Bhopal; and the Prince in India and to India are publications which attracted considerable notice. His latest production "Travels in Bengal" is a work of great merit. It is at once a most faithful and interesting picture of natural scenery and life in Bengal, although Mr. Mookerjee does not profess to write a picture of Bengal life and uses his pencil in its portraiture only in passing. The dedication is characteristic. [Extract.]

The "Travels" are travels in East Bengal, travels and voyages between Calcutta and Independent Tipperah. We do not believe many people in this side of India know that there is such an independent State as Tipperah. But nevertheless such a state exists. We will give here a summary of its history in the words of Mr. Mookerjee—He writes:—[Extract.] Mr. Mookerjee was Dewan of Independent Tipperah for some five years in all between 1877 and 1881. The travels are an account of his voyages to and from Tipperah.

Those who have travelled in Bengal, particularly in its Eastern districts, which are the districts described in Mookerjee's book, will bear him out in his statement that Lower Bengal is not stale, flat and unprofitable, that, on the contrary, she is the beautifullest country in the world. She has no high mountains, but she has rivers apparently as vast as the sea, to make her scenery grand and majestic. She has a hundred rivers ever overflowing with water, thousands of transparent lakes, covered with the lily and a hundred beautiful water-flowers, thousands of seas of ever-waving paddy fields, thousands of clusters of bamboo and of great trees dressed in beautiful creepers adorning the river banks, to make her the loveliest country in the world. Even a Bengali needs to see and travel Bengal to adequately know her thousand winking charms. For a foreigner it is well nigh impossible to get even an approximate idea of what they are like from description, however true and faithful. Let us hear what our author has to say on the subject. We read: [Extract.] A paddy sea is thus inimitably described:—[Extract.]

We will quote a passage of another character:—[Extract.]

We could cull many such gems. But space forbids it. We will, however, quote some passages of another kind. Our traveller, though old in years, is evidently young in heart, for no one in the romantic age of youth could be more appreciative of female charms than our traveller. In every other page you find our author describing in terms of enthusiasm some rural girl or woman of beauty. [Extract.] In the next page we find our traveller's attention [Extract.]

There is the description, physical and moral, of a Colonel, which we cannot resist the temptation of reproducing, although the article has already exceeded the usual length. [Extract.]

We have now given extracts enough to show that the little book of travels is most delightful reading. It contains graphic descriptions of natural scenery, faithful portraiture of men and manners, and happy, good humoured observations on them. There is not an ill-natured or unkind word in the whole book—it overflows in every page with the milk of human kindness. Every observation testifies to the author being a keen observer of men and things, as an example of which we can mention the instructive and interesting chapter on the Native Christians of Portuguese extraction in Tipperah. Again, although the book does not pretend to deal with life in Bengal, the glimpses of that life we find in it are very considerable and pleasant. We will now conclude by recommending the book to all who may wish to spend a few hours amidst happy thoughts and pleasant pictures.—

S. K. C.

—The Tribune, Nov. 26, 1887.

If we have not before noticed Mr. Sambhu C. Mookerjee's Travels in Bengal, which was published some months ago, it is not because the little book is either dull or pointless. It contains, on the contrary, much interesting matter, though some of the incidents are over-weighted with detail in what is facetiously called a "little booklet." The author's view as a rule is, by the way, facetious: he is given even to punning; but he is also sentimental in the highest degree—"a naked Whiteman" hurts his susceptibilities; a Hindu girl, bathing in the river, throws him into an ecstasy of delight: "she had such large languishing eyes!" But he is nothing if not philosophical, and his reflections on this or that social and political subject are not without their moral. Mr. Sambhu C. Mookerjee was formerly Minister to the "last of the Nawabs Nazim of Bengal, Behar and Orissa" and afterwards Minister of the Maharaja of Tipperah. He is a man, therefore, of experience, and when he speaks his brethren should listen to him.... Travels in Bengal is a readable book, and it abounds in anecdotes which are often as instructive as amusing, and it is not spoiled by too many political allusions, though, of course, some few have crept in.—The Pioneer, Dec. 1887.

It may be well-known to all of our readers that Babu Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee the veteran Editor of the Reis and Rayyet newspaper, has just published a book describing the four voyages that he made between Calcutta and Independent Tipperah when he had to go and to return from the latter place in the capacity of the minister to its prince. The literature yet produced in the English tongue by our own countrymen is very scanty and any sensible addition to it cannot well escape the attention of the public press. Much greater therefore should be the attention claimed on behalf of a book which comes from the pen of so well-known a writer in the field of Indian journalism as Babu Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee. That gentleman's career as a writer fills nearly the last thirty years, and there has hardly been any subject of public importance during that long period which has not occupied his attention. Master of an inimitable racy style, with a vast store of classical allusions ever ready at the call, and possessing an infinite fund of humour, our author often enlivens every thing that he touches, and his peculiar strength lies in description. We therefore welcome the appearance of this book more especially as the subject is one which to make it interesting, requires a lively colouring and a rich, picturesque and imaginative description. There exist several books of travels written by eminent Englishmen, and every one of these differs perhaps, in their conception and plan of execution. Of these none was more widely read in the course of the last few years than Carlyle's reminiscences of an Irish Journey in 1849. That book is made up of extracts from diaries and the worst features of it are the bitter and caustic personal remarks interspersed throughout the book. However that may suit the polished and fashionable taste of England, in our country it would have been singularly out of place and we are glad that Babu Sambhu Chunder has confined himself to the description of those natural sceneries he passed through, and the means of travel in the distant and little-known regions of East Bengal. That the rivers of Bengal, with their circuitous and enwinding courses do enshrine in them a deep spirit of poetry and are of sincere interest to the real man of imagination, is proved by the fact that Sir William Hunter, than whom a more accomplished man of letters never passed the best years of his life in Bengal, should have chosen the subject for his very interesting address at Oxford, the other day. The gentle waves, the gentler ripples, the grassy banks, the ever-entwining courses, the pleasant air, the sceneries on both sides, make the rivers of Bengal a genuine thing of interest to those whose eyes are perpetually fed by the artificial gloss and dross of civilization and few could have set perhaps the loveliness of our rivers in better light than our accomplished author. His eloquent sentences, marching in regular order one after another, and embodying in their selves, every minute detail, that can lead to a scene its finest artistic effect, seem to place the reader in the very midst of sceneries described, and the man of leisure who would acquaint himself with the state of things in East Bengal, can hardly resort to a better book. The journeys which are described in this volume are certainly uneventful and though they correspond to facts as they furnish no interesting situation, no crucial moments, to the seeker of intellectual excitement and this will no doubt constitute a serious objection to the book on the part of sensational seeking readers. None has however any thing to quarrel with the choice of a subject that any author may choose to write upon and none of the outside public can afford any explanation as to why the author should have preferred one subject to another. We think however there are one or two indications of bad taste. Still we welcome the appearance of this book and trust that it is but the first of a long series of works in writing which our author should spend the matured experience and the literary facility of a well-spent life.—Young Bengal, Feb. 2, 1888.

INFALLIBLE SPECIFIC FOR LEUCORRHOEA.

A week's use of this medicine not only cures Leucorrhœa—the characteristic white, green and bloody discharge—but also removes the concomitant intense menstrual pains, and all the various complaints and symptoms incidental to menstrual difficulties and green sickness, and prepares the system for conception. Price: for a week's consumption, Rs. 2, packing and postage 4 annas.

There are capital medicines besides—for piles, all the 20 kinds of flux—such as spermatorrhœa, diabetes, &c.—diarrhœa, rheumatism, puerperal complaints, cataract of the eye, nagra, asthma, &c.

[Certificate.]

"I have known Babu Rajendra Nath Ghoshal kubbaj for upwards of 15 years, and I can bear ample testimony to the wonderful efficacy of his medicine in the treatment of diseases of the womb. While Assistant Surgeon of Monghyr and subsequently, I have known him to cure the most obstinate cases of uterine Leucorrhœa and other uterine derangements, organic and functional. I can safely call his medicine the Specific for Leucorrhœa and painful menstruation. Ladies who have been subject to these diseases for years and were barren have been cured and borne children.

To——

Even as the flowers are, so art thou,
Bright and sweet and joyous,
Maiden of the sunny brow!

Even as the moon is, so art thou,
Fresh is the virgin dew
Upon thy golden brow.

Even as the stars are, so art thou,
The "poetry of heaven" is Under thy archéd brow.

Even as the soul is, so art thou,
And love and life and light
Are circled round thy brow.

Green bank of grass and maiden hair
Wound round a purling brook,
In summer, is 'passing fair.

Where roses climb half way
To trellised Jessamine
Soothing the sultry day;

And showered blooms of Vakul spread
Beneath, and yellow Champa,
Dear Spring's own bride! bed,

'Tis ever sweet; but sweeter thou
And fairer, aye, and rarer,
Maiden of the golden brow!

Do I love thee? Ask not again.
The stars above thee answer yes,
And the flowerful plain.

NEWS AND COMMENTS.

WHO says that corporations have no conscience? The Bank of Bengal is generosity itself. It has undertaken payment of the Income Tax payable by the assistants, European and native.

Query: Is the additional payment on behalf of the subordinates subject to the tax? Under the Act such payment counts for income of the particular employé.

THE "Champion of Local Self-Government," Baboo Surendranath Banerjee, has been bearded in his own den. Major C. H. Scott, R. A., Superintendent of the Ichapore Gun Powder Factory, has been elected Chairman of the North-Barrackpore Municipality—Baboo Banerjee's native town. In the Southern Municipality, the old Chairman maintains his ground.

ASSAULTS on the Bench by suitors seem to be the order of the day. A Budmash has been sentenced to 2 years' labor by the Northern Division Magistrate for an attempt on the Calcutta Chief Magistrate. Baboo C. N. Banerjee, Deputy Magistrate of Howrah, had a narrow escape from a ruffian who has been sentenced to 3 months' imprisonment. In Raneegunge, the Moonsiff, Baboo Kallydhone Chatterjee, had the same kind of dubious attention paid to him. A disappointed suitor wanted to injure the judge by throwing a stone at him. He was arrested and has since been thrown into prison for six months.

WE have heard of a disgraceful scene at a neighbouring school. The office of Assistant-Secretary to the School Committee lately fell vacant, and a Baboo in the Lieutenant Governor's office, was, on the presumption of his intellectual superiority, elected. He was not long in proving his superiority of some kind, albeit not intellectual. The Head Master came down upon a boy who used to run away from school without permission and pulled him by the ear. Thereupon, the new broom of an Assistant-Secretary swept away the Head Master clean out of the school, bag and baggage. Without consultation with his colleagues, of his own motion he ordered a menial attached to the school to drive the Head Master vi et armis.

LORD WILLIAM BERESFORD, who had been to Lucknow, on short leave, to the Races, has returned and taken up his office. Major Cooper, A.-D.-C., who will be best remembered as Hon. Secretary to the Countess of Dufferin's Fund, acted also as Military Secretary to the Viceroy during the interval.

AT the Vienna High Court, in a case between one Fuchs and Prince Gustav Sayn Wittgenstein Berleburg, Fuchs deposed that at Baden-Baden, in one single evening, he lost 200,000 thalers, the Prince of Wales winning one-half.

THE Home Government has been recommended to sanction a deputy for the Financial Secretary to the India Government.

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given, any other being unnecessary, and likely to cause confusion.

Truth says :—

"Sir Morell Mackenzie has just refused a nice little douceur of 30,000 dollars, which was offered to him if he would run across the 'millpond' to see one of the innumerable 'leading citizens' in the States. He, however, was unwilling to undertake a journey that would place him out of reach of his illustrious patient at San Remo, even for a short time. I may say, by the way, that 6,000*l.* is, probably, the biggest thing in the way of a single medical fee that has been heard of in our day. Sir Morell himself got a thousand guineas for going to Cannes to see Mr. Stirling Crawford, and Dr. Hahn had the same amount for coming from Berlin to Mr. Montagu Williams. Sir Henry Thompson received two thousand (of which he returned half) for his attentions to poor old 'Badinguet'; but these are 'unconsidered trifles' compared with the fee Sir Morell Mackenzie has declined."

Our fools in India are habitually more lavish of their ill-gotten or undeserved wealth. The poor young Maharaja Aftab Chaud of Burdwan paid Rs. 25,000 to his doctor for being assured that he had recovered. Some heavy fees have been paid for European medical assistance procured from a distance. But scarcely has the English figure been even reached. It is in litigation that our people become liberal and stupid on a grand scale.

A GREAT loss is thus reported :—

"Two furniture vans were on Thursday afternoon, Jan. 26, proceeding through Cucklewood, filled with valuable oil paintings consigned to a firm in New Bond-street, and when near the Midland Railway arch crossing over the Edgware-road the second van was discovered to be on fire. All attempts to extinguish the flames were unavailing, and in an incredibly short time the whole of the contents of the van were destroyed, the frame-work of the vehicle alone being saved. The loss is estimated at some 30,000*l.*, one painting alone being worth 10,000*l.* The owner is stated to be a wealthy nobleman, and a great patron of art."

A catalogue raisonné of the lost worth ought to be soon published, or else the market may be flooded with spurious imitations.

THE Advocate says :—

"A friend, who was present at the meeting, before which Sir Syed Ahmad delivered his notorious speech, tells us that the Hon'ble Syed's remarks on Bengalis were so disgusting to certain Mohamaden gentlemen, that they left the meeting and told the speaker that they did not expect that their Hindu fellow-countrymen would be abused. We are told that the younger brother of Munshi Intiaz Ali, Pleader and President of the Educational Congress, also, consequently, left the meeting. This gentleman is better known as the author of 'Truth about Russia,' and now holds an executive appointment at Fyzabad. We refer to Munshi Mahfuz Ali."

Of late years, no writer has so vividly painted the life of lawlessness on the Mexican highways than M. Lucien Biart. The following seems almost an excerpt from The Clients of Doctor Bernagius :—

"Senora Amastoa Rubio de Pascadera, a woman bandit, was buried by the side of her lover at San Antonio, Zacatecas, Mexico, on Dec. 17. In early womanhood her intended husband was killed by Federal troops, and on his grave she swore vengeance. Her oath was to kill five men every year of her life, and she more than kept it. Her first exploit was to rob the Agas Calientes stage near Zacatecas. Single-handed she drove the postillions to flight, hailed the stage, and ordered a supposed band of assistants concealed in the chapparal not to shoot unless resistance was offered. The eight passengers gave a good booty. She continued a career of robbery for many years, which terrorised the citizens of Sinola, Jalisco, and Sonora, and enriched herself. The authorities and troops were powerless to suppress her. She bequeathed her fortune to charities, dying a natural death in obscurity."

We commend the above to the notice of the collector of the records of female heroism in Notes and Queries.

THE difficulties under which European savants study the East, usually from home, are simply staggering. A Frenchman is about to pave the path of scholars by the establishment of an Oriental Museum in his native country :—

"M. Emile Guimet, a native of Lyons, after a mission to India, China, and Japan, where he made large collections, built and endowed in his native city a large museum, which was opened by a Congress of French Orientalists in 1878. It contains a library of books and manuscripts in Sanskrit, Tamil, Sinhalese, Tibetan, Siamese, Chinese, Japanese, etc., treating specially of religions; and all the gods of India, China, Japan, Egypt, Greece, and Rome. There are also native professors of different creeds attached who explain the different mythologies and the illustrative objects. The aim of M. Guimet in founding the museum was 'to facilitate researches of scholars and extend the taste for Oriental studies and the religions of the East.' Subsequently, it was resolved to remove the museum to the French capital. Great progress is now being made with the building of the museum near the Trocadero Palace, in Paris, for the exhibition of this magnificent collection. The total cost of the building—a Greco-Roman edifice—is estimated at about £40,000, a third of which will be provided by the Ministry of Public Instruction, and the remainder by M. Guimet himself who has also taken upon himself the expense of moving the collection to Paris, which of itself is estimated at nearly £3,000. In one wing of the museum will be the Japanese Olympus, the Egyptian divinities, and collections of Japanese porcelain, while the galleries which face the Avenue d'Iena will contain the divinities of China, India, Greece, Italy, and Gaul. In another wing not yet built will be exhibited the divinities of Africa, Oceania, &c., while in another part of the building will be studies for the use of the persons employed to translate Indian, Chinese, and Japanese manuscripts. The museum will, it is hoped, be opened in the early part of 1888."

Still harping on old Greece and Rome! Where on earth is the propriety of a Greco-Roman edifice in the connection? An Indo-Chinese, or, say, a Chino-Indian building would be more to the purpose.

THE following comes from Lahore :—

"A dangerous and exciting occurrence—a hand-to-hand combat with a baboon—took place last Saturday night near the Lahore Central Jail. A European warder, named Austin, was aroused at a late hour by knocks at his door, and, thinking there were thieves, he went out of the room stealthily to secure them by a detour. On finding nobody, and returning, he saw a large sized baboon seated on a round table, where the lamp was burning, warming himself by its flame. Before he could retire, the animal saw and followed him, and assailed him with ferocity, tearing and biting at him. Unable to extricate himself, and seeing no escape, Austin had to face his assailant, and a desperate struggle ensued; the man eventually succeeding in killing the monkey. The baboon belonged to the contractor of the Jail, Nehal Chand. Austin has been badly wounded, and is said to be in a precarious state."

We shall not be surprised to hear that the monkey had had an old grudge against poor Austin. We have witnessed a most extraordinary case of well-merited chastisement by one of our monkeys on our own valet.

A MEHTER, Kuroop, has been placed before the Chief Magistrate to answer for the death of Mr. Donald Mackinnon of Mackinnon Mackenzie. Mr. Mackinnon died of typhoid fever at No. 6, Government Place. The Police subsequently discovered that Kuroop, who was employed by the deceased, "to save himself the trouble of going to the latrine belowstairs, was in the habit of carrying the nightsoil to the roof of the building and there emptying it into an open ordinary water spout which led to a surface drain belowstairs." On this statement of Superintendent Johnstone of the Detective Department, the Magistrate remarked that "if there is any charge against the man, I suppose it will be for doing a rash and negligent act so as to endanger human life." The attending physician, Dr. William Coulter, who examined the house and discovered the cause of the disease, has been examined by the Magistrate. His deposition runs thus :—

"I made an examination of the premises on Monday week last before Mr. Mackinnon's death. I went up the wooden stairs to the roof of the house. I found a heap of fecal matter and paper up there close to the mouth of the pipe running down the north side, and two vessels with water in them, one was an earthen vessel and the other a jug. There was also a piece of dirty rag there. In the mouth of this open pipe, I saw one or two pieces of dirty paper. There was fecal matter sufficient to fill two baskets, two feet in diameter and six inches high. The fecal matter smelt very badly and strongly. I kicked it up and had to run away from the smell. I could not give you the age of this heap of fecal matter; it was resting on the roof. I did not see any fecal matter in the pipe. I mentioned this to Dr. Anderson, and asked him to come up and see it; he did not go up. I made this examination as soon as I discovered that Mr. Mackinnon's disease was typhoid about a week after I was called in to see him. I can form no idea as to how long the heap had been there. The only way I can account for the poison going into the house is that the gas must have rushed down the pipe and thus got into the house; or it may have been due to percolation, if there were any cracks in the roof. If there was a current of air running downwards, it would carry the gas with it. I made no other representation except to Dr. Anderson. I did not go downstairs and look at the outlet of the pipe. The gas having been carried down the pipe would rise again and get into the house. In that case others would also suffer. As a matter of fact, two men were attacked. There is one man now ill; he is also suffering from typhoid fever. I did not see the servants' latrine. Taking it that there is a latrine below Mr. Mackinnon's bed-room, giving out the effluvia spoken to by the last witness, the source of danger may have come from that. And if it be true that a pipe leads from this latrine into his bath room, the danger would be intensified. So far as I can speak, the germs of typhoid come most often from decomposing fecal matter."

The case will be resumed next Monday. The mehter has been enlarged on bail of Rs. 50.

Holloway's Pills and Ointment.—Rheumatism and Gout.—These purifying and soothing remedies deserve the earnest attention of all persons liable to gout, sciatica, or other painful affections of the muscles, nerves, or joints. The Ointment should be applied after the affected parts have been patiently fomented with warm water, when the Ointment should be diligently rubbed upon the adjacent skin, unless the friction causes pain. Holloway's Pills should be simultaneously taken to diminish pain, reduce inflammation, and purify the blood. This treatment abates the violence, and lessens the frequency of gout, rheumatism, and all spasmodic diseases which spring from hereditary predisposition, or from any accidental weakness of constitution. The Ointment checks the local malady, while the Pills restore vital power.

SIR PASUPATI ANANDA GAJAPATI RAZ, K. C. I. E., Maharaja of Vizianagram, is Gazetted an Additional Member of the Council of the Governor-General for the purpose of making Laws and Regulations, with effect from the 15th February, 1888.

A LAND acquisition case is thus reported by the new Lucknow paper :

"It appears that the Oudh and Rohilkhand Railway Company took six acres of valuable land at Byram Ghat, the timber emporium on the Ghagra, belonging to Raja Sarabjit Singh of Ramnuggur in the Bara-Banki district. The Deputy Commissioner offered Rs. 16,100, price and compensation, while the Raja claimed Rs. 115,000. The nett annual income of the land was Rs. 1,400. A reference was made to the District Judge of Lucknow, who decided that Rs. 50,566 should be paid to the Raja. The Government considered the above amount as exorbitant and unreasonable, and offered to return the land to the Raja—which he refused. An appeal was preferred to the Judicial Commissioner, who reduced the amount to Rs. 29,440, valuing the land at 16 years' purchase, together with compensation for compulsory acquisition and some trifling damages to the Raja."

SEVENTY rate-payers of the town and Suburbs met together in the rooms of the British Indian Association, on Wednesday last, to consider the Municipal Bill now passing through the local Council. They had nothing to discuss, and only hoped that the report of the Select Committee would be published before being taken up in Council, and regretted that the Council paid no heed to the recommendations of the B. I. A. on the passed portion of the Bill. They further resolved to send a copy of their resolutions to the Legislative Council and to form a Committee to watch the progress of the Bill.

"Watched and worried as if they were the inmates of a reformatory or a house of correction, chided and punished for every infraction of the rules, which extend to their dress, the cut of their hair, the choice of companions, the students are kept in a state of incipient rebellion, which leads to frequent outbreaks of disorder and insubordination."

In justice to the Government it ought to be remembered that the students on the Continent are the most impudent imps in Creation. They would in five minutes give a good account of the Ramsays and other Police officers, who at Krishnaghur and Dacca behaved so harshly towards the Bengali lads. The Vienna students attacked the War Office and hanged the War Minister before it.

THROUGH the Bangalore Examiner, a gentleman of correct principles draws attention to an important subject. He has been shocked at the licentiousness of the local bulls and cows. These have so little respect for public decency, that they do not mind practising the multiplication table in sight of passers-by. The writer asks, Is there no Municipal Regulation to prevent cattle-breeding being carried on in the public streets? Certainly, there ought to be one. But we doubt whether such a Regulation will meet the whole evil, and hence is it that we have called it an important subject. Surely, our bovine friends are not the only offenders in the line. What of our canine and our feline companions? And where is the machinery to prevent the bow-wowling Pariahs from insulting you in your face? These paupers of the race almost justify the severity of the British who, wherever they go, exterminate them. We wonder what the Franks do in Turkey, which abounds in gaunt homeless brutes prowling about the thoroughfares. If they shut their eyes, they must open them but rarely.

WE are glad to see our last week's remarks on the silk of Burma attracting notice of our countrymen. We cordially welcome the following letter :—

SIR,—In your last issue you have made a few remarks, concerning the indigenous silk products of Burmah. Have you never seen the Assamese silks? There are many sorts of them; and it is no exaggeration to say that one of them (Mûgá) at least, will equal the best European products, in colour and fineness, while it has not a single rival in respect of durability. Considering the antique and imperfect method and the rude implements with which they work, it is really a wonder how the Assamese villagers produce such fine cloths. Besides Mûgá they have Pát which is finer and richer than Mûgá although a little less durable (for a Mûgá will last at least for 10 years in any farm). A single árcá cloth (made of the flos. of Mûgá) which is used as blankets will stand the foulest weather and keep one warm even in the rigorous winter of Assam. Costing only about one half of what we pay for a pair of European blankets it will last considerably longer. Even the Mûgá and the Pát is far cheaper than the Chinese and other exported silks. I need not mention the good qualities of the silk. What I mean to say is Assamese silk is as good for export as the Burmese silk and perhaps better and it also wants all the improvements a rude manufacture is in need of. You have given hopes of a good market 'nearer home' for the Burmese silk. Perhaps you may do so as well for the Assamese one. If you have not seen the Assamese silks I shall be extremely happy to show you some of my own use though they are not the best specimen.

AN ASSAMESE.

The 14th February 1888.

We shall be glad to receive a visit from our correspondent.

NOTES AND LEADERETTES.

SIR CHARLES TURNER replaces in the India Council Sir Henry Sumner Maine removed by death. An unexceptionable appointment. And a compensation for the last disappointment. The former Judge of the N. W. P. High Court will be a standing antidote to the late Lt.-Governor of Upper India. In these days of the Reign of Law, the presence of a good unclotchetty lawyer at the fountain-head of Government is invaluable.

THE Petroleum Bill has been passed by the Supreme Legislative Council. It was originally proposed to levy an ad valorem duty of 5 per cent., but in deference to the wishes of the mercantile community, power has been taken to levy a fixed duty. The rate is 6 pies per imperial gallon, which is about 3 per cent. more, and will yield an additional revenue of 10 lacs, or 3½ more than the original estimate.

At the last sitting of the Council, the Hon'ble Mr. Westland obtained leave to introduce and introduced a Bill to prohibit the making or issue by private persons of pieces of metal for use as money and the making of coins in resemblance or similitude of coins of Foreign States. The Finance Minister explained that it was not meant to introduce a crusade against what are ordinarily known as "dummy" pice, but to prevent private persons from making or issuing them. Mr. Westland declares that manufacturers of these coins cannot be reached by the Penal Code, for counterfeiting Queen's coin, for coin has been defined as "metal used for the time being as money, and stamped and issued by the authority of some State or Sovereign Power in order to be so used." But, says he, "it is possible that such coinage may come within some other section of the Penal Code." He, however, does not stop to examine the other sections of the Code, and jumps to the conclusion that "it is assuredly proper for the Government to take up this matter directly, and to define the making of these pice as what, to all intents and purposes, is a fraudulent fabrication of coin." Mr. Westland is presumably a good arithmetician, and there are Baboos enough in his office who are accountants. He has yet to prove himself a financier. Meanwhile, he does not show the stuff of a legislator. It is only in India that such language could ever be held in a Parliament. It is an insult to the community. It would be considered indecent at a vestry to support a proposition for a gratuity to a beadle.

At their sitting on Saturday week, the Bengal Council made no alteration in the Municipal Bill as recommended by the Select Committee. There were many amendments, but all were lost. There was one notable exception, and that was saved in a notable way. The Select Committee had conferred the franchise on the members of the University—Fellows and graduates. Our Member for the University was opposed to so revolutionary an exaltation of education. After that poor Saraswati was disfranchised by the casting vote of the President.

THE Home Government is not prepared to sanction a Bench of the High Court for Oudh. The existing Acts give no authority for the step and it is not the time to apply to Parliament for fresh legislation. There is no hope of Parliament attending to India so long as the Irish question is not settled one way or another. We have repeatedly said so, notably in supporting the petition of the Bengal Chamber of Commerce for the revival of the Budget debate.

THE Board of Revenue, L. P., have not been deaf to the outcry against the outstill. They have had the candour to recognise the value of the suggestions made by Mr. Edgar's Commission. Accordingly, before any definite change of policy is promulgated by the head of the Administration, it has been decided, from the commencement of the official year in April next, to limit the production and to fix the minimum selling price.

SOME of the Divisional Commissioners have reported against the Competition-wallahs of the Subordinate Judicial Service. They recommend the other system or a mixed, one of Nomination and Competition. The present rage, however, is for open competition, and the Local Government seems in no hurry to pass orders on the subject.

THE Paris correspondent of the Daily Chronicle says:—

“The Maharajah Gaikwar of Baroda, before leaving Paris, paid the price agreed upon for his apartments, £240. The landlord demanded £1,120 for damages. The Prince refused to pay, but offered to deposit the sum in a bank or elsewhere, until the matter could be arranged. The landlord refused, and attempted to seize the Prince's baggage at the railway station. The railway authorities refused to allow this without a judge's order. This the landlord obtained, but for £800. A telegram was immediately sent, and the special train conveying the Maharajah and suite was ordered to be stopped at Belfort, and all the baggage seized unless £800 were deposited. The Prince will make a complaint in the proper quarter respecting this arbitrary procedure. The claim of £1,120 was simply an attempt at extortion by the proprietor of the house occupied by the Maharaja when in Paris en route for London for the Queen's Jubilee. The sum at first demanded for repairs was £48 but when the landlord discovered his tenant to be a wealthy prince he increased the claim to £1,120. The Prince had paid £240 for one month's rent.”

We almost think those Indian Princes served rightly who frivolously leave their country, to waste abroad the taxes paid, with the sweat of their brow and their blood, by their poor subjects or tenantry. Why should they, without sufficient cause, put themselves in the power of these unconscionable harpies? The extortion of the Paisian traders is notorious. They served the late Nawab Nazim in the same way. A tailor charged a fabulous price for a coat, and pursued him to London to recover it.

THE New Loyalty has been reduced to an absurdity, by a wag or a simpleton, we are not sure which. The offers for frontier defences, commenced by the Nizam at 60 lacs, have filtrated down deep. And now the ridiculous has been reached. One Bhagat Sib Ram of Jullundur has come forward with his loyalty tribute of Rs. 5. The contribution may be a trifle, but the loyalty is genuine, beyond question. Nor is a State that taxes the salt of the people and poisons its subjects at home and those of its allies abroad, in order to raise a revenue, entitled to despise the pence of the poor. We wonder whether the Viceroy will himself acknowledge the offering of the inimitative Bhagat of Jullundur. Or, will the duty be delegated to one of the messengers in Sir Donald Wallace's office. The constable of the beat might do, without sacrifice of proportion, but then who will protect the Bhagat from the Police and their peculiar practices?

THE local Government has reduced the sentence of transportation for life on Sadhu Sahu for murder of his wife, to five years' hard labor. The circumstances under which the deed was committed justified the intervention, but surely the Crown should have interfered to better purpose or not interfered at all. The ravished wife is dead and gone. The husband, who murdered her to escape further ignominy, must rot in jail. But what of the ravisher? He slipped through the meshes of the law, and now is as free as a bird. That could not, and cannot, be helped, of course. It would have been more agreeable to native sentiment, had the sentence on Sadhu been committed to simple imprisonment, considering that five years' hard labor, amounts usually to death by slow torture. But native feeling is confessedly weak in such matters, and it is a grave responsibility to do aught that might lessen the popular respect for the law. We are grateful to the Lt.-Governor for the promptitude with which he exerted himself to save the victim of a relentless Code. As soon as he received the Cuttack petition, before the Press had spoken a word, he at once put himself in communication with the High Court and with the other authorities concerned.

We have only to ask Government to keep an eye on the unspeakable Ooryah Zemindar.

THE recent measures of Government for making both ends meet, have drawn a good deal of sharp criticism throughout the country. The Bombay press, as befits the organ of a commercial community, has taken the lead in the opposition. All the Western native papers have written strongly against the fiscal policy of the Administration, and specially condemned the illiberal want of confidence in the people shown, and denounced the Salt Tax. Native Opinion, in particular, has expressed itself in a pithy but weighty article. Our contemporary, like the rest of the native press, harps on the reimposition of the Import Duties on Cottons as a properer alternative to the added impost on Salt. The writer reminds the Government—

“Those duties were taken away in times of financial prosperity. But when the times changed and our finances fell into a very gloomy condition as at present those duties ought to have been the first to have been resorted to. Even Lord Salisbury while he was urging upon the Government of India the abolition of cotton duties in 1875 said that ‘the duty should be removed whenever the conditions of your revenues shall enable you to part with it,’ and also that in deciding upon the mode in which it should be done ‘the paramount importance of guarding the Indian Treasury from financial embarrassment must be borne in mind.’ He never meant that the duties were to be abolished at all events, but he only meant to say that whenever the Indian finances permitted it their abolition ought to be accomplished. In recording a minute on the dissents of Sir E. Perry and Sir H. Montgomery he insisted further upon this principle and said that he objected to the action of the then Government of India only because having had money available for the reduction of import duties they did not do so, and he further was careful to explain that he never suggested fresh taxation as an alternative. But that is exactly what the Government of India have now done. They have practically imposed a fresh tax in order to justify the abolition of the import duties. The salt duty was reduced and import duties abolished in good times, but the question was as to which should they have had a resort to first, in bad times!”

He goes on—

“And we do not think that there could be two opinions as to the desirability of going to the import duties. That they are not protective is we think proved beyond doubt, and it would have been certainly more honest to have imposed them. Further the increase in the salt duty does not afford the whole relief that we want. It still leaves us under the necessity of finding out other sources while the imposition of import duties should have given us about £8000,000 at once and that without injuring any body whatever.”

The Hon'ble Raja Peary Mohan Mookerjee has been universally censured for declaring from his place in Council, that the imposition of the Salt tax has given general satisfaction to the people. But the Raja has already earned his reward in the praises of His Excellency the Viceroy.

We fear the Salt Tax has been a great mistake. An addition to the Income Tax would, no doubt, have been vigorously assailed, and by many of those who now denounce the present measure. But there would have been courage and generosity in the act.

ON the 16th December last, in the Queen's Bench, Mr. Justice Day corrected a counsel who made an application to his lordship to adjourn a case until after the “luncheon time” of the court, on the ground that the plaintiff had telegraphed that he had missed his train. The proper language, as the Judge pointed out, was “after the adjournment,” as “the Court does not lunch.” This seems hair-splitting, but hairs are no trifle in a system in which the Judges and advocates perform their duties under ugly disguises, burdening themselves with heavy wigs.

The incident ought to make our lawyers in this country careful in their speech and conversation in Court. A Government pleader once pathetically complained to the Court of being repeatedly bullied by it. What do you say? thundered Mr. Justice Louis Jackson. In the end, however, the pleader was pardoned when it appeared that he did not know the force and use of the word. This kind of ignorance is far too common, and not by any means confined to our pleaders. The most irritating slips are made even by speakers and writers who ought to know, and who think they know, better.

INFORMATION was last week received from Teheran of the death, at the end of December, of Mahomed Khan, lately Governor-General of Khorassan, and formerly Minister for Foreign Affairs in Persia. He will be remembered as at one time the popular Persian Minister in London. A liberal statesman, he initiated several reforms and supported all measures for the good of his country and countrymen. He had none of the prejudices of Shiah bigots against the Frank or the Nazarene. He lived in friendly intercourse with all Europeans, but his partiality to the British was too pronounced and well-known to make him a persona grata with the other Powers and peoples. He was regarded in certain quarters as little short of a creature of our Government.

THE Chief Magistrate, after a long and patient enquiry, has come to the conclusion that "phooka" is a cruel process. Notwithstanding the revelation of Gabriel—not the angel, of course, but the surgeon—he has no hesitation in the matter. He emphasises his displeasure at the practice of milkmen by ordering the full penalty. We give the judgment elsewhere. It is a triumph of the higher civilisation. Men of every nationality and creed—Hindus, Mussulmans, Parsees, Jains, Christians—who are interested in protecting our dumb fellow-creatures from insult, oppression and outrage, and in preserving their own children from demoralization, will rejoice at the result.

THE discovery of the now famous Kola nut is as curious a history as the Peruvian bark itself. It was introduced to the West Indies, Mexico, Brazil, and other places, by the slave-dealers, who had it from the Africans, and was wont to administer it to their slaves, by way of a cure for suicidal mania to which they were driven by harsh treatment and the horrors of the Middle Passage. In Africa, we believe, it is esteemed as a delightful stimulant. It ought to be physiologically tested. We do not know if it is procurable here. Perhaps Dr. King might tell.

REIS & RAYYET.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 18, 1888.

THE VICEROY'S RESIGNATION.

THE resignation of the Viceroy is the topic of the day. It is the occasion also for judgment on His Excellency and his administration. Europeans are thankful for the proof that Lord Ripon left these shores with all his wardrobe, including mantle and small clothes and all. For the very reason, our countrymen are proportionately disappointed. They are so little used to petting from high latitudes, that they are prepared to be content with the maximum of good words, even though accompanied by the minimum of performance. In general, they now prefer to rest their hopes in the future, to making themselves unhappy over the past. The Irreconcilables form the exception. In the same breath, they impeach the past and demand guarantees for the future. They are piling up the agony on the head of the Governor-General, till Lord Dufferin is reduced to the pass of Warren Hastings, when for half an hour he regarded himself as the greatest villain in Creation.

One well-known journal, towards the close of a long article, fires up—"We hold Lord Dufferin primarily responsible for the breach between the Hindus and Mahomedans." That is news indeed! Whoever before suspected it? That many Anglo-Indians are ready to divide class against class, we have reason to believe. But this is the first time we hear that the Viceroy was "primarily responsible" for the breach between the two sects. Indeed, we were assured from the same quarter that there had been no breach at all, that the appearance of it of last year had been repaired by the Mahomedans attending in force at the late Congress, and cordially participating in the proceedings, and by the fact of the leading Mahomedan of Bombay presiding on the occasion. But the writer follows up with something more specific. "The ill-conceived speech of Sir Syed Ahmad, recently delivered at Lucknow, is a striking instance of Lord Dufferin's policy." How? it is not explained. We scarcely remember so capital a non sequitur. The alleged genesis of the Goodwin Sands pales before this inference. Fortunately for the peace of the ruler of India, the bathos which immediately follows, may afford him a crumb of comfort. "Lord Dufferin has, we regret to say, done little good to the people of this country." So the formidable indictment for high crimes and misdemeanours collapses in a feeble negative complaint. The writer evidently felt his weakness, and there is a slight convulsive attempt at putting a grim face on the matter. "He [the Viceroy] has added more to their [the people's] miseries than to their happiness." The whole agony is brought to a close in this note of interrogation:—

"How can we, then, sympathise with His Lordship's administration?"

Whoever expected you to do so? But, surely, it is expected of public writers that they should not, in quiet times, needlessly embitter the discussion of public topics, nor exasperate political opponents. There is a time for anger, we grant, but is this the season? Indignation is one of the noblest passions of poor human nature—it is worthy of the gods themselves. Hebrew Inspiration claims it for the Almighty Himself. But there ought to be no mistake about the occasion. It ought not to be held cheap, nor made a substitute for every whiff of discontent or difference. Least of all, should it be manufactured and kept ready for use. Grave charges should not be idly preferred. If we of the meaner sort have our rights to which we cling religiously, surely our betters have not been left the sport of wind and wave of their neighbours' passion. However numerous his offences, whatever the enormity of his transgressions, the Earl of Dufferin has not yet been definitively adjudged an outlaw. The poor Viceroy of India is entitled to some protection from causeless attacks and incoherent reproaches and frivolous annoyances. In the interest of the Empire, he ought to be protected. Nor ought the task be left to the British in India. The Natives, who are constantly demanding justice, ought to show the example of it themselves—let loyalty alone. Having never been among the admirers of the Administration, we are the better able, without loss of self-respect, to perform the duty.

THE EUROPEAN PRESS, INSULAR AND CONTINENTAL. KATKOFF AND BLAQUE.

IN the beginning of last year, the new magazine called Concord appeared with a brief article, from the pen of Baboo Sambhu C. Mookerjee, on justice to journalists. The writer noticed the self-depreciation and neglect of the conductors of the Press, and seemed to attribute to it, in a great measure, that striking contrast between the importance of the Press in England and the insignificance of the men of the Press. This anomaly, however, he pointed out, was confined to Great Britain. On the Continent, journalists have no impracticable modesty, and labour under no social or political disability. The plan or, at any rate, the proportions of the paper—an old manuscript of jottings exhumed from an old drawer with additions here and there in course of passing through the press—precluded any extensive illustration. The main proposition was, however, considered safe. Nevertheless, it was assailed in some quarters, and an attempt made to quote that poor driveller Alison's History against it.

Be that as it may, contemporary history has since gone far to strengthen the position held in Concord. It is a remarkable fact that the conductors of fettered journalism are more regarded than the leaders of the largest and still absolutely free journalism in Europe. Fettered round by restrictions, borne down by disabilities, the press on the Continent has perhaps always commanded greater influence than the same institution in Great Britain, while its members have occupied a superior position in society and held a passport to active political life. In France and in Italy, in Germany and in Hungary, and even in backward Spain, the great journalists are now, as ever, among the leading politicians and party chiefs. In the last named country, the greatest master of oratory is singularly enough the most trenchant "leader" writer. In France, from the Great Revolution, the press has played a prominent part in the sensational drama of affairs, and editors have not only been tribunes but also Presidents. M. Sidi Carnot, the present ruler, will doubtless, on enquiry, be found to have been connected with the press. M. Grevy's mentor was certainly a journalist, and it was under Mons. H. Maret's advice that the late President first seriously decided to resign.

The most striking illustration of not only the importance of the Press but the influence and power of its conductors in the heart of Continental absolutism, has been furnished, during the year just closed, by despotic Russia. The politics of that great Empire was found to centre in what in England would derisively be called a "gentleman of the press." The primum mobile of the vast organization was not among arch-dukes, or nobles or Generals, or ministers. It was not a landlord or capitalist. It was neither the cabinet nor the Senate,—no, not a syndicate or junto of any kind. It was not the Archbishop of Moscow nor the Patriarch of Constantinople. It was not even the holy Czar of all the Russias and earthly disposer of all the Russians himself. These are all mighty in their ways and all but all-important. A mysterious power lay behind them all. A simple literary man, without office or rank or fortune or decorations, held in his single hand the strings of the wondrous mechanism, to set in motion by one pull the vast forces. That man was M. Katkoff, the editor of the Moscow Gazette. After the death of Skobeloff, he became the leading figure in Russian politics, of commanding influence at home, and necessarily watched with interest, perchance anxiety, abroad. He was greater than his prototype. If Skobeloff was the darling hero of Russian ambition, Katkoff was the more powerful politician. If Skobeloff fired the military ambition of his countrymen and alarmed other nations by his elaborate business-like dreams, Katkoff wielded a farther-reaching influence on affairs at home. If the military knight was the more fascinating personality, the litterateur was the weightier man.

Marshalls and Ministers were dwarfed in his presence, for the Czar deferred to him, and the Czar deferred because he found it his interest to do so. It was no freak of imperial favoritism. That journalist might turn the empire against the Czar, and the Czar had had his troubles enough already, with the Eastern Question unsettled and the Far Eastern Questions settled for the time against him, and, worst of all, the grim spectre of Nihilism pursuing him as his own shadow. The Czar was no fool to quarrel with such a man, at the risk of multiplying his difficulties and dangers. Like a wise prince, he sought counsel of the man, who, above the passions of office, could advise him better than any ministry—the only man he knew who, cherishing all the patriotic dreams of Russia, possessed the sobriety and ballast of a statesman.

Katkoff's fame was of a brief span. The same twelvemonth buried him with high honors at Moscow that first sounded his name throughout the globe. This vision of a strange career in the history of the Press rose like a glorious meteor, soon to disappear. It is a proof at once of the importance of the press and of the rare personality of the man, that, although the Czar himself has been at the pains to search for a successor, none could be found, so that his Majesty has appointed a commission of several to conduct the newspaper. This high dignity of the press is not by any means confined to Russia. As we have before observed, it is the same in many countries—generally on the Continent; though, of course, such grand editors as Katkoff are rare birds. Perhaps, they do not thrive in free countries. Rochefort and Greele and de Cassagnac are pigmies before the imperial Katkoff. The nearest analogue to the latter that we remember, was Blaque, an editor in Constantinople, and it is in Turkey, a generation or two back, that journalism found its behest.

Let us quote a former traveller:—

"The person for whom I had a letter was Monsieur Blaque, the editor of the Moniteur Ottoman, the only newspaper published at Constantinople, and for whom the Sultan had allotted a palace. I found him a most highly educated man, possessing much information, and the most gentlemanly manners; his conversation far superior to that of any individual I had met with in Turkey, his hospitality keeping pace with his other good qualities, and it was with much regret I heard of his death some time since. It appeared a grand innovation, the idea of having a newspaper in such a country as Turkey; but I am confident in stating it was placed under great restrictions, as M. Blaque begged I would not judge of himself after his paper.

Some have ascribed the death of M. Blaque to poison, administered at the instigation of the Russians, on account of their suspecting him, from the tone of his writings, to have been gained over to the English interest, by the all attractive power, which, as foreigners pretend, has swayed the world. British gold, need I state is that charm, which has, indeed, from its force, either directly or indirectly dissolved kingdoms, and annihilated even a powerful empire, as who but England furnished that nerve of war to Russia, Austria, and Prussia, in the late protracted struggle? That M. Blaque perished through the agency of Russia, I do not believe: that her policy is artful and subtle, I readily admit; but direct crimes, attacking the lives of individuals, have never been proved against the Russian government, although much has been asserted on the subject.

That the Muscovites looked upon M. Blaque with a very jealous eye there can be little doubt, as that gentleman's influence with the Turkish Government did not proceed alone from his paper, but from his close intimacy with the Seraskier, from whom, as being the most powerful man in the Ottoman empire, emanate every important change or improvement which takes place in the administration of affairs in Turkey."—A Residence in Greece and Turkey, &c. ROY'S MIDWIFE'S VADE-MECUM.*

THIS is, in one and that a high sense, perhaps the most important work of the vernacular press issued during the last twelvemonth. For great as it is and has been, during the period, the activity of that press, many as have been the publications annually registered, the result is feeble and disappointing in the extreme. The higher activity of the native mind is represented by scarcely half a dozen Sanskrit and English books. Vernacular literature is naturally more productive, but to little purpose. Of noise there is no lack, but the wool yielded is infinitesimal. The number of publications recorded is out of all proportion to quantity of the letter-press. Flimsy in character as insignificant in volume, most of them are small pamphlets rather than books. Schoolbooks form a legion, and they sell well, as they are made to. A few painstaking professional works and a fewer efforts of taste and imagination, and one or two of controversial skill and learning complete the respectable fraction. Of originality or research resulting in contributions of any pretensions, there is vastly little evidence.

Accordingly, we give Baboo Haranath Roy's book a cordial welcome. The author is obviously a man of mark. He is a medical practitioner of many years' standing and of wide experience in many parts of Lower Bengal and Upper India, and familiar with more than one system of treatment. Nor is he altogether unknown to the professional literary world. He is the author of some slight brochures—notably one in English on the treatment of Croup—and has been a contributor to several medical societies and journals, English and Bengali, in this country and to some in Europe. The appearance of the magnum opus of such a man must always and everywhere be an interesting event. In our country, with its prevailing literary dearth, reaching absolute famine, in works of tolerable pretensions, it is a circumstance for exceptional gratulation. The author himself is not a man to hide his light under a bushel. Without resorting to sensationalism, or stooping to any illegitimate arts, he deliberately claims attention. His title page is a challenge, and his whole tone that of a master, or at any rate of a passed student, in the best sense. That will irritate many, perhaps, and give offence to some, and may be used by professional rivals to his discredit. The Sanskrit verse adopted by the author as motto, is, no doubt, needlessly offensive. For all that, we confess, we enjoy the spectacle. Indeed, to us Hindus it comes naturally from a Hindu writer and a Brahman into the bargain. In these days of indecision, mock modesty, complimentary insincerity, and nervous dread of criticism, it is refreshing to see a new author (for new Baboo Haranath is for all his fugitive occasional appearance in journals many of which have ceased to be) with something of the self-assertion of the old Sanskrit Pandits. Nor is this necessarily a bad sign. Except in absolute fools, it is more often a symptom of power rather than of weakness. It is usually the expression of genuine painstaking. In such cases, what is the harm? Regarded even in the light of taste, it is a venal fault. In practice, there is an obvious advantage in the spirit. There is no surer way of forcing public attention. You may dislike the man ever so much for his vanity, you cannot help listening to the author. That self-esteem indeed is not mere vanity which is built on solid worth. Perhaps, it is not always a respectable sentiment which leads us to take fire at the slightest appearance of a man claiming his due respect. We plead for no mercy to imposters, but there may be public loss from punishing honest workers for a natural and legitimate pride in their performances. If a man has expended twenty five years' labour and thought for our benefit as well as his own joy and glory, it is but fair to let him say so. If he proclaims it like a sandwichman, on his title and cover, that is his business. Ours is only the advantage—we know what to expect. He has got to make good his claim. If the outcome of so much exertion is inadequate, so much the worse for him!

Baboo Haranath fully sustains his title. The preface keeps up the strain of the title-page, but high as are his pretensions, his book does not belie them. At the end of the preface is given a list of the principal works consulted. It is a formidable catalogue for this country, where, in the absence of a great national collection or even a well-stocked professional library, books are difficult to procure. It includes all the best and latest treatises, memoirs and monographs on or bearing on midwifery and cognate researches. The book precludes the possibility of its motto being fairly retorted upon its writer. He has evidently profited by his fine library. The book is not a translation of any single work nor a translation from several, but it embraces all the truths discovered in the West, and all the experiences gathered in the two prominent schools of medical practice, and all the ideas and suggestions of the best writers. Withal, it is an original book, and herein is one of its chief claims to distinction. It embodies not only the fruits of extensive professional reading and reflection, but also the results of long years of independent observation. Traces of hospital as well as out-door practice may be discerned in the treatment of many of the difficult subjects treated. The bare scientific foundation of the structure—the theory of obstetrics—has been drawn from the teaching of his Western masters. Not so in the practical part—in midwifery proper, if we may call it so. Herein, he has more relied on himself. There is scarcely a method of treatment which he has adopted on authority only. The teachings of eminent authors and successful surgeons have usually been tested by the writer himself. He has something of his own to say on each branch of his subject.

This is the most notable publication in Bengali medical literature—probably the most important contribution to scientific literature by any native of India, scarcely excepting the treatise on Indigenous Materia Medica of the late lamented Uday Charan Dutt. It is a complete system of obstetrics, in theory and in practice, combining physiology, pathology, diagnostics, therapeutics, accoucheuring, sanitation and hygiene, down to the smallest details of nursing, even medical sociology and jurisprudence. Everything in fact is there, except operative obstetrics, on which the author announces a separate work in the press. And yet it is compressed within the small compass of less than 400 pages. It is a valuable handbook, always to the point. So exhaustive a book is scarcely to be met with anywhere. It will bear translation into English. We hope it will soon be translated into the other Eastern tongues. We can confidently recommend it to the Association for Supplying Medical Aid to the Women of India for adoption in their schools and hospitals and for circulation among midwives, daces, and families. Being at once scientific and practical, it is peculiarly adapted for general as well as professional use.

Commencing with the structure of the pelvis and after describing the anatomy of generation and the mechanism in of conception, the author plunges into the diagnosis of pregnancy, the disorders incident to it, abortion and premature delivery. He next dwells on Labor, in its classification of normal and abnormal. From the mechanism of labor, he passes through twin pregnancy and spurious pregnancy, to the signs of death of the fœtus in the womb, the manipulation of pregnancy, the rules to be observed in the several stages of labor, finishing with an exhaustive medicinal treatment of the different conditions and difficulties involved. Thus, we have medicines on eleven different heads, from those to facilitate labor to those to remedy the after-weakness. Then we come to inversion of the womb, the management of woman after child-birth, with remedies for general complaints of lying-in females, the secretion of milk, with remedies for disorders in respect of it, whether in the way of absent or deficient or excessive secretion. The management of the child follows. The subject of unnatural labor is again taken up and thoroughly treated. Long-lasting labor pains, plural and monstrous births, management of the several presentations of the head, face, breech, and body of the fœtus, accidents and ailments in labor and in the puerperal state, prolapse of the cord, adherence of the placenta, hemorrhage, ante-partum and post-partum, laceration of the perineum, rupture of the womb and the bladder, &c., are the principal topics in this part. Nor are the deeper constitutional derangements, such as puerperal fever, pyæmia, mania and convulsions, spurious peritonitis, &c., neglected. A Chapter on sterility completes the main subject of the book. But the book continues. Indeed, some of the most interesting topics are reserved for the end. To many high class readers, this part will be the most valuable. For, here by way of an Appendix, some of the most important and difficult problems are reviewed with knowledge and ability, and in a lucid way. The arrangement is faulty. Subjects which should have been disposed of in the main body, such as Diet and Hygiene of pregnancy, confinement rooms, displacements, easy method of dilating the os-uteri, changes in womb after delivery, diseases which complicate pregnancy, &c., are relegated pell-mell to the end, and form, mixed up with the Law of sex, the effects of conception from early marriage, the chronological development of the fetus, the changes in the mother consequent on pregnancy, &c., a curious olla podrida. We suspect some of these matters were after thoughts, perhaps introduced at the request of friends. Anyhow, they are all useful, and some of them very valuable. Thus the author's opinion, founded on long observation and on many cases, will be regarded as conclusive by most candid men engaged in the discussion of the burning early marriage question.

THE LATE SHOOTING CASE.

After a most patient and exhaustive trial in the High Court, lasting for three consecutive days, three innocent men, Pogson, Jones and Sergeant, have secured their freedom to breathe the pure air of heaven once more, the unanimous verdict of the Jury acquitting them honorably on all the four counts, to the manifest satisfaction and delight of the whole body of spectators who thronged the Court. The "Code of the Calcutta Police" seems to say that the innocent shall suffer for the guilty. It is difficult to find any other explanation of the case. How would it have been with these poor fellows had not a friend come forward single-handed to their rescue. I refer to Mr. M.T. Cox. And here I cannot help admiring the noble conduct of this gentleman. We of the governing community have scarcely a single individual of such modest worth. Unasked he not only sacrificed his time and business, but, not content with this, he placed his not over abundant purse at the service of the otherwise undefended, and so helped to remove the burden of their alleged guilt.

My object is to redeem these poor men's character from the common yet popular belief, as indulged in by the Indian Daily News, that they were the aggressors. I must first notice the character of the evidence adduced, and the "spotless character" of the witnesses for the prosecution, some of whom are only too well known to fame, and who are familiar with the inside of the Criminal Industrial Branch of the Jail. The conduct and daring of Inspector Forsyth has been throughout in keeping with his scientific training, as being the only individual who, amongst the Police Force, is practised in calling black white or by any other color, to accomplish his jobbery, and his Catechism as a Police Officer teaches him to say that the "end justifies the means in all cases." So it is nothing surprising to find this witness for the prosecution commit himself so culpably. The convict John Mackenzie Scott, ex-Constable of Police, acquitted himself as can only be expected from a man such as he is, bent on promoting the welfare of his "Dictators," and, to my mind, failed in his duty from a fear of excelling the doings of Forsyth; and the others, Jackson, Walters, and Ferris are, more or less, a "Combined Family," and as such their interests are consolidated, and therefore all must be agreed, that White is Black, and Black is no color at all. The only safe conclusion I can arrive at, is that from interested motives Inspector Forsyth, having once been the recipient of Walters' charity, was bound to help Jackson, father-in-law of Walters, who was the only proper person to be prosecuted for the affair. From the scathing, and not over severe language of their able Counsel, Mr. R. Allan, I feel convinced that the Commissioner of Police or his Deputy, Mr. Lambert, will, for the good of the Police Force, reduce Inspector Forsyth to the grade of a Constable, that is, if he can bring his mind to bear favorably on the conduct of this man, otherwise to mark his sense of displeasure by discharging him from the Force. Retaining him in the Force would have a most demoralising influence on others, and, as it is, his conduct in this prosecution has done much harm to the reputation of the Calcutta Police Force. The conduct of Forsyth is similar to that of Policeman Endecoat of Cass notoriety, and he therefore is deserving of being prosecuted, for getting up the disgraceful conspiracy, in order to shield his friend's father-in-law (Jackson). Both Mr. Allan and the gentlemen of the Jury have earned the respect and good will of all right-thinking persons, and, in my opinion, no other but Mr. Allan could have handled the case in so able a manner, which means that he has gained a glorious victory, and rescued honest men from being branded for life as villains of the deepest dye.

A LOVER OF TRUTH.

THE PHOOKA CASE.

(Before C. H. Keily, Esq., Chief Presidency Magistrate.)

The following judgment was delivered by his Worship on the 31st January :—

The accused in this case is charged with committing an act of wanton cruelty on a cow under the following circumstances, as described by the witness Moreton: "I first saw the accused milk two cows in the natural way. He came to the third, a little black one, and deliberately subjected it to phooka. The result was the cow's back hunched up, the tongue came out, the eyes appeared to be starting from their sockets, she groaned, and appeared to be in extreme agony." Three Veterinary Surgeons, Messrs. Hart, Symonds, and Greenhill, were called on behalf of the prosecution. Mr. Hart, who apparently had seen the process put in practice, says: "The effect, in my opinion, is painful to the animal operated upon. I consider it a barbarous piece of cruelty." Later on the same witness says: "The effect on milk is nothing, it is a perfectly useless operation. I don't think the milk is affected either as to quality or quantity by the operation. I don't think there would be any difference in the appearance of the milk. If the operation is repeated it is productive of pain to the cow, and therefore must do it harm. I do not think it would benefit the cow in any way." In cross-examination the same witness says: "The blowing being an unnatural process, the forcing in of air into parts not intended by nature to receive it must be attended with pain. Ill effects would follow from the process if continued." Mr. Symonds describes the process as painful to the cow, and utterly useless. Mr. Greenhill also describes the process as one which causes pain to the cow. "The process, if persisted in," he adds, "would affect the general health of the cow. An animal daily tortured in this way would be nervously affected, and the general constitution thereby impaired. It would not make the cow more serviceable for the use of mankind, it would have the reverse effect. The operation would, in my opinion, tend to bring about disease in the local organs operated upon."

For the defence two cowkeepers, Hutto and Mohesh Marik, have been called, and a medical witness, Dr. Gabriel. The two cowkeepers admit that they are in the habit of performing this operation daily, Hutto on a large proportion, Mohesh Marik on each of his milch cows. They agree in asserting that the operation is necessary in the case of cows who have either lost or been separated from their calves. They both adhere to the theory that it is necessary for a cow to micturate before she can be milked, and that the operation of blowing is therefore indispensable in order to produce that effect on the cow, a result which they allege is invariably brought about by a sucking calf when it first applies its mouth to the teat. They stoutly deny that the operation harms the cow in any way. Dr. Gabriel, who apparently was specially retained to witness the operation after the institution of the present prosecution, describes the process as he saw it performed, and is of opinion that the process does not cause pain. He, moreover, is of opinion that there is some ground for believing that the operation does induce the flow of a larger supply of milk than could be obtained by the ordinary process of milking.

Mr. Palit, for accused, did not seriously contend that the process was one which did not cause pain to the cow. He, however, said that the operation, though painful, was not a wantonly cruel act. The act, he asserted, as shown by his witnesses, did conduce to a more plentiful supply of milk, and, even if this supposition was an erroneous one, it was beyond doubt that a sincerely mistaken belief in its efficiency was entertained generally by cowkeepers in this part of India, a fact which in itself was sufficient to prevent the application of the word "wanton" to the operation. The process, he further submitted, was had recourse to, not with the object of causing unnecessary pain to the animal, but to increase the supply of milk—a perfectly legitimate object, and done in the pursuit of a lawful purpose. Mr. Sale, for the prosecution, on the evidence given, denied that the process was done for a legitimate object, or for a lawful purpose. He strongly demurred to the argument which would make the belief of the person who was charged with an act of cruelty, whether erroneous or not, a determining factor in the question whether such act was a piece of wanton cruelty.

All cruelty, he urged, fell within the words "wanton cruelty," unless shown to be necessary. It would be only an act of necessary cruelty if done in the interests of the animal, or for the benefit of mankind.

I have no difficulty in coming to the conclusion that the repulsive processes described by the witness Moreton causes pain to the cow. Dr. Gabriel, it is true, is not of this opinion, but it is clear, I think, that the operations he witnessed were not, and probably were never intended to be, genuine specimens of the process. He himself admits that, if the cows he saw operated upon had exhibited symptoms like those spoken to by the witness Moreton, there would be no doubt that the animal was suffering extreme pain. The evidence of the Veterinary Surgeons show that pain is caused. The symptoms as described by Moreton remained unchallenged by cross-examination. Mr. Palit, moreover, practically admitted that the process did cause pain, for the whole of his arguments rest on the supposition that pain was inflicted by the operation. Mr. Sale's argument, which would not prevent the belief of the person inflicting the pain from having any voice in the determination of the question whether the act was one of wanton cruelty, is, in my opinion, a sound one. To hold the contrary would be to make the purpose and object of the Act subservient to the caprices and superstitions of the most ignorant and debased portions of humanity. Some support for the contention raised by Mr. Palit is alleged to be found in the judgment of Day, J., in Lewis vs. Fermer, L. R., 182, B. Div., 534. I do not, however, read that judgment as giving any real support to Mr. Palit's arguments. In that case the crucial test applied by the Judge was not whether the object aimed at by the person who inflicted the pain was one which he honestly believed in, but whether the object itself was a legitimate one, or as put by Kelly, C. B., in Murphy vs. Manning, L. R. 2 Exch. Division, 307, whether the act was done for a lawful purpose. Wills, J., however, in the case first quoted makes it quite clear that if effect is to be given at all to the honest belief of the operator it must be restricted to his belief that what is done will benefit the animal. Now, although the two cowkeepers have the hardihood to assert that the cows subjected to this process thrive and grow fat under the operation, the evidence of all the skilled witnesses is the other way. The cowkeepers, moreover, admit in cross-examination that they rarely keep a cow longer than one season, and that only during the interval she is in milk. Directly the udders are dry, a very large proportion of these cows are fattened up, and sold to the butchers—a procedure, which, in my opinion, strongly corroborates the opinion expressed by the Veterinary Surgeons that the constant repetition of the process does impair the constitution of the cow. The essential point for discussion in this case is whether the act, which is undoubtedly a barbarously cruel one, and which, in my opinion, causes grievous pain to the cow, can be justified on the ground that it is done with a lawful purpose, or for a legitimate object. The evidence shows that the operation is nearly always restricted to cows whose calves are dead or have been sold shortly after their birth.

Both the native witnesses examined on behalf of the accused support this statement. The witness Mohesh Marik admits further that he keeps no cows but those who require this peculiar mode of persuasion before they can be induced to part with their milk. What apparently is done by the cowkeeper is, that he year by year purchases fresh cows, either sells or disposes of in some way the calf soon after it is born, and then subjects the mother divorced from her offspring to such artificial stimulants as his ingenuity has invented for obtaining as plentiful a supply of milk as he believes would be procurable had the calf been left in attendance on the mother. If this be the object which is supposed to justify recourse to this unnatural and cruel process, and in my opinion no other conclusion can be drawn from the evidence of the cowkeepers, it is clear that the object is neither a legitimate one, nor done for a lawful object. Under these circumstances, I have no hesitation in coming to the conclusion that the operation described by the witness Moreton as having been performed by the accused, is a wantonly cruel abuse of the cow, and that he is therefore liable to punishment under section 2 of Act I. of 1869. In the view I have taken of the case it is not necessary to come to a definite finding whether the operation does or does not have the effect on the supply of milk ascribed to it by the witnesses for the defence. If, however, a decision on this point be desirable, I strongly incline to the opinion given by the three Veterinary Surgeons that the operation is a wholly unnecessary abuse of the animal operated upon. It has transpired during the course of these courts of persons charged with a similar offence. The fines imposed in those cases have not apparently had the deterrent effect anticipated, for it is clear that the process of "phooka" or blowing is still carried on extensively in Calcutta. Under these circumstances, I think it necessary to impose on the accused the full penalty provided for the offence under the Act. I sentence the accused Nowcourie Gowala to pay a fine of Rs. 100, or in default to suffer six weeks' simple imprisonment under section 67 of the I. P. Code, as effected by section 40 of the same Code when amended by section 21 of Act X. of 1886.

OPINION OF THE PRESS.

Dr. S. C. Mookerjee, the editor of what is undoubtedly one of the ablest papers in the country in point of literary power is the author of a pleasant little book of Travels in East Bengal.....The author is master of a racy style of English which many an Englishman may envy. Humorous descriptions and caustic satire culiven every page. There is throughout a vigour and freshness of style that lends a charm to the veriest commonplace. If there were, however, a higher purpose in the publication of this book than to lighten the weary evening hours of the ordinary reader, we confess to a feeling that the author has failed in such an object. We are afraid there is not poetry enough in us to body forth in imagination the beauty of the scenes which the author has described in his voyages to and fro between Dacca and Tipperah. Humourist as he is Dr. Mookerjee will remind us of the words of the poet that the point of a "jest lies more in the ear of him that hears it than in the tongue of him that utters it." As with the jest so is it with the description. We do not say that the charge is unfounded. Prosaic as we are, drudging away at the desk, perhaps it is that we lack capacity to follow in imagination what the author has doubtless delineated with an admirable pen.

One of the chief impressions that a reader will receive from a glance at the book is the somewhat strained relation between the Babus and the Anglo-Indians. The author pours a flood of ridicule upon the lordly airs of our "rulers." He hits hard indeed in his account of the Colonel at whist enduring a Babu looking on, when on board the steamer, and of the whiteman's condescension in bowing to the black nigger. Happily we in the South are not so badly off in our commerce with the representatives of Western civilization. In spite of several instances of conflict and misunderstanding Englishmen and Hindus pull on agreeably together. But the author, notwithstanding his involuntary feeling of aloofness from the European, is no stranger to the blessings for which the West has laid us in debt. He has a keen appreciation of the enjoyments of this Westernized life of ours. He looks for ever forward and casts no longing lingering look behind at the things with which we have shaken hands and parted. His heart is in the continuance of British supremacy in the East. And agitation is his utmost weapon for the maintenance of his rights. But he will have nothing with spurious agitation. We extract below a paragraph of excellent advice to his brethren of the press. [Extract.]

The author recounts his adventure with the Railway officials of Sealdah with considerable humour. We feel an irresistible temptation to quote it in extenso, but space forbids. How the greenback was no legal tender, why silver of the Calcutta mint was wanted and how the currency question stood stiff and frowning despite the Editors and Magistrates who had accompanied the author to bid him good-bye at the station, and how again with the advent of the Justice of the Peace all objection to receiving the currency-note vanished, are all narrated in a style that is fittingly characterized only by the word "delightful." In another place the author introduces the reader to the Hindu belief in the auspicious hour for starting on a journey in language of such playful railery that we make no apology for quoting it. [Extract.]

The author has some trenchant criticism on the insolation of the Englishman, which makes him inaccessible to the complaints of extortion or plunder by their menials. They are too absorbed to know all that passes about them and the wrongs that are committed in their names are unnoticed as mere trifles for they have rarely any idea of their magnitude. It is only too well known throughout the country how blackmail in the shape of money or provisions is levied upon the inhabitants when the Collector is on tour. It would be difficult to believe the thing could go on under his very nose without his connivance if we did not know his exclusiveness and his distaste for mixing with the people.

The author devotes the greater part of the book to a description of the people and the external aspect of the country that he passed through in his two trips to Tipperah from Calcutta and back. He has a good deal to say about the customs of some of the people he becomes acquainted with. He makes a discovery of the debris of a Portuguese colony in Tipperah that has become debased in morality and sunk in superstition. Although there is not much in the book that is instructive to the serious student, the grace of diction and the ease of style carry the reader pleasantly through. It would be difficult to rescue such a subject as he has chosen from dullness without his extraordinary command of language. We cannot promise more than a brief span of life to the book. It will prove what is abundantly clear to the readers of the Reis and Rayyet that the author is an adept in English composition. He is a lover of nature and he paints scenes and situations with an artist's pencil.—The Hindu, November 7, 1887.

.....this interesting book. We are justified in so terming it, not on account of any romantic adventures that the author has to relate, nor of any very new discoveries in geography or natural history. There is something particular as regards ethnology; and a great deal of human nature in the book, shown to the reader with a simplicity and candour which bear testimony to its truth. Called from the busy haunts of men in the city to dwell for a time in Independent Tipperah as a judicious adviser to its Chief, Doctor Mookerjee relates his adventures during the several journeys to and fro in that capacity, without revealing the secrets of the State, like a good diplomatist. He has adhered strictly to the advice which he offers to his brethren of the Native Press, and has written what he saw and knows, without revealing all, considering what he might properly say and what withhold..... The above seems to be a curious passage to be found in a book of travels, and appears to have no connection with the subject. But it arises from a casual reference to a slaughter house, and a writer who "thundered weekly against the outrage of locating shambles in the immediate vicinity of a Hindoo temple"—where, in fact, no temple could be said to exist. Hence, the Doctor advises his fellow-scribes not to be Pharisees, righteous over-much, but to look and be sure of their facts. In the same spirit, he has written his book. He gives an account of his travels, which seem often to have been voyages, upon the wide-spreading rivers of Eastern Bengal which in the rains become almost inland seas. On these he philosophises on the nature of the country and the people, making careful observation of his facts; and though he sometimes fancies he knows better than his boatmen, and more than suspects that they are getting the better of him, he submits with a grace that would have done credit to Socrates, and accepts the apparently inevitable in the interests of peace. The Doctor is a close observer of nature, animate and inanimate, with an eye to the picturesque as well as to the sublime and beautiful. And although there is a vein of cynicism running through many of his observations, it is tempered by such evident good nature, that even a stranger would conceive him to be a laughter-loving rather than a stern philosopher. This is evident in his descriptions of his boatmen and others, while he denounces the lawlessness which has made the poor fishermen suspicious even of honest intentions, because they have so long been the helpless victims of marauders stronger than themselves. Their only defence is flight or deceit, and the latter is their justification as a mode of self protection. We are shown not only the weakness of the people, but the shortcomings of the administration that leave these things possible..... The author is impartial in his censures..... There is much in the book to which space forbids us to refer. That it is not a prosy one may be gathered from the fact that, for its 300 pages, there are nearly as many index references. Many of the subjects are necessarily but lightly treated, but all sensibly and fairly. And Dr. Mookerjee is such a master of the English language that in the whole book we have scarcely found a phrase that might not have been written by an Englishman "to the manor born." There is nothing in it at which any one could reasonably take offence; and there is much from which both Englishmen and natives may learn greatly-needed lessons.—The Indian Daily News, Nov. 22, 1887.

"TRAVELS IN BENGAL. Such is the title of a most interesting little work published a short time ago. Its author is Babu Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee, the well-known Editor of the Reis and Rayyet, the most original, cleverly-written and interesting journal in India. Babu Sambhu Chunder is one of the veteran Indian writers in English. He is the master of a most happy, racy pleasant style, which you can easily make out from amongst the writings of a hundred different men. In racy humorous writing Babu Sambhu Chunder has no rival among his Indian contemporaries. He won his first laurels, we believe, by his writings in his own periodical, the Mookerjee's Magazine, now long-defunct. In this magazine articles of great learning and excellence appeared, mostly from the pen of Babu Sambhu Chunder. He has written several other booklets. His Causes of the Mutiny; Mr. Wilson, Lord Canning and the Income Tax; the Career of an Indian Princess, Her Highness the late Scundra Begum of Bhopal; and the Prince in India and to India are publications which attracted considerable notice. His latest production "Travels in Bengal" is a work of great merit. It is at once a most faithful and interesting picture of natural scenery and life in Bengal, although Mr. Mookerjee does not profess to write a picture of Bengal life and uses his pencil in its portraiture only in passing. The dedication is characteristic. [Extract.]

The "Travels" are travels in East Bengal, travels and voyages between Calcutta and Independent Tipperah. We do not believe many people in this side of India know that there is such an independent State as Tipperah. But nevertheless such a state exists. We will give here a summary of its history in the words of Mr. Mookerjee.—He writes: [Extract.] Mr. Mookerjee was Dewan of Independent Tipperah for some five years in all between 1877 and 1881. The travels are an account of his voyages to and from Tipperah.

Those who have travelled in Bengal, particularly in its Eastern districts, which are the districts described in Mookerjee's book, will bear him out in his statement that Lower Bengal is not stale, flat and unprofitable, that, on the contrary, she is the beautifullest country in the world. She has no high mountains, but she has rivers apparently as vast as the sea, to make her scenery grand and majestic. She has a hundred rivers ever overflowing with water, thousands of transparent lakes, covered with the lily and a hundred beautiful water-flowers, thousands of seas of ever-waving paddy fields, thousands of clusters of bamboo and of great trees dressed in beautiful creepers adorning the river banks, to make her the loveliest country in the world. Even a Bengali needs to see and travel Bengal to adequately know her thousand witching charms. For a foreigner it is well nigh impossible to get even an approximate idea of what they are like from description, however true and faithful. Let us hear what our author has to say on the subject. We read:—[Extract.] A paddy sea is thus inimitably described:—[Extract.]

We will quote a passage of another character:—[Extract.]

We could cull many such gems. But space forbids it. We will, however, quote some passages of another kind. Our traveller, though old in years, is evidently young in heart, for no one in the romantic age of youth could be more appreciative of female charms than our traveller. In every other page you find our author describing in terms of enthusiasm some rural girl or woman of beauty. [Extract.] In the next page we find our traveller's attention [Extract.]

There is the description, physical and moral, of a Colonel, which we cannot resist the temptation of reproducing, although the article has already exceeded the usual length. [Extract.]

We have now given extracts enough to show that the little book of travels is most delightful reading. It contains graphic descriptions of natural scenery, faithful portraiture of men and manners, and happy, good humoured observations on them. There is not an ill-natured or unkind word in the whole book—it overflows in every page with the milk of human kindness. Every observation testifies to the author being a keen observer of men and things, as an example of which we can mention the instructive and interesting chapter on the Native Christians of Portuguese extraction in Tipperah. Again, although the book does not pretend to deal with life in Bengal, the glimpses of that life we find in it are very considerable and pleasant. We will now conclude by recommending the book to all who may wish to spend a few hours amidst happy thoughts and pleasant pictures.—

S. K. C.

—The Tribune, Nov. 26, 1887.

If we have not before noticed Mr. Sambhu C. Mookerjee's Travels in Bengal, which was published some months ago, it is not because the little book is either dull or pointless. It contains, on the contrary, much interesting matter, though some of the incidents are over-weighted with detail in what is facetiously called a "little booklet." The author's view as a rule is, by the way, facetious: he is given even to punning; but he is also sentimental in the highest degree—"a naked Whiteman" hurts his susceptibilities; a Hindu girl, bathing in the river, throws him into an ecstasy of delight: "she had such large languishing eyes!" But he is nothing if not philosophical, and his reflections on this or that social and political subject are not without their moral. Mr. Sambhu C. Mookerjee was formerly Minister to the "last of the Nawabs Nazim of Bengal, Behar and Orissa" and afterwards Minister of the Maharaja of Tipperah. He is a man, therefore, of experience, and when he speaks his brethren should listen to him... Travels in Bengal is a readable book, and it abounds in anecdotes which are often as instructive as amusing, and it is not spoiled by too many political allusions, though, of course, some few have crept in.—The Pioneer, Dec. 1887.

It may be well-known to all of our readers that Babu Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee the veteran editor of the Reis and Rayyet newspaper, has just published a book describing the four voyages that he made between Calcutta and Independent Tipperah when he had to go and to return from the latter place in the capacity of the minister to its prince. The literature yet produced in the English tongue by our own countrymen is very scanty and any sensible addition to it cannot well escape the attention of the public press. Much greater therefore should be the attention claimed on behalf of a book which comes from the pen of so well known a writer in the field of Indian journalism as Babu Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee. That gentleman's career as a writer fills nearly the last thirty years, and there has hardly been any subject of public importance during that long period which has not occupied his attention. Master of an inimitable racy style, with a vast store of classical allusions ever ready at the call, and possessing an infinite fund of humour, our author often enlivens every thing that he touches, and his peculiar strength lies in description. We therefore welcome the appearance of this book more especially as the subject is one which to make it interesting, requires a lively colouring and a rich, picturesque and imaginative description. There exist several books of travels written by eminent Englishmen, and every one of these differs perhaps, in their conception and plan of execution. Of these none was more widely read in the course of the last few years than Carlyle's reminiscences of an Irish Journey in 1849. That book is made up of extracts from diaries and the worst features of it are the bitter and caustic personal remarks interspersed throughout the book. However that may suit the polished and fashionable taste of England, in our country it would have been singularly out of place and we are glad that Babu Sambhu Chunder has confined himself to the description of those natural sceneries he passed through, and the means of travel in the distant and little-known regions of East Bengal. That the rivers of Bengal, with their circuitous and entangling courses do enshrine in them a deep spirit of poetry and are of sincere interest to the real man of imagination, is proved by the fact that Sir William Hunter, than whom a more accomplished man of letters never passed the best years of his life in Bengal, should have chosen the subject for his very interesting address at Oxford, the other day. The gentle waves, the gentler ripples, the grassy banks, the ever-entwining courses, the pleasant air, the sceneries on both sides make the rivers of Bengal a genuine thing of interest to those whose eyes are perpetually fed by the artificial gloss and dross of civilization and few could have set perhaps the loveliness of our rivers in better light than our accomplished author. His eloquent sentences, marching in regular order one after another, and embodying in their selves, every minute detail, that can lend to a scene its finest artistic effect, seem to place the reader in the very midst of sceneries described, and the man of leisure who would acquaint himself with the state of things in East Bengal, can hardly resort to a better book. The journeys which are described in this volume are certainly uneventful and though they correspond to facts as they furnish no interesting situation, no critical moments, to the seeker of intellectual excitement and this will no doubt constitute a serious objection to the book on the part of sensational seeking readers. None has however any thing to quarrel with the choice of a subject that any author may choose to write upon and none of the outside public can afford any explanation as to why the author should have preferred one subject to another. We think however there are one or two indications of bad taste. Still we welcome the appearance of this book and trust that it is but the first of a long series of works in writing which our author should spend the matured experience and the literary facility of a well-spent life.—Young Bengal, Feb. 2, 1888

INFALLIBLE SPECIFIC FOR LEUCORRHOEA.

A week's use of this medicine not only cures Leucorrhœa—the characteristic white, green and bloody discharge—but also removes the concomitant intense menstrual pains, and all the various complaints and symptoms incidental to menstrual difficulties and green sickness, and prepares the system for conception.

Price: for a week's consumption, Rs. 2, packing and postage 4 annas.

There are capital medicines besides—for piles, all the 20 kinds of flux—such as spermatorrhœa, diabetes, &c.—diarrhœa, rheumatism, puerperal complaints, cataract of the eye, macra, asthma, &c.

[Certificate.]

"I have known Babu Rajendra Nath Ghoshal 'kubiraj' for upwards of 15 years, and I can bear ample testimony to the wonderful efficacy of his medicine in the treatment of diseases of the womb. While Assistant Surgeon of Monghyr and subsequently, I have known him to cure the most obstinate cases of uterine Leucorrhœa and other uterine derangements, organic and functional. I can safely call his medicine the Specific for Leucorrhœa and painful menstruation. Ladies who have been subject to these diseases for years and were barren have been cured and borne children.

NEWS AND COMMENTS.

ENGLAND is still the great country for money, and monarchy is still cherished among the millions, and, above all, the Queen's popularity is beyond question. The women in especial are proud that their sex is on the throne. They are at any rate prepared to make sacrifices for their sentiment. In view of the Golden anniversary of her Reign, a movement was started for the "Women's Jubilee Offering." Above £80,000—over ten lacs of Rupees—was raised, though the offering was to be an equestrian statue of the late Prince Consort. Between the cost of this work of art and other expenses and extravagances, the Committee could scarcely require more than £10,000. The whole subscriptions being placed at Her Majesty's disposal, she has intimated her desire to devote the surplus of £70,000 to provide nurses for the sick poor, and she has asked the Duke of Westminster, Sir James Paget, and Sir Rutherford Alcock, to form themselves into a committee for advising Her Majesty on the best mode of realising her intention.

LORD LEVESON, the young hopeful of Lord Granville, has been the subject of much anxiety to friends. A healthy manly youth, not yet out of his teens though just out of Eton, with a grand reputation, he was, after the absurd restless way of many of his countrymen, playing with a small silver coin in his mouth, when it slipped down his throat and stuck in it. Medical aid was soon obtained but by that the coin had gone too far for return. Instead, it was forced down into the stomach. And there it remains. It gives no uneasiness, but it is an ugly intruder, and cannot be trusted to remain perfectly quiet. Sir Andrew Clarke—Sir Morell Mackenzie being not available we suppose—has been consulted, and has arranged with the local surgeon for an operation the moment Lord Leveson fevers or shows signs of constitutional derangement.

MR. MAGINS VOLK, of the Brighton Electric Railway, has devised an electric dog-cart for ordinary roads, the motive to be supplied by six accumulators which may be charged with power for a six hours' run. The speed is disappointing. On a soft macadamised road the drag will carry two persons, at the rate of four miles an hour. With all respect for Zeus and Indra and Benjamin Franklin, that is too slow a coach for this generation!

THE Queen's Bench Division has awarded £800 damages to Mrs. Mathias, wife of Major Mathias, of the Gordon Highlanders, against the London and South-Western Railway Company. When travelling from Clapham to Coombe Maldon, she stood up to take her ticket from the purse. The train jerked, and the carriage door not being properly fastened, it opened and she fell on the platform, sustaining injuries. The Indian Railways are more fortunate.

A CONSIDERABLE burglary has taken place in England. The house of Mr. Grenfell, late M. P. for Salisbury, was broken into and jewellery worth about £4,000 abstracted.

*JUST now there seems a flush of cash everywhere but in India. The speech from the throne opening the Prussian Diet, congratulates the country on the flourishing state of the finances beyond expectation.

COREA—a sort of Chinese Egypt—has at last been definitively granted by the Emperor independence. The Koreans have sent an embassy to Europe.

THE loyal offers of military assistance by the Native States, has attracted military inspection of their troops by the Supreme Government. Major H. Mellis, of the Bombay Corps, has been deputed for the purpose.

THE Mahratta is engaged in an elaborate review of the Financial Statement, in the course of which the native members of Council are justly taken to task for their incompetence in dealing with the subject and their neglect of the interests of the country at large.

THE Bombay Gazette too is distinguishing itself by its criticism of the financial policy and rebuking Mr. Steel as the representative of commerce and the independent European community for his courtly attitude.

THE Ducks are down on their representative in Council in special. The Bombay Gazette says it has received several letters complaining of the new native member. Perhaps it is yet too soon to judge Sir D. M. Petit, a man of venerable age, just called to a new and difficult sphere, in a distant land, and cut off from the counsel and help of friends.

ON the subject of the resignation of the Viceroy, the Mahratta speaks with commendable moderation and perfect candour. The writer is much of our mind.

THE Secretary of State, we are glad to learn, has agreed to the reduction of one of the best plums of extra-Indian patronage out of the revenues of India, by the abolition of the Director-in-Chief of the Indo-European Telegraph, and making over the duties of his office to the Director-General of the Telegraph in India. We suppose the suggestion emanated from the Finance Committee.

THE Resident in Kashmir telegraphs from Sialkot that the latest report received from Jummy on the 16th inst. gives four fresh attacks of Cholera and two deaths in the army and two cases in the city.

THE Home remittance from 1st April 1887 to 18th February 1888 amounted to £13,272,800 out of the total Budget estimated at £16,114,000 for the official year 1887-88.

THE son of Sir Savalay Ramasamy of Madras was recently attacked with small-pox. For safe and speedy recovery, and as a thanks-offering to the Almighty, the mother has offered to the local Municipality to build three Vaccine Depôts—one on the Monegar Choultry Road, one in Black town and one in Egmore.

THE Bellary District Registrar, Mr. L. Rama Rao, has been relieved of a watch and some wearing apparel by an interesting relative—for the nonce. Mr. Rama Rao was away from the station. In his absence, a stranger presented himself to the person in charge of the house, as the Registrar's brother-in-law. He was guilelessly accepted, and every due attention was shewn him. In the absence of the master, the brother-in-law had complete command, and he stayed in the house two days. On the third day he dressed himself in the apparel of the absent owner and left the house for a walk, leaving directions for lunch. The lunch was ready but the brother-in-law did not return to it, and is non est.

(We wonder who was our wife's-brother in the company of Sir Steuart Bayley, who, at the last exhibition of the Oriental Seminary, relieved us of our male jewellery of the same kind. He is a costly connection, but highly respectable withal. For, it was a brilliant gathering of which he was a unit, consisting of great Europeans and natives, headed by the Lieutenant-Governor and tailed by officers of the Police. The latter must know him, of course, for he is a greater connection of theirs. Such Chevaliers could scarcely be introduced into such places without the knowledge and kindness of the guardians of the public peace.)

THE Rev. Dorasawami Nather announces a simple cure for cholera. He speaks confidently of its efficacy after a pretty extensive trial, and Mr. Krishnama Chari, Government Pleader at Trichinopoly, writes to the Madras Mail in confirmation.

A SAD accident took place on the 31st January, at Delhi. There was a large gathering of relations and friends at the house in the Matra Nil of Manik Chand, a shawl merchant, on the death of his wife. As the corpse was taken outside to be conveyed in procession for disposal, many of the inmates and visitors, mostly women and children, hurried to the wooden balcony of an attached building overlooking the public lane. In the act of shouting what the Irish call the Ulaloo, down they came with the whole ricketty verandah, on the heads of the poor beggars stationed for a charitable distribution in the thoroughfare under the structure. Of the latter seven men were immediately killed, of the former six women and three children, while some thirty persons altogether were more or less injured, but none seriously.

MR. PRICHARD, the Commissioner in Sind, is shortly expected to be at Lahore, to arrange the preliminaries for the annexation of Sind to the Punjab, Dr. Pollen officiating in his place in Sind.

WE quote the following to be on the safe side :—

"An American paper gives a simple cure for snake bite. It consists of an immediate application of chloroform to the upper part of the tongue; this powerful anæsthetic, it is said, having the effect of at once counteracting the most poisonous bite."

THE American is beat in his own line by brother Sawney :—

"It is said that a lady, on whose face no spot or pimple was discernible, was lately photographed. On examining the proof the photographer was surprised to find the face was covered with black specks. A second photograph was taken with the same results. The following day the lady died of small pox. The superior sensitiveness of the plate revealed what was invisible to the naked eye."—Weekly Scotsman.

A VERNACULAR paper understands that our old friend Abdul Haq now Sir Dilek Jung of Hyderabad, is about to sue the Pioneer for defamation. He will claim three lacs of Rupees damages. Don't he wish he might get it? He is certainly worth that amount and a great deal more. But whether the court will hold his honour so high and precious is the question.

WE have received the following telegram from Cuttack :—

At an extraordinary meeting of Jalsa-i-Yaizi-am was held on the 19th evening, presided over by Babu Kalipada Banerjee, Zemindar and President, local bench. Much enthusiasm prevailed. A lecture founded on Mazzini's life was delivered. The lecturer exhorted the audience to ameliorate the low status of the Mahomedans. The President's fiery eloquence concluded with vehement invitation to all to join this meeting and afford much encouragement to the members.

THE following reads like a chapter from the Ramayana :—

"A circumstance probably without a parallel even in the history of the United States is just reported in advices received from Ashland, Wisconsin Territory—namely, the destruction of the Town of Wakefield by the fire through the mischievous act of a monkey. The animal was kept in the Vaudeville Theatre, and had the freedom of the place. During the evening of the 25th ultimo, the animal got to some kerosine, covering itself with the oil. It next set fire to itself with a lamp which was burning in the room, and then appeared at the window of the theatre, its antics whilst there amusing the people. Presently the building was in flames, and the monkey, running about in its frenzy, set fire to other places. The buildings were of wood, and the conflagration spread from place to place until the whole town was in ruins. Gangs of roughs during the progress of the fire looted the stores, and in most instances the flames had scarcely reached the places before the robbers commenced sacking the premises. The owners tried to protect their stores, and in the encounters many pistol-shots were exchanged. The owner of the theatre was a man named O'Brien, and between him and a storekeeper named Lewis, whose premises were destroyed, an altercation took place, Lewis blaming O'Brien for allowing the monkey to be in the theatre. O'Brien, becoming enraged, shot Lewis twice with a revolver, wounding him mortally. The damage to property is said to be about 75,000 dols, only about 2,000 dols of it being covered by insurance."

MUNICIPAL squabbles are developing into criminal prosecutions. A newly elected Commissioner of the Budyabaty municipality, Baboo Woomesh Chunder Gupta, laid a criminal information against the Chairman, Baboo Chunder Nath Mookerjee, for defamation, under Section 500 of the Indian Penal Code. The Deputy Magistrate of Serampore, Baboo Kedarnath Dutt, threw out the complaint, the sanction of Government to prosecute being wanting. There was then a motion before the District Judge of Hooghly, who has overruled the Deputy and ordered the restitution of the case. Baboo Woomesh Chunder complains that when before the election he submitted an application on sanitary matters to the municipality, the Chairman recorded a resolution on it with remarks which amount to defamation. The case is being heard by Baboo Radha Madhub Bose, and is hotly contested.

THE Mchter case has ended in a fiat—in the acquittal of the sweeper Kurrup. All the same it revives the question of the sanitation of the sewers and of houses connected. The Health Officer, Dr. William J. Simpson thus gave his opinion in the case :—

"I am the Health Officer of the Municipality. I have visited the premises No. 6, Government Place, North, four times within the last fortnight. My visits were in connection with the death of Mr. D. Mackinnon, alleged to have died of typhoid fever. At each visit I went upon the roof, I saw nothing on the roof to attract attention during the visits. I think it extremely improbable that any foul gases could have gone down the pipe into the deceased's room. The pipe is entirely outside the house, it is open on the roof and leads to a surface drain. Any foul matter that might be on the roof would be exposed to the sun and air. If by any possibility any gas was drawn down the pipe and into the bath-room on the north side of the house it would be so extremely diluted in its passage through the bath-room and bed-room on the north side of the house as to be innocuous before it reached Mr. Mackinnon's bed-room which was on the south side of the house and completely shut off. Matter of that sort in such small quantity and which has been exposed to the sun, would do no harm. It would be very different had it been shut up in some dark place and allowed to ferment. I searched for the cause of this particular disease. I examined the other pipes in the house. There was one passing from Mr. Mackinnon's bath-room, down the east side of the house, to the latrine on the ground floor. This pipe was separated from the latrine by about two feet of surface drain. But this latrine was in such a position that any gases escaping from it could easily pass up the pipe, into the bath-room belonging to the late Mr. Mackinnon. The pipe would act as a sort of chimney. The latrine when I saw it for the first time was in a foul condition, capable of generating foul gases. Being connected with a large cess-pit, indirectly connected with the sewer underneath the pavement in the front of the house, there was plenty of room for foul gases to generate. When the pit was opened a very offensive smell emanated from it. Directly joining the latrine, there was a cow shed, the drainage of which was in a bad state and from which sewer gas emanated. On the south side of the house, there were four rain water pipes directly connected with the latrine cess-pit. On the west side of the house, there is on the same floor as Mr. Mackinnon's bed-room a sort of green house with a pipe, leading to a pipe of the bath-room of No. 5, Government Place. It descends to the ground, and is indirectly connected with the sewer. When this pipe and its indirect connections with the sewer were opened, it was found to be choked up, generating most offensive gases. The sewer in front of the house, has its summit quite close to the late Mr. Mackinnon's house, and if there were any pressure of gases in the sewer they would rise to the highest point. From enquiries made, as to the sanitary condition of the offices of Mr. Mackinnon and Mr. Graham, I found that there was nothing wrong there. Within the last year there have come to my knowledge a number of buildings on the Strand Road, and Old Court House Street. There were cases of typhoid fever in the Telegraph Office, also in the premises of the Medical Stores, in Hare Street, and in Hastings Street. All these I investigated, and I was satisfied that the fever was in each case due to faulty drainage. Several other cases have come to my knowledge, but I have no personal knowledge of them. The sewers that were opened in this part of the town were offensive. This was mainly due to there having no flushing arrangements. I think the Municipality should keep a larger number of competent house drainage inspectors, whose duty it would be to keep a strict supervision over contractors' work and also to make a systematic house to house inspection. The latrine at No. 6, Government Place, I think, should not have been erected on its present site. The pipe leading up to Mr. Mackinnon's bath-room should have been so constructed that no gases, drawn up through it could enter the bath-room. The insertion of an S shaped trap in the bath-room, and the prolongation of the pipe up to the roof, would have remedied the defect. In the latrine itself there should have been an ordinary trap, but I would not have sanctioned a latrine there. Traps on the top and below should have been insisted upon. Precautions should have been taken as regards the rain water pipes, which would aid in diffusing poisonous gas in the house, had they defective joints. A better arrangement could have been for them to have discharged themselves at the corner of the pavement; they should not have been connected with the sewer at all. The same remarks would apply to the pipe on the west side. It should have had a trap, at the level of the green house, and should have discharged into an ordinary modern trap and have been disconnected from the sewer. These are precautions which a competent sanitary inspector in the Municipality would have insisted upon. Such remedies for the defects I have pointed out would have, as a matter of course, been insisted upon in England. The reason for them not being insisted upon here is owing to the paucity of inspectors. I recommended in the beginning of the year that a larger staff of sanitary inspectors should be appointed, but my recommendation was looked upon as outside the province of the Health Officer, and so was not adopted."

The Chief Magistrate, Mr. Reily, has accordingly recorded the following conclusions:—

"The conclusions which, in my opinion, follow upon a consideration of the facts elicited in this case, are two-fold. It is, in the first place, made apparent that sewer gas in abundant quantity impregnated the air daily breathed by the late Mr. Mackinnon in the house, No. 6, Government Place, North, which he occupied, and that the danger, and, in all probability, the fatal result attributable to the presence of such gas in the atmosphere might have been averted by the vigilance of a staff of competent officers working under a system of proper sanitary inspection; and, secondly, that the act of the accused contributed in no appreciable extent to the causes which endangered life in that house. The accused is discharged."

The guilt of the death is thus diverted to the head of the Corporation for the Town of Calcutta. The principal offender is the sewer, and so long as the underground drainage is maintained in whatever state of flushing, houses should not be directly connected.

THE ever-agitating Dacca has for the moment been cast into shade by Lahore. The latter capital engages the public attention by the protracted Larpent Enquiry which drags its slow length along. The Pleader Mr. Browne pursues his wrath against the Sialkot Divisional Judge Mr. Macauliffe. Mr. Browne's suit for defamation against the Judge was to have been heard this week. Mr. Browne has for one of his clients also sued Mr. Macauliffe for increased maintenance to illegitimate children. A Lahore telegram of the 18th says:—

"Complaint was lodged yesterday in the District Judge's Court here by one Mussanmat Rahiman, daughter of a former bearer in the employ of Mr. M. Macauliffe, Divisional Judge of Sialkote, for the maintenance by that officer of three illegitimate children. The complainant says that about twelve years ago Mr. Macauliffe obtained possession of her from her father, and since then she has lived as his mistress in nine different districts of the Punjab and has had issue by him of two boys and a girl. Mr. Macauliffe brought them to Lahore in May 1884. The complainant says that she finds it difficult to keep, clothe, and educate the children, on the allowance of thirty rupees monthly now made to her. She complained to the Government, which referred her to the Court, and she now asked for fifty rupees per month for each child, Mr. Macauliffe's pay being Rs. 2,700 monthly. The complainant is represented by Mr. Browne, pleader, whose own suit against Mr. Macauliffe, for defamation comes off on the 22nd."

MIRZA SURAYAR JAH BAHADOOR, a Delhi Prince of the House of Timour, who has for several years been a sort of Wandering Jew, "prospecting" throughout the Empire, is at length likely to become somewhat of a fixture in the Far South. It was a lucky star that led him to the Mogul Satrapy of the Deccan. At first he seemed to have met with disappointment. The men in power were too engrossed in the pleasant occupation of sharing between themselves and their own the harvest of padodas, to attend to the wants and wishes of even a princely stranger. But the prince persisted, clung to the place and after two years succeeded at last in getting a mansab of Rs. 400 a year. Herein no doubt history repeats itself. But what a change in Indian history does the incident proclaim! The descendant of Timour submits to be a petty Omrah of the Court of the descendant of Asof Jah, himself but a grandee of the Mogul Empire though Khedive of Hyderabad. We are glad the rolling stone has gathered enough moss and found a tolerable resting place.

BABOO HARIHAR MOOKERJEE of Uttarpara, Bengal, is not alone in his glory of antipaternal litigation. A rival, in the other gender, has appeared in Old England. Miss Laura Stokes has obtained from a sympathetic jury a verdict against her father for £250 for libel and slander. She had claimed the modest sum of £5,000. The Defendant is a very wealthy man, but unfortunate in his domestic relations. He has apparently spoiled his family and drawn them into revolt by his parsimony. And now they are in league to help one another in forking what money they can out of the old "screw." First the wife separated herself from the husband. He had to settle on her an allowance of 6*l.* per week and 500*l.* down. He was next molested by his son whom he appeased with 125*l.* And now appears against him in court the daughter, supported by the evidence of her mother. The gravamen of his offence was complaining of being robbed by his children. He had apologised for this in a letter which was read in Court, yet the Jury found a verdict for the daughter. But the Judge has refused costs and allowed 14 days for a new trial. The poor plutocrat must, as he left court, have hummed Lord Ullin's exclamation, though in a different sense—

"My daughter! Oh my daughter!"

HERE is an Americanish paragraph from the English press:—

"A most extraordinary case has just been investigated by the East London Coroner. It seems that a commercial traveller, named Moses Raphael, was taken ill, and on 2nd January was removed to the London Hospital. His death took place on 2nd January and at the inquest Dr. Doyle, who had had the man under his care, said that on opening the head he found a penholder and nib, about three inches long, attached to the right orbital plate. It must have been there for a considerable time, as the bone had partially grown over it. The only way that it was possible for the pen and holder to get to the brain was by passing through the eye or up the nostrils. Deceased's widow stated that her husband had never complained of any accident, but that lately he had suffered from pains in his head. Dr. Doyle said it was a mystery how a pen and holder of such size could get into the brain without the man's knowledge."

That is staggering to be sure, but ought not to be rejected on that ground. The people of the West have extraordinary receptive capacity. Pins by the gross have been found in the stomach and in the mouth of girls.

THE Emerald Theatre is continuing its revival of the older plays of established repute. This evening the public will be treated to "Mrinalini" and to-morrow comes off "Megnad Badh." The cast, as announced in another column, is both powerful and attractive. It must be still fresh in the public mind, how, about a dozen years back, Baboo Ghose, in the several characters of Pasupati, Megnad and Rama, won the highest laurels of the profession on the Bengali stage. The revival of the pieces after such a length of time, with Grish Chunder and other veteran actors, must draw crowded houses.

NOTES AND LEADERETTES.

It was officially stated when the resignation of Lord Dufferin was announced, that Lord Landsdowne, Governor-General of Canada, who is to succeed, will come in December. It was since understood that he might arrive in November. The change in administration may take place sooner than either expected or desired. On Sunday, Reuter telegraphed fixing August as the time when the next man will be here to claim his office. It is now understood that Lord Landsdowne returns to England in October and reaches India early in November, Lord Dufferin probably meeting him at Bombay en route to Europe.

LORD DUFFERIN reverts to the diplomatic service. There is some difficulty in finding a suitable place for him in that line. He has been at many courts—Lisbon, St. Petersburg, Stamboul, &c.—and there is an inconvenient and truly British etiquette against the same man holding the same embassy or legation more than once. A Tory Viceroy has just been sent to dissipate and moon after piquant belles at the French capital. Sir Edward Malet, the favorite of Bismarck, can not be removed from Berlin. Besides, in the present condition of Irish property, Lord Dufferin is scarcely in a mood to take up expensive Embassies. A vacancy may be found for our Viceroy in Italy, however. That can be only a temporary provision, so long as the present party is in power. As soon as there is a change, there is a chance of his Lordship's being taken in in the ministry. His being Secretary of State for India, is only a question of health.

THE next man for Canada is a Stanley—the Lord of Preston, though we wish it might be of Alderley. He is a brother of the Earl of Derby, but, unlike him, a staunch Conservative. He is better known as Colonel (Sir Frederick) Stanley, Secretary for War from 1878 to 1880 and Secretary for the Colonies in Lord Salisbury's first Cabinet. On the formation of the present ministry he accepted the Board of Trade, with a seat in the Cabinet. On the same occasion, by way of further compensation for his reduced official importance, he was created a peer.

THE state of the Crown Prince of Germany causes anxiety. His throat has been operated upon, and the reports of his health are not cheering. The aged Emperor is extremely anxious to see his son at San Remo, but the doctors are opposed to the long journey. Long, that is, for the compressed Continent. In our Colossus of an Empire of vast distances, a journey of 24 or 30 hours is a joke.

THE Times has celebrated, with becoming pomp, its centenary. Lord Salisbury, himself a gentleman of the press, is about to crown the event and the services to the country by three generations of the proprietary, by conferring a peerage on the present Mr. Walter, the principal owner. He is rich and deserving, and has often been marked for the honor. How, indeed, has he been so long left in the cold, is a marvel! The puzzle is solved by the London Correspondent of the Manchester Guardian :—

"No one could fairly question the motives with which such an honour would be offered or the propriety of such a proposal on the part of Lord Salisbury. For more than five-and-twenty years this peerage has been talked of, owing to Mr. Walter's personal position as a country gentleman and a politician. It is a very open secret that Mr. Walter would long since have received the offer of a peerage, to which his position renders him more entitled than the average of those who have in that period passed to the House of Lords, were it not for the fear on the part of Prime Ministers of seeming to desire to obtain or to reward influence in connection with the Times."

Such is the humiliating confession! Such is the suspicion under which the press labors in England!

THE Lahore Tribune reproduces, with presumable approval, our rapid history of the origin of the Larpent Inquiry going on at that capital, and remarks :—

"We think we should correct a mistake in the above account of the Bribery case. Our article of the 30th March last, which led in the end to the appointment of the Arts and Law Examination Committees, was published just two days before Sir Charles Aitchison's departure from the Province. The Committees were appointed during the rule of our present Lieutenant-Governor Mr. J. B. Lyall, who has already won the love and affection of the Punjab by the readiness and pleasure with which he has ever since he assumed its reins of government listened to the representations of the people. Had it not been for His Honor's sincere anxiety to do justice this Bribery case would most probably have been hushed up."

That is paying a poor compliment to the most popular and liberal Governor of the Panjab. But our contemporary is, we believe, far from intending to convey an invidious distinction.

We are too jealous of our credit for accuracy to bear contradiction from even our kind brother in a matter within his own jurisdiction, nay, personal observation. At any rate, we submit only to the coercion of facts. There is no pressure of the kind here. We still believe the facts to be in our favour. It is amusing to see the ultimate human cause of the Investigation himself confusing the chronology of its genesis. The University Committee was independent of the direct initiative of the Local Government. If it was the result of such indirect initiative, it was, we presume, due to the influence of the late Lieutenant-Governor. If we owed the University Committee to the new Lieutenant-Governor, surely that body and the University would have gone through the business in a straightforward valiant fashion. If they had been able to muster up the courage of their convictions, the scandal would have been manfully disposed of long since and all this ado have been saved. That it was not so, was due to the retirement of Sir Charles Aitchison. At one time, indeed, it was feared that the matter would be hushed up and the delinquent white-washed. The Punjab is indebted to our contemporary for preventing that double scandal. We honor Mr. Lyall for not listening to evil counsels, but the services of the journalist who, under temptations and difficulties, keeps public men and private citizens to their respective duties, should not be forgotten.

THE Indian Daily News quotes the following passage from the yet unpublished Resolution of the Bengal Government on the Sir John Lawrence enquiry,

"The Lieutenant-Governor is unable to accept Mr. Bushby's explanation as in any way satisfactory, and he regrets that the Port Commissioners should consider it sufficient to draw his attention to the terms of the agreement. Apart altogether from those terms, and from the conditions laid down by the Board of Trade for the acceptance of Indian certificates, Mr. Bushby should have recognised the impropriety of his engaging in any way in the preparation of an equipment, of the sufficiency of which he was afterwards, on behalf of the Government and the public, to judge. As, however, Bushby had the authority of the Vice-Chairman to do the work, the Lieutenant-Governor considers that the case will be sufficiently met by directing that he should be severely censured and required to refund at once, through the Port Commissioners, the honorarium he has received. He should be warned that any future transgression of his agreement in this respect will result in his power of survey being withdrawn. The Lieutenant-Governor considers that, on his return from leave, Mr. Duff-Bruce should be called upon by the Port Commissioners to submit an explanation of his action. Mr. Duff-Bruce, as a servant of Government, must be well aware that no public servant is entitled to receive any emolument, direct or indirect, for any public service rendered by him, beyond the salary attached to his appointment. Mr. Bushby pleads that when he received the sanction of the Vice-Chairman, it naturally followed that he expected some fee or gratuity for the work. Such a plea is opposed to the regulations of the public service; and Mr. Duff-Bruce must explain how far it had his countenance when he gave the permission, which the Port Commissioners have ascertained that he did give."

and is of opinion that the refund of Rs. 1,000 should not go to Messrs. Macneill & Co., but to some charity. Could the Government appropriate the sum even for a benevolent purpose? Certainly, the agents might be advised to devote the refund to the purpose indicated, and Messrs. Mackneill may not be disposed to receive back the money having paid it away for a purpose. The order for severe censure, we take it, is a call upon Mr. Bushby to resign. But he evidences no disposition of the kind, and, like another engineer of another Corporation, sticks to his place for its Rupees, after its dignity has been lost.

THE Corporation which Mr. Robert Turnbull has faithfully to the best of his abilities served for over a generation, has been liberal to him beyond precedent in the matter of his pension. But having swallowed the camel, the good Corporators stuck at the gnat. They grudged not the cash to him, but they did not care to preserve his likeness on canvas. This compliment was left for the public. Accordingly, the friends of the retiring Secretary of the Calcutta Corporation met in the rooms of the British Indian Association and have Resolved upon a portrait to be hung in the Town Hall. The Memorial Committee is remarkable for its long array of names, and the success of the movement is assured. The gentlemen on it may themselves find, by a few Rupees each, the wherewithal for the portrait voted.

AN international question has been quietly solved in India. In execution of a decree of the Hooghly court, the judgment debtor was arrested in Chandernagore. The arresting peons were assaulted and afterwards handed over to the French Police. It was contended that the men exceeded their jurisdiction and executed their commission on French soil without the knowledge of the French authorities. The matter being reported to the Judge of Hooghly, he communicated with the Bengal Government, suggesting a Commission appointed by both Governments to enquire in which territory the arrest was really made. The Lieutenant-Governor, while agreeing with the Judge, sent up the case for higher orders, empowering the Judge in the meantime to apply to the French Governor for release of the peons on bail. The French Government set the men free, and agreed to the "Boundary Commission." The Commission, consisting of two, one representative from each Government, met with in closed doors and unanimously decided that the arrest was outside French Chandernagore. The French Government subsequently formally absolved the arresting agency of any blame. The judgment debtor and eight others are now being tried in the Hooghly Magistracy for resisting public officers in the execution of their duty. The Judge having referred the case to the Magistrate under a repealed section of the Penal Code, Mr. Palit, on behalf of one of the defendants, argued there was no case. The section quoted by the Judge being no law, that is, no longer of any legal force, he claimed acquittal for his client. The Magistrate adroitly employed against the 'cute barrister-at-law his own weapon, replying that if there was no case, he had no power to make the order applied for. The case has been adjourned to next March for fresh reference from the Judge under unrepealed law.

VERILY, it is the day of the publican and sinners. The Shao has triumphed at last. By a disgraceful Concordat the Faculty of Law have elected him the new Tagore Law professor, and they have—so far as lies with them—guaranteed the next year's man. The legal Dons could not have perpetrated a worse job in office or made a more discreditable use of their functions. We refer, of course, to the intriguers. They started or submitted to an unhallowed compact. And instead of exercising their pure unfettered judgment, in selecting the right man for the right place, without fear or favor, or selfish regard, direct or indirect, they succumbed to the weakness of recommending an "inglorious" though obliging under-limb of the law. There were two other candidates, a barrister-at-law and a learned senior pleader of the local High Court.

The Pleader having in a fair field the better chance, the supporters of the Barrister agreed to the unholy offer of returning him the next year, and recommending the every body's devil of the Pleader bar this time. They all thus voted for the popular imp, singing virtually, The Devil take the hindmost, O!—worth, namely. We hope the Senate will prevent the scandal, and disallow the nomination.

THE Extra Assistant Commissioner and First Grade Munsif of Jorehaut, in Assam, Baboo Kanti Chunder Mookerjee, has won an unenviable distinction as the hero of a nasty affair of love in friendship's guise. Baboo Kanti Chunder is a liberal man, and out of the abundance of heart, he had accommodated a friend in difficulties, one Kherod Prosad Banerjee. He had provided for him, his wife, and child a home and the other necessaries. Kherod was too grateful not to acknowledge his obligations to, and confide in, his friend. Kherod was in search of employment and often consulted his friend who was all willing to assist him with advice as he was assisting more substantially with his purse. Kherod had therefore no cause to complain, and when he had to go to some distance, he could not think of a better friend than the Extra Assistant Commissioner, a friend in need indeed, for the charge and protection of his wife and child. Baboo Kanti eagerly accepted the charge, for which he was on the look out, as the event proved. Now that the wife was alone, the Baboo waxed attentive—to fondness. He wanted to see her, to personally enquire of her wants, and, if possible, console her in her loneliness. He opened the preparatory correspondence. The good wife was equal to the trial. She beguiled him by answering his letters, but would not consent to his visits. Nevertheless, he persisted in his efforts to make her personal acquaintance and, in excess of anxiety for her, actually trespassed into her bed-room and making offers of love demanded reciprocation. She was not to be moved, and, while acknowledging obligations to the Baboo for relieving difficulties, rejected his overtures. On the return of the husband, all these passages at love were made known to him. Kherod, in grateful remembrance of assistance received, was unwilling to take the law into his own hands, or otherwise expose his dubious friend, and intimated to Kanti his willingness to accept an apology in satisfaction of the wrong done and attempted. The judicial officer, wise by half, would not commit himself either in writing or by word of mouth. There was no alternative, and criminal complaints were filed. The Assistant Commissioner of Jorehat, Mr. Meljita found his Extra-Assistant guilty of extraordinary conduct, and fined him Rs. 500 for house-trespass. There was of course an appeal, and the Sessions Judge was of the same opinion with the Assistant Commissioner. The High Court (Messrs. Justices Wilson and O'Kinealy) have also just confirmed the order of the two lower Courts. Mr. Kilby, on behalf of Government, pressed the Hon'ble Judges for enhancement of sentence, but their Lordships thought there were not sufficient grounds.

THE whole public service must blush to read the proceedings of the Tangail Case. That limb of the Police Ram Kumar Chackerbutty is a typical member of a deservedly unpopular profession, but the sub-inspector is respectability itself before the precious Deputy Baboo Soshi Sekhur Dutt. This man's conduct ought to place him beyond the pale of decent society. It is not wrong-doing that we reprobate. We are all sinners, more or less, and ought to have some compunction for human weakness. And no doubt there are greater criminals. But such an unblushing sneak of an offender is rarely, we hope, to be found in the pay of a civilised Government. He is condemned out of his own mouth. His continual prevarication and taking shelter under the protecting clauses of the Evidence Act, reminded us of the Italian Majoosi. He was clearly unworthy of the courtesy of a chair in the witness-box which, at the instance of the prosecuting counsel, was allowed him. We are surprised at the tenderness shown him by Mr. Ghose and the Judge Mr. Pratt, after his conduct under cross-examination. It is for the Government to consider whether such a man can be retained in the public service.

All honor to the Lady of Santosh, for her zeal and sacrifice in exposing such a brace of birds of a feather like the Sub-inspector and the Deputy. She has done good to her country and deserved well of a liberal and righteous Government.

NATIVE PRINCES IN ENGLAND.

BARODA AND KUCH BEHAR.

THE Gaekwar of Baroda made a kind of triumphal entry into his capital after the conquest in England of the star that now adorns his breast. The young Mahratta ruler is a strong man, else the dazzling prize might overpower the senses all round. The trip to England acts upon our people much as the Grand Tour used to do upon the youth of the wealthy British. The majority are unable to stand it.

Kuch Behar's Fabian policy has, we are glad, been crowned with success. We knew it was coming. When the Jubilee honors list appeared, the absence of the Maharaja's name was remarked. We thought at the time that His Highness stuck for something high. So, while others were decorated, he, already an Honorary Major, seemed glad to be enrolled, with the sporting minister of Jodhpur, an Honorary Aid-de-camp to His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales. The Maharani came in for her share in the distribution, but the compliment to the wife accentuated the neglect of the husband. The thing was miserably managed. The India office ought to have known how such a distinction must shock the entire East, but the India office in these matters means Mr. Fitzgerald, we believe, and that officer has shown singular want of sympathy and of tact. To honor the wife at the expense of the husband, is specially monstrous to Hindu ideas. Whoever might be responsible, the Court was committed to a blunder of the same kind and magnitude as that of the Bengal Government when, about a dozen years ago, they sent the Maharanee Surnomoyee a present of gold bracelets and an embroidered robe in the shape of a Benares saree. The Lady of Cossimbazar resented it as an affront, but, of course, it was only a mistake of ignorance, and when the matter was explained to her, she contented herself with declining the equivocal honor.

In the present case, too, the title stood a good chance of refusal. A Brahma lady, bred up from birth at the very centre of a new sect hostile to the popular faith and traditions, and carried far away beyond the sea to the heart of Christendom, was not likely to retain all her wits about her. In her normal state, a genuine Hindu woman would regard with deep repugnance any proposition to give her a public compliment from which her husband was excluded.

Her Highness having received her compliment, was glad to retrace her steps and be back home from a voyage reluctantly undertaken. His Highness remained. He has won by the delay. As the Arab proverb hath it, the lame mule at last catches the hare. We are truly glad that the Maharaja has at length got his due in the shape of a title, having been created a G. C. S. I. His Highness could scarcely return with complaisancy with less. It has been an anxious if silent trial. The game was scarcely worth the candle. The intrinsic value of these distinctions is small. Even in Vanity Fair, Indian decorations have, by glut in the market, been brought to the pass of the Rupee. They are obviously not necessary for the dignity of princes like Kuch Behar, and now they are more of a drag on their self-respect. Still, with his surroundings and specially his situation for the moment, His Highness could scarcely feel comfortable without his bauble. Though the cost of the thing—we refer to the waste of mind and soul and body, the waste of nationality and of the opportunities for a useful career, all far more serious than the financial drain of a fashionable English career for an Indian Prince—is out of all proportion to the worth of the thing, the expenditure having been incurred, the whistle could not well be dispensed with. We hope to see the Maharaja return a wiser man.

THE CALCUTTA MUNICIPALITY BILL IN THE BENGAL COUNCIL.

THE Calcutta and Suburban Municipalities Bill is about to pass substantially in the form recommended by the Select Committee. There has been a good deal of debate; several amendments have been proposed and earnestly pressed; Baboo Kalinath Mitter has brought the whole store of his experience of municipal affairs to bear on the discussion, but all to no purpose. The official and European majority has seldom overborne all opposition from the native members with such uniform success as on the present occasion. Most of the important points in the Bill have been disposed of, the question of amalgamation with the Suburbs, or rather of the new boundaries, being, by mutual arrangement, deferred till the last. That on this question the native minority will have any better success, can hardly be expected from the proportion of forces of the two sides.

Infructuous as the debate is, it is not without interest, as affording the public an exposition of official views on the questions involved in the scheme of local self-government. As this is a subject in which the keenest interest is felt at this time by the country at large, we may as well record the more important parts of the debate for the information of our readers.

Sir Henry Harrison has indeed introduced some provisions into the Bill with the express object of curtailing the elective franchise. He is by no means slow to acknowledge the good which the elective constitution of the Calcutta Municipality has been the means of effecting in the administration of the city. But, then, sweet words butter no parsnips. In opposing the Hon'ble Baboo Kali Nath Mitter's amendment for reducing the proportion of Government nomination from one-third to one-fourth, the member in charge of the Bill bore eloquent witness to the benefits of the elective system:—

"In the first place, by the elective system we have attracted to the Corporation a number of Commissioners who have taken the greatest possible interest in the work—Commissioners who have been most assiduous in their attendance at meetings, who have looked into matters with care and scrutiny such as is hardly found in any other department. They have set their face resolutely against all extravagance, they having thrown the light of discussion on every detail. In fact, it has led to the administration of the municipality being carried on much more in the light of day than it would have been as far as other members are concerned. On questions of contracts and expenditure in detail, they have paid an attention to the work which was hardly paid before. In the next place, the system has had the advantage of bringing in a number of men who owe their position entirely to something outside Government, not to nomination. They feel that they depend for their position on those who have returned them, and who naturally look to them to represent their views and therefore they bring with them the light of real public opinion of a certain class—a comparatively small class in numbers, but a very influential class indeed, and it has been a great advantage that we should have the opinion of a class of this kind pressed upon us, so that we know what they want, and what they object to. Thirdly, we have persons who represent local areas. This has led to many good results. Previously the Town was looked upon very much as a whole, and the wants of the Town as a whole were considered. Now the desire for large improvements has decreased, and the Commissioners are more interested in local wants. This has to some extent worked well, and the large increase in the value of property is in no small degree due to the way in which local improvements have been attended to. Fourthly, the elective system has been successful in this, that people know that they have a Commissioner who represents them, and when they have a complaint, if it is not immediately attended to by the Executive, they appeal to get the assistance of their Commissioner. This has some beneficial results; it causes some degree of self-reliance in the people when they know that they have some one to whom they can go if they do not get immediate redress. The last and most important result is this. The elected Commissioners, who had taken so much interest in the affairs of the Municipality, have themselves improved much by experience in the work. I have seen very great improvement in the tone and method and manner of doing work by the Commissioners who have become familiarised with their labors. In this review I think I have given a very fair account of the work of the elective Commissioners, but after all is not the role which I have described the role of opposition? We all know that administrative affairs suffer if there is no effective check; and whether we look at the official world as it exists in India, or at the Government as it is in England, worked by party, it is a well-recognised fact that, if there is no adequate check, there is danger either of the work going on too fast, or there is danger of its not being as economical as it might be. The role which the elective Commissioners for the native wards have at once assumed is precisely that of checking, watching and controlling in every way, in seeing either that no expenditure is incurred without sufficient reason, or that projects of improvement are not undertaken which cannot be fully justified. They have in fact been the brake-power in the municipal train. But a train cannot progress by brake-power alone, nor can a city thrive by opposition alone. It is also necessary that you should have motive power, and that is precisely the one point in which the Corporation has been deficient."

This deficiency of motive power Sir Henry proposes to remove by some of the provisions he has newly incorporated in the Bill. He is totally opposed to the reduction in the proportion of nominated Commissioners, and views with approval the higher proportion of the nominated Commissioners which prevails in Bombay. In the Bombay Corporation, there are now 72 Commissioners, of whom only half are elected, 16 nominated by the Government directly and 20 by constituencies which, with the exception of the Chamber of Commerce, are under the control of the Government. We can imagine Sir Henry Harrison sighing audibly as he went on speculating that "probably in Calcutta also, had we 12 years ago provided a little more slowly, we should have made more decided and continuous progress, and parties would have been better balanced. But it is a very different thing when you have tabula rasa, and when you have a foundation already laid."

This observation called forth a retort from Mr. Macaulay, who was more pronounced in his testimony as to the success of the elective system. "I cannot agree with my hon. friend, Sir Henry Harrison, in thinking that, if we were beginning to legislate for an elective system, we might take the hon. Mr. Irving's proposal for electing only one-half. I think that, looking to the experience we have had of the working of the system as a whole, we should be fully justified, were we in the position of our predecessors, the legislators of 1876, in taking the proportion of two-thirds elected by the rate payers..... The elective system has brought forward men like my friend the Hon. Babu Kali Nath Mitter, men of ability and business habits, who have done excellent service to the community, and I think that all friends of self-government must rejoice that these men owe their positions, not to the voice of nomination, but to the suffrages of their fellow-citizens."

Baboo Kalinath Mitter's amendment for extending the proportion of elected Commissioners to three-fourths, was of course lost, although it is something that the Hon. Mr. Reynolds and the Advocate-General voted for it.

We congratulate the Hon. Moulvie Abdul Jubber on the excellent speech in which he opposed the proposal for restricting the power of nomination by Government, by making over a portion of it to be exercised by the Chamber of Commerce, the Trades Association, and the Port Trust. That it will injuriously affect the representation of the Mahomedan interest, was established beyond dispute, and the invidiousness of making a distinction between some voluntary Associations and others, was pointed out. On this latter point, Dr. Gooroodas Banerjee spoke with great force and weight. It is significant that the arguments adduced against the proposed system of special constituencies, induced the author of the Bill to vote with the opposition. The amendment was nevertheless lost by a majority of 8 against 5, the latter being formed of all the native members and Sir Henry Harrison.

The discussion on this point afforded Sir Stuart Bayley an opportunity of expressing his views on the subject of nomination. The Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal said:—

"My own position in reference to the point under discussion is one almost of indifference. I feel very much. I feel very much as Sir Richard Temple said when the question was originally before him—the question whether one-third or one-fourth of the Commissioners should be nominated—that he really cared neither one way nor the other and was quite willing to leave it to the Council to decide. The only purpose to which nomination could be properly put, was to redress any thing like a monopoly of representation. For that purpose I held it to be a very valuable power in the hands of the Government.....the tendency will probably be for the majority of the elected Municipal Commissioners to become more and more the representatives of a single class. By 'class' I do not mean either Hindu, Mahomedan, or European, but people of one way of thinking, and of one set of habits, and it is in that point that the danger of a tyranny of the majority is always more likely to lie."

The same official and European majority to which reference has already been made, carried the day in regard to the chief innovation in the Bill, viz., the proposal of giving plural votes to the wealthier rate-payers.

A REVIVAL IN SANSKRIT PHILOSOPHY.

HAVING only last week bewailed the comparative barrenness of our vernacular literature, in original works of learning or of the higher imagination, it affords us great pleasure to make some exception in favour of the ancient classical language of the land. Two works in Sanskrit have appeared within the last few months which may well redeem the literary character of many years. Both works in Philosophy, both of very considerable merit, and both by Brahman scholars of the old school—Pandits of our indigenous Sanskrit Colleges—they together predicate a movement in the national mind—a Renaissance. It shows that sons of Bengal—the home of Hindu dialectics—are once more fired by learned ambition.

The two works we speak of are a Bhashya commentary on the Vaisheshik School of Philosophy by Mahamahopadhyaya Chandra Kanta Tarkalankar, and a treatise entitled Tattwasar by Mahamahopadhyaya Rakhil Das Nyayaratna of Bhatpara. The two Pandits are distinguished Adhyapakas of our country, well deserving of the learned titles bestowed on them by an enlightened Government.

• The Tattwasar is a short treatise consisting of 15 Karikas in simple Sanskrit, commented upon by the author in the philosophical style which has been developed in Bengal by the logical genius of a long generation of Pandits and authors, and which, though unintelligible to the uninitiated, is, to the initiated, at once a model of accuracy and precision. In this short work, the author endeavours to revolutionise the received notions of the Naiyayikas, and to prove, with great force and subtlety, that there is no Jivatma different from Manas (the mind). Unlike Western philosophers, our ancestors believed that Manas is only a sixth sense—an internal organ of sense—so subtle that it can not receive more than one impression, thus confining perception to one object or phenomenon. This, according to Pandit Rakhil Das Nyayaratna, is simply a gratuitous assumption. To assume the existence of Manas as an organ and of Atma as the seer in order to explain a simple fact of perception, is a very complicated procedure. It will greatly simplify the matter if it is assumed that Manas is the seer and perception only a vritti or faculty of it. Thus Pandit Rakhil Das unconsciously proves the position of Western philosophers.

The work of Pandit Tarkalankar is written in that simple, idiomatic, graceful and forcible style which received its highest development in the hands of Sankara, Kumarila, Udyana and Vachaspati Misra. Pandit Tarkalankar's style will not in fact suffer by a comparison with that of any one of these ancient philosophers.

The Vaisheshika Darsana, with a commentary entitled Upashara, was edited for the Bibliotheca Indica series about 30 years ago, by two distinguished Pandits, namely, Professor Jaya Narayan Tarkapanchanan, of the Calcutta Sanskrit College, then at the zenith of his reputation, and Nanda Kumar Tarkaratna, a young scholar fast rising to the foremost rank of the learned of his time. Death has since removed both these men, Tarkapanchanan at the age of 70, and Pandit Tarkaratna in the prime of his life, at twenty-seven. The outcome of their labours was worthy of their reputation. Between them, they produced a fine edition. The text of author and commentator is correctly given, the whole is accompanied by an excellent gloss (vritti) from the pen of the Gamaliel of the duet, Tarkapanchanan, than whom a more conscientious scholar never took up pen for writing Sanskrit.

Chandrakanta Tarkalankar has done full justice to his illustrious predecessors in the field, by giving a brief and faithful summary of their views in a work of his entitled Tattwabali, a fitting introduction to his more advanced works. His present work is a Bhashya on the Vaisheshik Darsana. There is a tendency among the uninitiated to confound all sorts of annotations, whether Bhashyas, Vrittis, Vivritis, &c., &c., by taking all of them to be commentaries. These different sorts of annotations differ greatly from each other in character. A Bhashyakar, for instance, after explaining every word and particle of word in the original, is at liberty to make original reflections, which a Vrittikar is not. A Vrittikar must confine himself to the accepted meaning, a Bhashyakar need not.

Pandit Chandra Kanta has made the fullest and most honorable use of his privileges as a Bhashyakar. He has put in much original matter, and combated many received notions. For instance, gold and silver were always classed as light substances, "tejahpathartha," because they will not evaporate under any degree of heat applied to them, but ever remain bright melted substances. Pandit Chandra-kanta's sense of propriety revolts at such absurd notions, though they have the sanction of high antiquity and are universally accepted. He classes them with Prithivi Pathartha, and says they in no way differ from such substances as lac, wax, and so on.

There is no doubt that the Pandits of Bengal will not easily tolerate the novel features observable in these works and the new ideas they inculcate. Indeed, an interesting controversy is already going on in the vernacular press regarding these startling departures from the ancient methods. We fully believe, however, that the learned authors will be able to maintain their ground. They are responsible for what they have written, and they should try their best to establish their position by pointing out the weakness of their antagonists. If they succeed, they may be remembered in after times among the modern founders of new Schools of Hindu thought.

MONGHYR.

Jamalpore, February 15.

A case of infanticide or rather murder in cold blood, of recent occurrence, has come to my notice. A young girl aged between 5 and 7, Khattick caste, resident of Kassimbazar (evidently the place is named after Meer Casim) in Monghyr, happened to be out of her residence to a close neighbour, a Pasen (Toddy seller). The inmate of the house, pasen, having seen weighty necklace worn by the girl, could not resist the temptation, and consequently, with a view to possess herself of it, took her life. After which she caused the corpse to be buried under the floor. The place being a toddy shop, was much frequented by customers. One day it was noticed by one of them that an awful stench came from somewhere. He was answered that the smell must have proceeded from the dead body, either of a cat or dog. Soon after, the place was dug up and the corpse removed and thrown into a well, which was close by. One of the neighbours, having occasion to draw water out of the well, saw the body floating and gave the alarm. Now the Police appeared on the scene. Meanwhile, all the inmates, both male and female, took to their heels, which raised further suspicion in the minds of those present. Immediate steps were taken to arrest them. They are now in custody awaiting trial. I regret to say the police have not as yet succeeded in tracing and capturing the perpetrators of the murder of the poor woman referred to in my last.

COPYRIGHT CONVENTION.

The following Order of Her Majesty in Council published in the London Gazette of the 2nd December, 1887, is republished for general information in the Gazette of India of the 18th February, 1888:—
Extract from the "London Gazette" of Friday, 2nd December, 1887.
 At the Court at Windsor, the 28th day of November, 1887.

PRESENT.

The QUEEN'S Most Excellent Majesty.
 Lord President.
 Lord Stanley of Preston.
 Secretary Sir Henry Holland, Bart.

Whereas the Convention of which an English translation is set out in the First Schedule to this Order has been concluded between Her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and the Foreign countries named in this Order, with respect to the protection to be given by way of copyright to the authors of literary and artistic works:

And whereas the ratifications of the said Convention were exchanged on the fifth day of September, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-seven, between Her Majesty the Queen and the Governments of the Foreign countries following, that is to say:

Belgium; France; Germany; Hayti; Italy; Spain; Switzerland; Tunis;

And whereas Her Majesty in Council is satisfied that the foreign countries named in this Order have made such provisions as it appears to Her Majesty expedient to require for the protection of authors of works first produced in Her Majesty's dominions:

Now, therefore, Her Majesty, by and with the advice of Her Privy Council, and by virtue of the authority committed to Her by the International Copyright Acts, 1844 to 1886, doth order, and it is hereby ordered, as follows:

1. The Convention as set forth in the First Schedule to this Order, shall, as from the commencement of this Order, have full effect throughout Her Majesty's Dominions, and all persons are enjoined to observe the same.

2. This Order shall extend to the foreign countries following, that is to say:

Belgium; France; Germany; Hayti; Italy; Spain; Switzerland; Tunis;

and the above countries are in this Order referred to as the foreign countries of the Copyright Union, and those foreign countries together with Her Majesty's dominions, are in this Order referred to as the countries of the Copyright Union.

3. The author of a literary or artistic work which, on or after the commencement of this Order is first produced in one of the foreign countries of the Copyright Union shall, subject as in this Order and in the International Copyright Acts, 1844 to 1886, mentioned, have as respects that work throughout Her Majesty's dominions, the same right of copyright, including any right capable of being conferred by an Order in Council under section two or section five of the International Copyright Act, 1844, or under any other enactment, as if the work had been first produced in the United Kingdom, and shall have such right during the same period;

Provided that the author of a literary or artistic work shall not have any greater right or longer term of copyright therein, than that which he enjoys in the country in which the work is first produced.

Holloway's Pills—Weakening weather.—The sultry summer days strain the nerves of the feeble and decrepit, and disease may eventuate unless some restorative, such as these purifying Pills, be found to correct the disordering tendency. Holloway's medicine gives potency to the nervous system, which is the source of all vital movements, and presides over every action which maintains the growth and well-being of the body. No one can over estimate the necessity of keeping the nerves well stung, or the ease with which these Pills accomplish that end. They are the most infallible antidotes to indigestion, irregular circulation, palpitation, sick headache, and costiveness, and have therefore attained the largest sale and highest reputation.

The author of any literary or artistic work first produced before the commencement of this Order shall have the rights and remedies to which he is entitled under section six of the International Copyright Act, 1886.

4. The rights conferred by the International Copyright Acts, 1844 to 1886, shall, in the case of a literary or artistic work first produced in one of the foreign countries of the Copyright Union by an author who is not a subject or citizen of any of the said foreign countries, be limited as follows, that is to say, the author shall not be entitled to take legal proceedings in Her Majesty's dominions for protecting any copyright in such work, but the publisher of such work shall, for the purpose of any legal proceedings in Her Majesty's dominions for protecting any copyright in such work, be deemed to be entitled to such copyright as if he were the author, but without prejudice to the rights of such author and publisher as between themselves.

5. A literary or artistic work first produced simultaneously in two or more countries of the Copyright Union shall be deemed for the purpose of copyright to have been first produced in that one of those countries in which the term of copyright in the work is shortest.

6. Section six of the International Copyright Act, 1852, shall not apply to any dramatic piece to which protection is extended by virtue of this Order.

7. The orders mentioned in the Second Schedule to this Order are hereby revoked;

Provided that neither such revocation, nor anything else in this Order, shall prejudicially affect any right acquired or accrued before the commencement of this Order, by virtue of any Order hereby revoked, and any person entitled to such right shall continue entitled thereto, and to the remedies for the same, in like manner as if this Order had not been made.

8. This Order shall be construed as if it formed part of the International Copyright Act, 1886.

9. This Order shall come into operation on the sixth day of December, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-seven, which day is in this Order referred to as the commencement of this Order.

And the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury are to give the necessary orders herein accordingly.

C. L. PEEL.

FIRST SCHEDULE.

Copyright Convention.

Convention for protecting effectively and in as uniform a manner as possible, the rights of authors over their literary and artistic works. Made on the fifth day of September, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-seven, between Her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, Empress of India; His Majesty the German Emperor, King of Prussia; His Majesty the King of the Belgians; Her Majesty the Queen Regent of Spain, in the name of His Catholic Majesty the King of Spain; the President of the French Republic; the President of the Republic of Haiti; His Majesty the King of Italy; the Federal Council of the Swiss Confederation; His Highness the Bey of Tunis.

[The following is an English Translation of the Convention, with the omission of the formal beginning and end.]

ARTICLE I.

The Contracting States are constituted into an Union for the protection of the rights of authors over their literary and artistic works.

ARTICLE II.

Authors of any of the countries of the Union, or their lawful representatives, shall enjoy in the other countries for their works, whether published in one of those countries or unpublished, the rights which the respective laws do now or may hereafter grant to natives.

The enjoyment of these rights is subject to the accomplishment of the conditions and formalities prescribed by law in the country of origin of the work, and cannot exceed in the other countries the term of protection granted in the said country of origin.

The country of origin of the work is that in which the work is first published, or if such publication takes place simultaneously in several countries of the Union, that one of them in which the shortest term of protection is granted by law.

For unpublished works the country to which the author belongs is considered the country of origin of the work.

ARTICLE III.

The stipulations of the present Convention apply equally to the publishers of literary and artistic works published in one of the countries of the Union, but of which the authors belong to a country which is not a party to the Union.

ARTICLE IV.

The expression "literary and artistic works" comprehends books, pamphlets, and all other writings; dramatic or dramatico-musical works, musical compositions with or without words; works of design, painting, sculpture, and engraving; lithographs, illustrations, geographical charts, plans, sketches, and plastic works relative to geography, topography, architecture, or science in general; in fact, every production whatsoever in the literary, scientific, or artistic domain which can be published by any mode of impression or reproduction.

ARTICLE V.

Authors of any of the countries of the Union, or their lawful representatives, shall enjoy in the other countries the exclusive right of making or authorising the translation of their works until the expiration of ten years from the publication of the original work in one of the countries of the Union.

For works published in incomplete parts ("livraisons") the period of ten years commences from the date of publication of the last part of the original work.

For works composed of several volumes published at intervals, as well as for bulletins or collections ("cahiers") published by literary or scientific societies, or by private persons, each volume, bulletin, or collection is, with regard to the period of ten years, considered as a separate work.

In the cases provided for by the present Article and for the calculation of the period of the protection, the 31st December of the year in which the work was published is admitted as the date of publication.

ARTICLE VI.

Authorised translations are protected as original works. They consequently enjoy the protection stipulated in Articles II and III as regards their unauthorised reproduction in the countries of the Union.

It is understood that, in the case of a work for which the translating right has fallen into the public domain, the translator cannot oppose the translation of the same work by other writers.

ARTICLE VII.

Articles from newspapers or periodicals published in any of the countries of the Union may be reproduced in original or in translation in the other countries of the Union, unless the authors or publishers have expressly forbidden it. For periodicals it is sufficient if the prohibition is made in a general manner at the beginning of each number of the periodical.

This prohibition cannot in any case apply to articles of political discussion, or to the reproduction of news of the day or current topics.

ARTICLE VIII.

As regards the liberty of extracting portions from literary or artistic works for use in publications destined for educational or scientific purposes, or for chrestomathies, the matter is to be decided by the legislation of the different countries of the Union, or by special arrangements existing or to be concluded between them.

ARTICLE IX.

The stipulations of Article II apply to the public representation of dramatic or dramatico-musical works, whether such works be published or not.

Authors of dramatic or dramatico-musical works, or their lawful representatives, are, during the existence of their exclusive right of translation, equally protected against the unauthorised public representation of translations of their works.

The stipulations of Article II apply equally to the public performance of unpublished musical works or of published works in which the author has expressly declared on the title page or commencement of the work that he forbids the public performance.

ARTICLE X.

Unauthorized indirect appropriations of a literary or artistic work, of various kinds, such as adaptions, arrangements of music, &c., are specially included amongst the illicit reproductions, to which the present Convention applies, when they are only the reproduction of a particular work, in the same form, or in another form, with non-essential alterations, additions, or abridgments, so made as not to confer the character of a new original work.

It is agreed that, in the application of the present Article, the tribunals of the various countries of the Union will, if there is occasion, conform themselves to the provisions of their respective laws.

ARTICLE XI.

In order that the authors of works protected by the present Convention shall, in the absence of proof to the contrary, be considered as such, and be consequently admitted to institute proceedings against pirates before the courts of the various countries of the Union, it will be sufficient that their name be indicated on the work in the accustomed manner.

For anonymous or pseudonymous works, the publisher whose name is indicated on the work is entitled to protect the rights belonging to the author. He is, without other proof, reputed the lawful representative of the anonymous or pseudonymous author.

It is, nevertheless, agreed that the tribunals may, if necessary, require the production of a certificate from the competent authority to the effect that the formalities prescribed by law in the country of origin have been accomplished, as contemplated in Article II.

ARTICLE XII.

Pirated works may be seized on importation into those countries of the Union where the original work enjoys legal protection.

The seizure shall take place conformably to the domestic law of each State.

ARTICLE XIII.

It is understood that the provisions of the present Convention cannot in any way derogate from the right belonging to the Government of each country of the Union to permit, to control, or to prohibit, by measures of domestic legislation or police, the circulation, representation, or exhibition of any works or productions in regard to which the competent authority may find it necessary to exercise that right.

ARTICLE XIV.

Under the reserves and conditions to be determined by common agreement, (See paragraph 4 of Final Protocol.) the present Convention applies to all works which at the moment of its coming into force have not yet fallen into the public domain in the country of origin.

MUNICIPAL ELECTION UNDER SECTION

23 OF ACT IV. (B. C.) OF 1876.

A vacancy having occurred in the representation of Ward No. 18 by the disqualification of Mr. J. G. Apcar, owing to his absence from Calcutta for six months consecutively, it is hereby notified that the rate and tax-payers of the aforesaid Ward must forthwith proceed to elect a Commissioner for the aforesaid Ward. As only one Commissioner has to be elected, each person qualified to vote will, under the concluding portion of Section 13, be entitled to only one vote.

The election will be held on Monday, the 27th February 1888, between the hours of 9 A. M. and 6 P. M., at the Municipal Office. At a date not less than 21 days before the day fixed for taking the poll, a voting paper printed in blue ink will be forwarded by post to each of the registered voters.

The voter on receipt of this voting paper may—

- (1) Return it by post duly filled up to the Municipal Office in a closed cover marked "voting paper"
- (2) Return it by hand to the Municipal Office in a closed cover marked "voting paper"

- (3) Present it himself at the polling station on the day of the poll, or
- (4) Entrust it either open or in a closed cover at his option, to any person whom he may select, for delivery at the polling station on the day of the poll.

Any Voter who, owing to miscarriage of the Post or other mishap, may not have received his voting paper by the 14th day before the poll, may apply at the Municipal Office personally or by agent for a duplicate, putting in a written statement that he has not received any voting paper.

Voting papers on different colored paper from the original and duplicate papers referred to above will be provided at the Municipal Office at the time of the poll, and any voter who has not already voted, or who may wish to cancel his previous vote, may, notwithstanding that he has already filled up an original or a duplicate voting paper, appear at the poll and fill up a paper in the presence of the polling officer, and such vote or votes shall alone be held valid and shall cancel all previous votes.

OPINION OF THE PRESS.

.....this interesting book. We are justified in so terming it, not on account of any romantic adventures that the author has to relate, nor of any very new discoveries in geography or natural history. There is something particular as regards ethnology; and a great deal of human nature in the book, shown to the reader with a simplicity and candour which bear testimony to its truth. Called from the busy haunts of men in the city to dwell for a time in Independent Tipperah as a judicious adviser to its Chief, Doctor Mookerjee relates his adventures during the several journeys to and fro in that capacity, without revealing the secrets of the State, like a good diplomatist. He has adhered strictly to the advice which he offers to his brethren of the Native Press, and has written what he saw and knows, without revealing all, considering what he might properly say and what withhold..... The above seems to be a curious passage to be found in a book of travels, and appears to have no connection with the subject. But it arises from a casual reference to a slaughter house, and a writer who "thundered weekly against the outrage of locating shambles in the immediate vicinity of a Hindoo temple"—where, in fact, no temple could be said to exist. Hence, the Doctor advises his fellow-scribes not to be Pharisees, righteous overmuch, but to look and be sure of their facts. In the same spirit, he has written his book. He gives an account of his travels, which seem often to have been voyages, upon the wide-spreading rivers of Eastern Bengal which in the rains become almost inland seas. On these he philosophises on the nature of the country and the people, making careful observation of his facts; and though he sometimes fancies he knows better than his boatmen, and more than suspects that they are getting the better of him, he submits with a grace that would have done credit to Socrates, and accepts the apparently inevitable in the interests of peace. The Doctor is a close observer of nature, animate and inanimate, with an eye to the picturesque as well as to the sublime and beautiful. And although there is a vein of cynicism running through many of his observations, it is tempered by such evident good nature, that even a stranger would conceive him to be a laughter-loving rather than a stern philosopher. This is evident in his descriptions of his boatmen and others, while he denounces the lawlessness which has made the poor fishermen suspicious even of honest intentions, because they have so long been the helpless victims of marauders stronger than themselves. Their only defence is flight or deceit, and the latter is their justification as a mode of self-protection. We are shown not only the weakness of the people, but the shortcomings of the administration that leave these things possible..... The author is impartial in his censures..... There is much in the book to which space forbids us to refer. That it is not a prosy one may be gathered from the fact that, for its 300 pages, there are nearly as many index references. Many of the subjects are necessarily but lightly treated, but all sensibly and fairly. And Dr. Mookerjee is such a master of the English language that in the whole book we have scarcely found a phrase that might not have been written by an Englishman "to the manor born." There is nothing in it at which any one could reasonably take offence; and there is much from which both Englishmen and natives may learn greatly-needed lessons.—The Indian Daily News, Nov. 22, 1887.

"TRAVELS IN BENGAL. Such is the title of a most interesting little work published a short time ago. Its author is Babu Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee, the well-known Editor of the Reis and Rayyet, the most original, cleverly-written and interesting journal in India. Babu Sambhu Chunder is one of the veteran Indian writers in English. He is the master of a most happy, racy pleasant style, which you can easily make out from amongst the writings of a hundred different men. In racy humorous writing Babu Sambhu Chunder has no rival among his Indian contemporaries. He won his first laurels, we believe, by his writings in his own periodical, the Mookerjee's Magazine, now long-defunct. In this magazine articles of great learning and excellence appeared, mostly from the pen of Babu Sambhu Chunder. He has written several other booklets. His Causes of the Mutiny; Mr. Wilson, Lord Canning and the Income Tax; the Caveer of an Indian Princess, Her Highness the late Secundra Begum of Bhopal; and the Prince in India and to India are publications which attracted considerable notice. His latest production "Travels in Bengal" is a work of great merit. It is at once a most faithful and interesting picture of natural scenery and life in Bengal, although Mr. Mookerjee does not profess to write a picture of Bengal life and uses his pencil in its portraiture only in passing. The dedication is characteristic. [Extract.]

The "Travels" are travels in East Bengal, travels and voyages between Calcutta and Independent Tepperah. We do not believe many people in this side of India know that there is such an independent State as Tipperah. But nevertheless such a state exists. We will give here a summary of its history in the words of Mr. Mookerjee—He writes:—[Extract.] Mr. Mookerjee was Dewan of Independent Tipperah for some five years in all between 1877 and 1881. The travels are an account of his voyages to and from Tipperah.

Those who have travelled in Bengal, particularly in its Eastern districts, which are the districts described in Mookerjee's book, will bear him out in his statement that Lower Bengal is not stale, flat and unprofitable, that, on the contrary, she is the beautifullest country in the world. She has no high mountains, but she has rivers apparently as vast as the sea, to make her scenery grand and majestic. She has a hundred rivers ever overflowing with water, thousands of transparent lakes, covered with the lily and a hundred beautiful water-flowers, thousands of seas of ever-waving paddy fields, thousands of clusters of bamboo and of great trees dressed in beautiful creepers adorning the river banks, to make her the loveliest country in the world. Even a Bengali needs to see and travel Bengal to adequately know her thousand witching charms. For a foreigner it is well nigh impossible to get even an approximate idea of what they are like from description, however true and faithful. Let us hear what our author has to say on the subject. We read:—[Extract.] A paddy sea is thus inimitably described:—[Extract.]

We will quote a passage of another character:—[Extract.]

We could cull many such gems. But space forbids it. We will, however, quote some passages of another kind. Our traveller, though old in years, is evidently young in heart, for no one in the romantic age of youth could be more appreciative of female charms than our traveller. In every other page you find our author describing in terms of enthusiasm some rural girl or woman of beauty. [Extract.] In the next page we find our traveller's attention [Extract.]

There is the description, physical and moral, of a Colonel, which we cannot resist the temptation of reproducing, although the article has already exceeded the usual length. [Extract.]

We have now given extracts enough to show that the little book of travels is most delightful reading. It contains graphic descriptions of natural scenery, faithful portraiture of men and manners, and happy, good humoured observations on them. There is not an ill-natured or unkind word in the whole book—it overflows in every page with the milk of human kindness. Every observation testifies to the author being a keen observer of men and things, as an example of which we can mention the instructive and interesting chapter on the Native Christians of Portuguese extraction in Tipperah. Again, although the book does not pretend to deal with life in Bengal, the glimpses of that life we find in it are very considerable and pleasant. We will now conclude by recommending the book to all who may wish to spend a few hours amidst happy thoughts and pleasant pictures.—

S. K. C.

—The Tribune, Nov. 26, 1887.

If we have not before noticed Mr. Sambhu C. Mookerjee's Travels in Bengal, which was published some months ago, it is not because the little book is either dull or pointless. It contains, on the contrary, much interesting matter, though some of the incidents are over-weighted with detail in what is facetiously called a "little booklet." The author's view as a rule is, by the way, facetious: he is given even to punning; but he is also sentimental in the highest degree—"a naked Whiteman" hurts his susceptibilities; a Hindu girl, bathing in the river, throws him into an ecstasy of delight: "she had such large languishing eyes!" But he is nothing if not philosophical, and his reflections on this or that social and political subject are not without their moral. Mr. Sambhu C. Mookerjee was formerly Minister to the "last of the Nawabs Nazim of Bengal, Behar and Orissa" and afterwards Minister of the Maharaja of Tipperah. He is a man, therefore, of experience, and when he speaks his brethren should listen to him.... Travels in Bengal is a readable book, and it abounds in anecdotes which are often as instructive as amusing, and it is not spoiled by too many political allusions, though, of course, some few have crept in.—The Pioneer, Dec. 1887.

It may be well-known to all of our readers that Babu Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee the veteran editor of the Reis and Rayyet newspaper, has just published a book describing the four voyages that he made between Calcutta and Independent Tipperah when he had to go and to return from the latter place in the capacity of the minister to its prince. The literature yet produced in the English tongue by our own countrymen is very scanty and any sensible addition to it cannot well escape the attention of the public press. Much greater therefore should be the attention claimed on behalf of a book which comes from the pen of so well-known a writer in the field of Indian journalism as Babu Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee. That gentleman's career as a writer fills nearly the last thirty years, and there has hardly been any subject of public importance during that long period which has not occupied his attention. Master of an inimitable racy style, with a vast store of classical allusions ever ready at the call, and possessing an infinite fund of humour, our author often cultivates every thing that he touches, and his peculiar strength lies in description. We therefore welcome the appearance of this book more especially as the subject is one which to make it interesting, requires a lively colouring and a rich, picturesque and imaginative description. There exist several books of travels written by eminent Englishmen, and every one of these differs perhaps, in their conception and plan of execution. Of these none was more widely read in the course of the last few years than Carlyle's reminiscences of an Irish Journey in 1849. That book is made up of extracts from diaries and the worst features of it are the bitter and caustic personal remarks interspersed throughout the book. However that may suit the polished and fashionable taste of England, in our country it would have been singularly out of place and we are glad that Babu Sambhu Chunder has confined himself to the description of those natural sceneries he passed through, and the means of travel in the distant and little-known regions of East Bengal. That the rivers of Bengal, with their circuitous and entangling courses do enshrine in them a deep spirit of poetry and are of sincere interest to the real man of imagination, is proved by the fact that Sir William Hunter, than whom a more accomplished man of letters never passed the best years of his life in Bengal, should have chosen the subject for his very interesting address at Oxford, the other day. The gentle waves, the gentler ripples, the grassy banks, the ever-entwining courses, the pleasant air, the sceneries on both sides make the rivers of Bengal a genuine thing of interest to those whose eyes are perpetually fed by the artificial gloss and dross of civilization and few could have set perhaps the loveliness of our rivers in better light than our accomplished author. His eloquent sentences, marching in regular order one after another, and embodying in them selves, every minute detail, that can lend to a scene its finest artistic effect, seem to place the reader in the very midst of sceneries described, and the man of leisure who would acquaint himself with the state of things in East Bengal, can hardly resort to a better book. The journeys which are described in this volume are certainly uneventful and though they correspond to facts as they furnish no interesting situation, no critical moments, to the seeker of intellectual excitement and this will no doubt constitute a serious objection to the book on the part of sensational seeking readers. None has however any thing to quarrel with the choice of a subject that any author may choose to write upon and none of the outside public can afford any explanation as to why the author should have preferred one subject to another. We think however there are one or two indications of bad taste. Still we welcome the appearance of this book and trust that it is but the first of a long series of works in writing which our author should spend the matured experience and the literary facility of a well-spent life.—Young Bengal, Feb. 2, 1888.

We owe an apology to Mr. Sambhu C. Mookerjee for the apparent negligence with which we have treated that delightful work of his Travels in Bengal. Mr. Mookerjee, as almost every one knows, is one of the best English scholars in India; he writes as gracefully as does the most scholarly Englishman, and ample proof of this is afforded in the pages of his book before us, which is an interesting narrative of four journeys,—“two trips to Tipperah and two trips back”—accompanied by historical, geographical, cartographical and many other ital notes of the lands passed through. We confess we have been but through the first half of the work, and, as we have proposed to review it in two papers, we think our progress sufficient for present purposes. Our author has not, as far as we have read, met with those thrilling adventures we read of—oft with a certain amount of sneaking disbelief—in the average hunter's narratives or traveller's tales; peaceful as the bosom of a still lake were his journeyings in Bengal Proper. He carried no formidable weapons with him, save and except a rusty old gun which, when called into requisition once, refused to go off; and yet withal, few more delightful works of travel in India have we read than the one now under our hands. The charms of true yet eloquent description, the force of observation, the gift of seeing sermons in stones, are all possessed in a great degree by Mr. Mookerjee; and we are pleasantly surprised at the lively and fascinating manner in which he can palm off on the reader the dreariest incident of his trips. Mr. Mookerjee will forgive us if we mention that we think him a very gallant old gentleman with the accent on the second syllable. He has evinced in his little work a weakness for describing the Beauties of Bengal with all the poetic adorns of a Strophon. Did we not know enough of the erudite and good old "Babu" editor, we might be inclined to call this particular weakness of his, in Carlyle's language "a Byronism of taste." Here is how he speaks of a beautiful damsel he saw disporting in the running waters of the beautiful Megna, at Sonargoan:— [Extract.]

But the above excerpt is not the best thing in the book by far. Although every line in it which we have gone over, is a line that we ourselves having written, would not wish to blot out, there are passages in it which surprise us and raise our hearts to a higher level by their eloquence, their beauty and wealth of expression. Running through the pages of Travels in Bengal is a vein of quiet humour—that humour which makes us fall in love with writers and tempts us to fly to them for solace in trouble, for a return of serenity in moments of vexation. Mr. Mookerjee has, in his work, added one more to the innumerable anecdotes relative to the fidelity of man's best friend among brutes—the dog. The sentinel duties of a canine phenomenon—Tom by name—are related in glowing terms, but we shall not rob the author of one of his finest plums by transferring it into our columns. This review, as we have already stated, is but the introductory one. In our next, or a little later, we shall take up Mr. Mookerjee's book where we are leaving it off, and make our readers a little more familiar with one of the cleverest native gentlemen of the day and with his interesting book on travels in Baboodom. Mr. Mookerjee, like all his fellow mortals, is human, and he has let us know this in his present work. How, we propose to state only in our second review. Would he however pardon us if we succumb to the temptation of finishing this up with his pretty remarks about Mooning and the Moon. After "the contending gods of the elements" had "left off" one night when our traveler was on the bosom of the Megna, he watched Luna issue from behind the clouds in all her grandeur and radiance. That sight, so delightful to the mind with a leaning towards the aesthetic and poetic, gave vent to the following: [Extract.]

Now, the above will prove a grand surprise to the European readers especially, who may perhaps be unkind enough to doubt that it was written by a "Babu" just, as people have doubted that Shakespeare was really the author of Shakespeare and Tennyson the author of Tennyson. Mr. Mookerjee and we part here, but when work is done and we sit in our cosy arm-chair at home and watch, as is our wont, the blue smoke curl gracefully away from our pipe, we shall dream with waking eyes of the beautiful Megna and the damsels of Bengal, of the moon and the waters, and we know that we shall again take up the Travels in Bengal and satisfy our wish of getting to the end of such a pleasant little work.—The Malabar and Travancore Spectator, February 4, 1888.

[Certificate.]

"I have known Babu Rajendra Nath Ghoshal Kuraj for upwards of 15 years, and I can bear ample testimony to the wonderful efficacy of his medicine in the treatment of diseases of the womb. While Assistant Surgeon of Monghyr and subsequently, I have known him to cure the most obstinate cases of uterine Leucorrhœa and other uterine derangements, organic and functional. I can safely call his medicine the Specific for Leucorrhœa and painful menstruation. Ladies who have been subject to these diseases for years and were barren have been cured and borne children.

TO KATIE IN IRELAND.

Ah well I remember, one night in December,
As gently I press'd a fair maid to my side,
By a clear mountain stream which in fancy did seem
To echo each love tale I told my fair bride.
As I pleaded my case, her most beautiful face
With the tint of the rose did instantly glow.
"Oh spare the the task," cried she, "and why ask?"
"You know that I love you, you know that I do."

With utmost affection and fond adoration,
I gazed on this damsel as we walked along,
With a prayer to kind Heav'n for the blessing me giv'n,
The pride of the mountain, the theme of my song.
Should fortune but smile on me the meanwhile,
Together, thro' life's rugged pathway we'll go,
And I'll "spare her the task," for ne'er more will I ask
If truly she loves me, for I know that I do.

NEWS AND COMMENTS.

A FIELD force has been told off for Sikkim. It consists of—"Staff.—Colonel T. Graham, R. A., commanding; and Captain Travers, 2nd Gurkhas, as Deputy Assistant Adjutant-General.

"Strength of Force.—9-1 Northern Division, R. A., 4 guns; 2nd Battalion Derbyshire Regiment, 200 men; Head-quarters wing of the 13th Bengal Infantry, 400 men; and the 32nd Pioneers, about 700 men. No men are to accompany the force, but those in every way fit for service in a cold climate.

"Ammunition.—168 rounds per gun, 200 per rifle, and 100 per carbine.
"Supplies and stores.—One month's supplies of Quartermaster's stores to be carried by the troops as far as the base depôt, and provision for one month's supplies to be made.

The transport is to be of mules, supplemented by coolies. A needful extension of the telegraph along the line of movement of the troops will be carried out under orders issued by the Public Works Department.

The base depôt is to be formed at Silligori or some place conveniently near. Three Commissariat officers, two for supply and one for transport, will accompany the force, which, it will thus be seen, will number about 1,400 men."

Orders have since been passed for a Coolie Corps of 2,000 men.

Mr. Paul had reported the Raja of Sikkim quietly friendly but fearful of the Tibetans. The expressed object of the expedition is to turn the Tibetans out of Lingtu, not to invade the Tibetan country. The Viceroy left for Darjeeling yesterday and the Raja of Sikkim has been apprised of this visit, and that a visit from the Raja would be welcome.

The Bengal Chief Secretary Mr. Ware Edgar pioneers the Viceroy. The Tibetans shew no disposition to fight.

SIR STEUART BAYLEY left for his Chota Nagpore tour yesterday and returns on the 15th.

THE Bulgarian Question is still exercising the wits of statesmen. Bulgaria persists in maintaining the present rule. Russia has formally demanded of the Porte to declare to the Bulgarians that the Treaty of Berlin has been violated by the illegality of Prince Ferdinand's rule in Bulgaria. The German and French ambassadors at Constantinople do not oppose the action of their Russian colleague. England, however, is not prepared to coerce the Sultan until they could agree to the future rule of Bulgaria. A Conference of the Powers may be expected.

THE House of Commons has empowered the raising of 10½ millions to purchase the Oudh and Rohilkund Railway and of the further 10 millions for the construction, extension and equipment of railways in India through the agency of the various Companies.

SIR CHARLES BERNARD has decided not to return to India. His credit has been wrecked on the new annexation, and he is wise not to venture out of India again but to content himself with the Revenue Secretaryship of the India Office.

A NATIVE Correspondent in Afghanistan sends the following to the Civil and Military Gazette :—

"A man applied to the Ameer with a claim of Rs. 60 against another on account of an alleged loan which the borrower refused to pay. The Ameer summoned the defendant before him in his garden at Jellalabad; but he denied that he owed any money to the other. When the appellant was ordered to produce his witnesses he said that he had none 'except the tree under which I gave him the loan.' After long deliberation the Ameer ordered him then to go to the tree and ask it for justice in the case. A little while after he had gone, the Ameer said, inquiringly, 'that the appellant must surely have reached the tree by that time.' Whereupon the defendant, who was present, said, 'Not yet; the tree is too far.' As soon as the Ameer heard this from the defendant, he gave orders quietly in the Turki language to one of his servants to go after the appellant and bring him back; and he ordered the defendant to go and see if the appellant had reached the tree. When the appellant came back, he was also ordered to go and see if the defendant went to the same tree 'under which you say that you gave him the loan;' and it was so. The Ameer of Cabul thereupon ordered the defendant to pay the appellant Rs. 60, because he could not have known the right tree if he had not borrowed the money; and he was fined also for giving false evidence."

MR. MARSDEN has come back to the Police Court as Chief Presidency Magistrate, Mr. Reilly reverting to his own place in the Legislative Council as Assistant-Secretary.

MR. COLMAN MACAULAY has addressed the following letter to the Commissioners of the several Divisions under the Bengal Government :

"I am directed to say that, in connection with a representation made for the removal of the name of a Municipality from Schedule II of Act III (B.C.) of 1884, Sir Steuart Bayley has had under consideration the whole question of the powers conferred on municipal bodies of selecting their own Chairmen. His Honour does not consider it at present necessary to remove from the second schedule the name of any Municipality included in it; but, on the other hand, he will be prepared experimentally to appoint, under section 23, any Chairman who may be nominated by the Commissioners of any Municipality in your Division named in the second schedule of the Act. I am to request that the Commissioners of Municipalities named in the second schedule, in cases where a Chairman has not yet been appointed, may be at once invited to make their nominations."

THE Gangaputras and the Ghatias of Benares have had a free fight. They were always quarreling over their respective shares of the offerings from pilgrims on the occasion of fairs and religious gatherings. The parties had been to Court to file their complaints immediately after a fight. The ill feeling revived as soon as they came out of Court, and they indulged in a riot. Four Ghatias were attacked in a gharry, the carriage broken and they severely assaulted. O for a Gubbins!

A WRITER in the Bombay Times of India confirms us :—

"When the Nawab of Moorshedabad was passing through that city, fourteen or fifteen years ago, he sent six or seven dressing-gowns to be lined with fur. Just as he was starting for London, a bill was put into his hand for £6,000. He had not so much cash, and said he would settle in London. This case went into court, and London furriers gave evidence that, if these furs were real, or what they were represented to be, they would be worth that money, but they were not, and their value was assessed at one-fourth, or £1,500, which was awarded. To ask four times as much as a thing is worth is 'pretty stiff' even when a purchaser is a Native Prince. Incredible as it may seem, the Gaekwar's bill was more than twenty-five times as large as it should have been, and yet French law lends itself to support such monstrous and disreputable claims."

HERR MORITZ LIEFMAN, who has lately been lecturing at Dusseldorf, brings into a focus the public liabilities of the principal states. He gives—

"The total public debt of Germany (47,000,000 inhabitants), including railway debt, at £400,000,000 or £8. 10s. per head of population; that of France, without her colonies (38,000,000 inhabitants), £1,500,000,000 or £39. 10s. per head; England without her colonies (37,000,300 inhabitants), £750,000,000, or £20 per head; Austria and Hungary (41,000,000 inhabitants), £450,000,000 or £11 per head; Italy (30,000,000 inhabitants), £450,000,000 or £8. 10s. per head of population. Annual interest paid by Germany amounts to £15,000,000 or 6s. per head of population; by Italy, £21,500,000 or 14s. per head; by Austria and Hungary, £23,000,000 or 11s. per head; by England, £23,500,000 or 13s. per head; by Russia, between £30,000,000 and £35,000,000 or 8s. per head; by France £51,000,000 or £1. 7s. per head of population."

SIR SAVALAY RAMASAMY MOODELLIAR of Madras is again to the fore with Rs. 30,000 for public charity. His son has just been put to school, and that occasion—Vidyarambham—is to be celebrated with the erection of Choultry or rest houses for travellers, near the termini of the Madras and South Indian Railway. We hope the young hopeful will prove himself worthy of the care and money expended on him.

HERE is a story of an American forger :—

"A Yankee, named Cooper, long known on both sides of the Atlantic as 'the King of the Forgers,' was arrested lately at Fontainebleau. The man's career has been one of prolonged and gigantic swindling. In the Civil War he distinguished himself as a sailor, and at its close secured a good position in the Navy Department at Washington. He was very skilful in imitating handwriting, and took advantage of his position to forge orders from paymasters for 175,000 dols. On this sum he married, and was arrested on the day of his honeymoon. After a five years' incarceration, he was liberated, to find that his marriage had been annulled. He then took to local preaching in New Orleans, and married a well-to-do widow. He has since secured large sums from various quarters by ingenious devices. He had 18,000 dols. from the Bank of Mobile, defrauded his employer, into whose service he got by means of forged introductions, of 82,000 dols., came to England, and amongst other forgeries, obtained £4,000 from Glyn, Mills, and Co., and last year £3,000 from the London and Westminster Bank. It is on account of the last that he has been captured."

HER Majesty has sent Lady Mackenzie an Indian shawl with an autograph letter, saying, "The service your husband renders my son-in-law separates him often from you, and in order to show how highly I value the sacrifice he makes for us I send you this token of my regard."

Truth gives the cost to date of publishing and compiling the reports of the Challenger expedition, at over £200,000.

WE read in the Dacca Gazette :—

"There is a somewhat curious case of extortion pending before the Moonshigunj Criminal Court. One Sahoo Churan Koorey, a money-lender of Nagorkosba, Thanah Munshigunge, went in Pous last to Dhoberchor, a village some 16 miles off from the station, to collect his dues from the debtors residing there. It appeared that he had a mistress with him and somehow or other they were it is alleged both taken to the local Zamindary Katchery, belonging to the Baliahy Baboos, where, according to the complainant the Koorey's statement, the Naib and the manager extorted Rs. 50 from him and robbed him of his shawl, shoes and hose of which the shoes only were recovered, and the woman was taken possession of by the manager. Lately a woman was brought before the Court whom the defence tried to prove to be a mistress in question, while the prosecution repudiates the fact saying that her name was Bidhoo and she was a resident of Calcutta, while this woman according to her own deposition is a native of Dacca and her name is Bama."

OUR retort upon the Amrita Bazar of misnomery put the veteran controversialist on his mettle, but he thus escapes the dilemma and deals damnation round the land—of the enemy :—

"Why, where is the puzzle? Amrita meaus ambrosia. The Patrika is like a bazar where nectar is sold. Of course there are boors who do not like the divine drink dealt out to them, but then the other meaning of Amrita is aconite."

That is capital! though of course from the enemy's point, it is open to the remark of aggravation of the misnomer.

MR. P. C. Higgins, Hony. Treasurer, Eduljee Framjee Albles Leper Home, Bombay, has thankfully received the following donations :—

"The Maharajah Bahadoor of Hathwa, Rs. 500; H. H. the Maharajah of Bhavnagar, G. C. S. I., Rs. 200; the Maharajah of Durbhanga, K. C. I. E., Rs. 100; His Highness the Maharajah of Cochin, K. C. S. I., Rs. 100; the Maharani of Balrampur Rs. 100; His Highness the Rajah of Faridkot Rs. 50; The Hon'ble Raja G. N. Gajpati Rao of Vizagapatam Rs. 50; Sirdar Khan Bahadoor Puddumjee Pestonjee of Poona Rs. 50; Maneckjee Cowasjee, Esquire, of Damaun Rs. 25; the Raja of Kila Durpan, Orissa, Rs. 25."

THE Chancellor of the Exchequer lately delivered a striking address as Lord Rector of Glasgow University :—

"Mr. Goschen's object was to plead, 'not for any particular branch of knowledge, but for a temper, an intellectual habit, an attitude of mind which is applicable to every kind of study and indeed to every sort of work.' In other words, he meant the habit of intellectual interest in all that is studied, learnt, or done. Mr. Goschen took a very forcible illustration of his text from the growing employment of German clerks in England. He made the following pointed remarks :—'There is a danger in thinking that it is only knowledge that is lacking—that it is only in width of information that the foreigner is superior. He knows more, no doubt; but that is not the root of the matter. The root of the matter is that he cares more about his work; that, as a rule, he takes an interest in it apart from its results in money, which, for whatever reason, the Englishman has not hitherto learnt sufficiently to take.' Mr. Goschen draws the contrast between the German clerk and the English one in that the former's work presents to him a field which excites his interest and fills him with an ambition for wider knowledge, while the latter looks on his work as dull and dry. The following words we quote are full of meaning :—'I have myself seen German senior clerks listening to some discussion on a complicated question of commercial law, not with the bored faces of men who keep their eye upon the clock, anxious only to know when the hour of release will strike, but with the keen interest of experts who delight in the analysis of an intellectual problem.' Scotchmen, says Mr. Goschen, are more remarkably successful in the practical work of life simply because they take a more intellectual interest in their work than the average Englishman. The closing words of burning eloquence from Mr. Goschen are well worth reproduction. 'But now,' he said, 'when looking around at the rapid advance of our rivals, we see that start of ours, which once seemed so enormous, growing dangerously less, when a nation, to whom work is a pride and a pleasure, appears with giant strides to be gaining on our steps, the people of Great Britain may perhaps more readily be induced to bestir themselves to add to their great natural capacities, to their natural and acquired advantages, and to the self-confidence of their ancient prestige, some of that power which the passion for mental labour has conferred on their most formidable rivals, and to resolve that, in school and in University, in bank and in warehouse, in factory and in arsenal, a larger share of time and credit, and influence and authority, shall be assigned to intellectual effort and intellectual interest.'"

FROM next April the Government Telegraph Gazette will be issued six times or twice more than at present, each issue summarising the contents of the previous one.

DURING the month of February 1888, Forty-three thousand six hundred and eighty-nine persons visited the Indian Museum. Of natives, there were 31,661 males and 10,475 females, and of Europeans, 1,138 males and 415 females. The daily average number of visitors for the 21 days, on which the Museum was open to the general public, was 2,080.

MR. GRIESBACK, the geological Survey officer who has entered the service of the Amir, arrived at Jalalabad on the 10th instant.—Press Commissioner.

THE Bombay Gazette writes :—

“One of the most sensational cases in the annals of crime was, after a hearing extending over five days, brought to a close at the Criminal Sessions of the Bombay High Court on Saturday. It was known as the Parel murder case, and was remarkable both on account of the unusual atrocity of the crime and of the consummate manner with which the city police discovered the various links in the chain of evidence which brought the murderer to justice. A Pathan, not being able to live harmoniously with his wife, sought to end his troubles by murdering her, and, packing the mutilated remains in a box, removed it, with the assistance of an accomplice, to the flats at Parel, after which, he took a passage for Aden, intending to make the pilgrimage to Mecca. The box, with its ghastly contents, was discovered by the police, and the murderer and his victim being comparatively unknown in Bombay, it required all the ingenuity of the detectives to discover the perpetrator of the foul deed. The box alone afforded a clue, and upon this, slender though it seemed, the police worked with such remarkable skill and ingenuity, that they succeeded not only in discovering the murderer, but in effecting his capture at Aden. That the police, upon so slender a clue, should be able to discover the perpetrator of a murder so cunningly conceived and so daringly executed, reflects the greatest credit upon their detective capacity. It has frequently been said that the Indian police are deficient in the power of unravelling the mysteries of a great crime. How undeserved is the reproach is shown by the facts which have been brought to light in the present trial.”

The Bombay Police are not yet, we believe, within a measurable distance of perfection. They proved themselves frail brethren of the baton in the persecution of Mulhar Rao Gaekwar. Akbar Ali, who was charged with the success of the enterprise, was a genuine chip of the block—of the Police policy. For all that, the Ducks are a respectable and ingenious Force, far more so than the cackling geese of the Ditch. They do not spare predators, and they do not bully those who press for inquiry. They even catch murderers. Who that has been in Bengal for the last thirty years from the reign of Wauchope and Younan, does not know how hard it is to be over inquisitive into the secrets of the powerful or desperate men who usually commit crimes of violence. The Bombaywallas are fool hardy enough, and no wonder if they succeed.

AT a complimentary dinner at Manchester, Mr. George Routledge recounted the history of publishing during the last 50 years. He told his hearers

“how he began at Carlisle when parcels came by a mail-coach from London; how 30,000 copies of the ‘Coleen Bawn,’ were sold during the performance at the Adelphi, 1000,000 copies Grant’s ‘Romance of war,’ how in 1852 ‘Uncle Tom’s Cabin’ sold at the rate of 10,000 copies a day; how he paid a royalty of 2l. a copy on ‘Queechy’ and sold 60,000; how in 1853 he engaged with the late Lord Lytton ‘to pay him a sum of £20,000 for a term of ten years,’ and how ‘the agreement was carried out to the letter;’ how the firm then purchased from the present Lord Lytton ‘all the copyrights and plant. Mr. Routledge said: ‘We have for this author’s works nearly paid the sum of £40,000.’ He spent £1,000 upon the illustrations of an edition of Longfellow’s poetical work and gave £1,000 to Mr. Howard Staunton for editing an edition of Shakespeare, the plant of work costing £10,000. He sold 10,000 copies of Rarey’s ‘Horse Taming,’ and appears by so doing to have spoiled Rarey’s ten-guinea lectures. The copy was brought from New York by a gentleman, who got £326 for his trip. Mr. Routledge gave Longfellow £1,000 for his ‘New England Tragedies’ and £500 for his ‘Dante.’ In conclusion, Mr. Routledge said, ‘For fifty years I can say I have published 100 books each year, or two a week.’”

What a contrast between the West and the East! Here in India literature is a drug in the market. There is not yet a sufficient reading class, and those who can read prefer to starve their minds to being out of pocket of their rupees. The rich are not learned enough and have got to reserve all their resources for compliments to the powers that be and other taxes demi-official. The Government, which has ever in Oriental countries been the great patrons of the learned, has nothing for Pandits beyond the charmed circle of officocracy, unless perhaps they are pimps and sycophants as well. We are watching with interest the fate of two applications in respect of two colossal undertakings.

THE following is going the round of the papers :—

“Official Presidential income in America amounts to £10,000 per annum; we remember when it used to be 25,000. Germany’s Emperor receives no income at all in that capacity, though a sum is placed at his disposal for granting pensions and gratuities. As King of Prussia, his Majesty’s revenues amount to £1,678 per diem, out of which all Royal Princes who claim to be State pensioners have to be supported. A President of the French Republic receives about £48,000 per annum. Our Queen’s income, by the Civil List, is £409,000 per annum.”

NOTES AND LEADERETTES.

REUTER wires that M. Wilson has been sentenced to two years’ imprisonment and a fine of three thousand francs, and five years’ deprivation of civil rights.

THE Hon’ble Mr. Scoble has revived the Bill for the abolition of the barbarity—imprisonment for debt. His predecessor in office had introduced the measure in Council, but the opposition was too great and he seemed almost paralysed. Mr. Ilbert was the burnt child among our Senators. He had already been visited with ruthless fury for attempting reform in another direction. Mr. Scoble had no such experiences and has no such fears. He is free to initiate a new policy, and we wish he could do away with the barbarity altogether. Friday week, he presented the Report of the Select Committee and explained the provisions recommended. The Committee of ten are unanimous with the exception of one on a fractional point. The Bill is not the less welcome that it is not thorough. We hail the instalment, for it is a step in advance. The Bill rescues that freedom to women which had been taken away by a too-lawyerly Chief Justice and an unchivalrous Legislature. The Bill therefore only restores a right to women in India. To the other gender, it grants some concession. A man can only be sent to jail in execution of decree, not at the option of the creditor, but at the discretion of the Judge. The principle underlying the Bill is that poverty or inability to pay a debt is not to be visited with loss of freedom and disgrace of confinement in jail. He is also to be saved that ignominy if he is not in a state of health for that discipline. The Bill further provides for his release from the bondage if he is attacked with any infectious or contagious disease or suffers from any serious illness. The Bill in its entirety will be found elsewhere.

Sir Charles Elliott, although not an abolitionist, offered some suggestions towards reform. But he appeared on the scene too late and these could not be incorporated in the Bill but have been reserved for the next amendment of the Civil Procedure Code.

As our grave and reverend seigniors may have, between legislation and lawntennis, little leisure or disposition to stray into the paths of light literature, we venture to lay at their service an American piece. They are doubtless familiar with musty blue-books and mustier jurisconsults. The following will show how non-professional thinkers—the true men of light and leading—regard the survival of Roman barbarism :

THE PRISONER FOR DEBT.

Look on him!—through his dungeon grate

Feebly and cold, the morning light
Comes stealing round him, dim and late,

As if it loathed the sight.

Reclining on his strawy bed,

His hand upholds his drooping head,—

His bloodless cheek is seamed and hard,

Unshorn his gray, neglected beard;

And o’er his bony fingers flow

His long, dishevelled locks of snow.

No grateful fire before him glows,

And yet the winter’s breath is chill;

And o’er his half-clad person goes

The frequent ague thrill!

Silent, save ever and anon,

A sound, half murmur and half groan,

Forces apart the painful grip

Of the old sufferer’s bearded lip;

O sad and crushing is the fate

Of old age chained and desolate!

Just God ! why lies that old man there ?

A murderer shares his prison bed,
Whose eyeballs, through his horrid hair,
Gleam on him, fierce and red :

And the rude oath and heartless jeer
Fall ever on his loathing ear,

And, or in wakefulness or sleep,
Nerve, flesh, and pulses thrill and creep
Whene'er that ruffian's tossing limb,
Crimson with murder, touches him !

What has the gray-haired prisoner done ?

Has murder stained his hands with gore ?
Not so ; his crime's a fouler one ;

GOD MADE THE OLD MAN POOR !

For this he shares a felon's cell,—
The fittest earthly type of hell !
For this, the boon for which he poured
His young blood on the invader's sword,
And counted light the fearful cost,—
His blood-gained liberty is lost !

And so, for such a place of rest,
Old prisoner, dropped thy blood as rain
On Concord's field, and Bunker's crest,
And Saratoga's plain ?
Look forth, thou man of many scars,
Through thy dim dungeon's iron bars ;
It must be joy, in sooth, to see
Yon monument upreared to thee,—
Piled granite and a prison cell, —
The land repays thy service well !

Go ring the bells and fire the guns,
And fling the starry banner out ;
Shout " Freedom ! " till your lisping ones
Give back their cradle-shout ;
Let boastful eloquence declaim
Of honour, liberty, and fame ;
Still let the poet's strain be heard,
With glory for each second word,
And everything with breath agree
To praise " our glorious liberty ! "

But when the patron cannon jars,
That prison's cold and gloomy wall,
And through its grates the stripes and stars
Rise on the wind and fall, —
Think ye that prisoner's aged ear
Rejoices in the general cheer !
Think ye his dim and failing eye
Is kindled at your pageantry ?
Sorrowing of soul, and chained of limb,
What is your carnival to him ?

Down with the LAW that binds him thus !
Unworthy freemen, let it find
No refuge from the withering curse
Of God and human kind !

Open the prison's living tomb,
And usher from its brooding gloom
The victims of your savage code
To the free sun and air of God ;
No longer dare as crime to brand
The chastening of the Almighty's hand.

THE Maharaja of Mysore, during his grand Indian tour, was at Lucknow invited by a deputation of the Talooqdars, headed by Raja Rudra Pratap Sah of Dearsa, to a dinner and Natch. The young Prince thankfully declined the offer on the ground that arrangements had already been made for his immediate departure. His Highness concluded with expressing a hope that they might some day come to Mysore. The wily Dravidian ! He does not eat of their hands, but he has no objection to their eating of his—is that it ? That is the Hindu instinct, beyond question. It is enough that we preserve our own caste—we have no insuperable objection to others compromising themselves if they are so minded.

The news of the deputation we gather from the Lucknow Advocate. We wish our young contemporary had given us particulars of the banquet proposed. It would be interesting even now to know the arrangements made or contemplated. Was it to be a kutch or puka dinner ? Were the Lord of Mahishasoor and the Barons of Oudh to sit together in the same poonkti to eat ? Was there to have been any division of chowkas ? And who were to have cooked and who served ? What was the bill of fare fixed ! We hardly think an eating was seriously expected. Hence we suppose the offer was made at the last moment, when probably it was known that the Maharaja had made arrangements to leave town the following day.

HERE is a Cuttack telegram—which almost takes away our breath :—

"For Jubilee telegram from Orissa People's Association sent her gracious Majesty through Private Secretary on 18th June, at expense Rs. 262, for reply forty-two, India Government's circular of not prevent work of 18th motioned in the House of Commons for reply refund of money. Recently at residence of Baboo Denonath Banerjee, a meeting was held for prevention of killing cows. Baboo Denonath spoke as follows : ' In 1875 I memorialized Government for introduction of a detective system for checking bribery and also a separate printed memorial signed by respectable people of Cuttack, Balasore, Pooree, Khurda, Kendrapara, Jajpore, Bhudruck was submitted to Government, and I failed in both. We cannot get assistance from Government because they have sixty thousand European soldiers, and at the rate of one pound beef each, it will require eight hundred maunds which tantamount to killing five hundred cows only for that purpose daily, and it is impossible that Government will make them vegetarians. On the other hand, when the poor cannot support their old parents for want, it is impossible they will support old cows for fear of Hindu society. We shall have work practically to protect old cows.' A Committee was formed with Baboo Dwarikanath Chuckerburty president, and Rudhabinode Bose and Nalimohun Chuckerburty Secretaries."

We early conceived a respect for Baboo Deno Nath Banerjee for his courage and for some originality, and we never hesitated to express our opinion. But these are qualities which, unless tempered by discretion and modesty, are apt to be dangerous all round. We hoped he might prove a foil to powerful wrong-doers, official and private, and that he would have friends to keep his exuberance in check. But he is going on at a rattling rate. He seems emulous of being a Parnell, but Parnell is no mere firebrand nor a vulgar blustering demagogue, but a cool unimpassioned leader, with perfect self-command and the circumspection of a courtier and the subtlety and readiness of a born lawyer. This Banerjee is not likely to show the white feather at the first blush of difficulty like our patriots nearer home, and we honor him for that. But he is developing a bad form of ambition. He is playing with dangerous instruments. He might be of great use as a ventilator of genuine local grievances, but imperial politics is not his forte, and Cuttack is not the proper Head-quarters for it. If he is convinced of his mission, he should remove to the metropolis, where we could better take care of him. His vapouring in the heart of Orissa may mean nothing, but it is spoiling the boys—young and old. Worst of all, it is these that are provoking the angry reprisals of the Europeans and the official classes.

MACAULIFFE and Browne have made up their differences. After having blackguarded each other without stint in every form, they suddenly discover their mistake, apologize to one another, and agree to forgive and forget. Each has withdrawn his charges against the other. Rahiman alias Buri has also retired from her suit against Macauliffe for increased maintenance to their illegitimate children. The compromise comes rather late—for character. The whole transformation scene seems the result of external pressure. We suspect Mr. Lyall has thus saved the character of his administration by removing the dirty linen from the washtub in the street.

"THE Gipsy and his deeds"—such is the heading of a Police report in an English paper of the 16th January last. What sort of deeds were these, the reader fancies ? He doubtless thinks of typical Zincali habits and feats, but he is out in his imaginings. The deeds in question are veritable deeds in black and white—documentary proofs of title to real property. It is certainly strange to have a Gipsy in such a connection. The more so as the deeds in question are the Gipsy's not by dexterity of hand but by right of law. It is a strange Gipsy, one would think, but our modern progress has percolated in all directions and even penetrated to the depths of the social irreconcilables. There seems to have been a revolution in the Zinali clan. The typical Gipsy of former experience probably no longer exists. Here is quite a respectable Gipsy family come before the magistrate of West Ham to settle a dispute over the title-deeds of some freehold property purchased 25 years ago at Little Topham, Essex, consisting of four houses and freehold land and gardens adjoining. Their behaviour in court and entire conduct of the case, were exemplary. They were not at all litigiously inclined, there was not the slightest trace of that unnatural malice which seems to be usually generated in the disputes between near connections among the respectable classes. They seem to have resorted to the arbitrament of the magistrate as the sovereign's representative, having themselves failed to make up their differences. The law itself fell short of the morality of these poor ignorant and despised people. The court degraded an ordinary family quarrel into a disreputable case of theft. It is obvious from the circumstances that neither side in the quarrel looked upon the matter in that serious light. The father Job Hedges simply complained of the abstraction from under his pillow of his deeds by his son in league with the young fellow's wife. That is all. It was farthest from his idea to charge his son with stealing, and his wife with abetting. But the stiff British law makes no such distinctions. It is all theft and no mistake, and, if motive be wanting, motive is to be presumed. The son made an honorable defence. He had never denied his part. When his father first missed his papers and asked his sons, George (the present prisoner) said "Oh father, they are all right; go to bed." So in court he admitted having possession of the deeds and expressed his readiness to give them up, explaining the circumstances under which he came to seize them. In fact, he claimed the property, his mother having supplied the money for his benefit. The complainant admitted that part of the purchase money came from her. In the end, the prisoner's wife came into the Court with a bag containing the deeds, and those that were necessary for the complainant to draw his rents were made over to him. The whole Gipsy party then left court together like a happy family that they are.

They are Gipsies for all that. The father could not give the date or day of his loss, saying he is no scholar; he only remembered it was within a day or two of Good Friday. The most characteristic point is their mode of life. Though owning (for them) considerable house property, they are yet nomads still. They live in caravans in which they move about the country, plying their trade, the father in his and the son in another. Their calling may be inferred from the fact that the prisoner is described as a licensed hawk. Probably, to itinerant or peripatetic peddling, they add, as in our country, the practice of palmistry and other forms of fortune-telling as well as vending of charms and specifics. We are sure they are now far too good to be addicted to child-stealing.

We see that they bear Scriptural names. The father is Job and one of the sons is Jeremiah. It is satisfactory to know with this Puritan proclivity for Old Testament nomenclature, they possess a share of Puritan virtue.

These English Gypsies are probably the same as the Bedias and Nuts of India. Many of their words are Hindustani, others seem to be Turanian or Dravidian. Certainly, they come from the East, like the Jews. Like the Hebrews too, they have left permanent traces in the lands of their adoption and on the peoples among whom they have been cast. They have suffered much—more than the Jews. Despised as Heathens, suspected and repressed, they have been degraded to the lowest outlaws. They have survived the wrongs of thousands of years. And now they are a respectable people, exclusive but neither barbarous nor reprobate, with enough of the native amiability of their primeval home in the Far East.

THE Americans are go-ahead and no mistake—even in philology. Where John Bull makes a speech—or speechifies as they would rather say over the water—Cousin Jonathan "orates." In fact, they are all, all "orators" on the other side of the Atlantic. And now they have the feminine gender of the article—or rather the noun substantive. We have now reported the speech of what is termed a Yanke "bratress"—a sort of tigress of the platform apparently. She has given the coup de grace to the agitation in favour of the Bloomer uniform. Said she:—

"I reject the trousers with contempt and scorn. Men cut a sufficiently ridiculous figure in them themselves. The truth is, they don't like their own costume, and are envious of our laces, jewellery, frills, and dresses. Trousers, forsooth, trousers! Shake not the ridiculous garment at me. No; so long as we have our silks, satins, and shawls, we will repudiate your absurd bifurcated unwhisperables. Look at your swallowtailed coats, stove-pipe hats; and you wear your hair so short, some of you, that you look precious like monkeys; and I don't wonder that one of your numbers has written a book showing that animal to be the father of his race."

There! that is feminine and no mistake! Feminine with all the vengeance of Eve for her poor cat's-paw of a deluded lord! who has brought all his miseries on himself and his by tasting, in subterfuge to the policy and wishes of his fair charmer, of the forbidden fruit of the tree of knowledge (as he has always gone to school for her benefit)—on the principle, obviously, that

Forgiveness to the injured doth belong,

They never pardon who have done the wrong!

There is, in that passage, all the sweep of woman's logic and all the concentration of woman's scorn for her meek subjects! There is no mercy for friend or foe. In one short breath are dished Swinburne and Oscar Wilde, Mill and Huxley, Darwin and the Evolutionists! while the English language is enriched with a new vocable into the bargain, by way of a substitute for the weak term of male philology.

In fact, the whole is a characteristic ebullition—in humble imitation of the oratress' phrase, "precious like" woman. We are no advocates of the "bifurcated unwhisperables," and we are at one with her in her remark that men cut a sufficiently ridiculous figure in these trappings. We have always regarded them as a very unbecoming piece of wearing, wanting in grace and without even the initial recommendation of decency. Yet it must be confessed that, as between the two sexes, they are better suited to women, specially the unmarried. Perhaps they might with advantage be made the distinction of spinsterhood. But here comes a lady in a great rage to reject them in toto with contempt and scorn. Be it so! The lady is alarmed at the prospect of her sex being compelled to abandon all their glorious gewgaws in favor of all the hideousness of male apparel in the West. What lady of spirit will consent to share the livery of waiters! But the adoption of trousers does not necessarily mean the adoption of the tailcoat or the chimney pot, or the denial of silks and laces and necklaces and bracelets and brooches. The innovation may be restricted to the nether garments, and even there restricted to the form. These may be of silk, if preferred. Before the oratress' next appearance on the platform, she should make for herself a pair of Benares cloth of gold loose drawers or Agra silk gooloadan close-fitting pyjamas, and try herself in them before the glass. The genius of Ind may yet reconcile her to the hated unwhisperables. The earth—of Asia—hath its secrets as the sea hath, undreamed of in the West.

THERE is an old Bengali story—not more veracious than inter-racial jokes usually are—of an Ooriah Raja having utilised a present of a pair of gold-embroidered slippers, for a head-dress. We are reminded of it by the use which the Sultan of Morocco has found for the bicycle presented him about a couple of years ago by France. During His Majesty's late illness, the Harem had been a scene of confusion from the quarrels and conflicts of the Begums. On his recovery, the Sultan enquired into the matter and proceeded to pass sentence on the offenders. Each was compelled to ride the infernal machine of the Nazarene through the grounds of the Seraglio and to repeat the process according to the guilt of the condemned. Some of the older wives who had offended most had, in consequence, more than a dozen falls.

Holloway's Pills and Ointment.—Some occupations tend to the development of certain diseases, and those who toil as miners are peculiarly liable to rheumatism, lumbago, and other allied complaints. In the goldfields and copper mines Holloway's remedies have been largely patronized by the workers to their very great advantage, and they can be confidently recommended as invaluable remedies for inward congestions, spasms and cramps in the bowels, and all those conditions of the lungs and liver to which those who work underground or in impure atmospheres are so peculiarly liable. For cuts, bruises, sprains and stiffened joints, the action of Holloway's Ointment is eminently healing and soothing, and a supply should always be at hand in case of need.

REIS & RAYYET.

SATURDAY, MARCH 3, 1888.

ZEMINDARI ZOOLUM.

THE Englishman wrote on the 23rd February :—

"One of the ablest native papers in India, Reis and Rayyet, has a long article in a recent issue on 'Zemindari Zoolum,' and denounces a zemindar in the district of Howrah because he sues his tenants by hundreds as every kist falls due. We are not concerned to defend the zemindar, who is no doubt well able to take care of himself; but the local judicial officers also come in for a share of the writer's wrath. It is said that the unscrupulousness of the landlord is rendered possible by their carelessness and indifference. But a Munsiff is bound to accept a tenant's deposit of rent, and before he can set off the deposit in a suit for arrears of rent brought by the landlord, he must be satisfied that the tenant, before depositing, actually tendered his rent at the village Cutcherry. This evidence is required absolutely by the law, and yet, because the Munsiffs will not suffer the law to be a dead letter, they are called 'Howrah Gamatiels,' 'sapient and inexorable Judges,' and otherwise alluded to in terms of reprobation. The fact is that, when there is a long-standing dispute or bad blood between a zemindar and his tenants, the latter never go through the necessary preliminary of tendering their rents, but rush at once and deposit them in the Civil Court. The zemindar is then bound to sue within a certain time, or he may lose his rent altogether. If a hundred tenants combine and deposit their rents, the unfortunate landlord has no option but to file a hundred suits. Of course both parties are put to additional expense and annoyance by these proceedings, but there can be no doubt that the rayyets are often to blame. Zemindars' agents do not find it such an easy job to collect their rents that they will refuse to receive them when tendered. The writer shows himself to be a veritable partisan when he finds fault with the Courts for decreeing claims, though the landlord's plaint has been instituted before the deposit was made. A sifting inquiry is asked for, and a suggestion is made that the zemindar should be prosecuted. 'Averse as we constitutionally are,' says the writer, 'to see civil proceedings terminate criminally, there are cases in which we feel bound to surrender our feelings.' We should like to hear the other side of the question before condemning 'these luminaries of the law.'"

By all means let the other side be told, though we doubt whether there is anything remaining after the special demurrer urged in behalf of both the landlord and the Court. We must protest against imputation of partizanship, however. It is a strange charge to come from the Englishman which has not often any tears to spare for the sorrows of either Baboo Zemindars or Baboo Judges. Shall we retort,

All looks yellow to the jaundiced eye?

We had imagined that by this our conduct at several trying junctures had placed us, in the opinion of all candid observers, above such a reproach. We owe allegiance to no clique or party or class, nor do we appeal to the passions of the mob of readers, native or European. Our information may be defective, though we take pains to secure accuracy; our opinions may be wrong, but they are honestly formed. Hence we are always open to correction and always prepared to make honorable amends to those whom we may happen unwittingly to wrong. Even so in the present case. Zeal may have colored the language of the article, but Reis and Rayyet has no interest in the matter but that of truth and justice, and we believe the article is not fairly chargeable with unworthy treatment of the question. Have we tried to take the objective by storm? Have we relied on one-sided statement or mere plausibility of reasoning? Having said our say, we have called for an inquiry by Government—a sifting inquiry—no perfunctory report. Our contemporary, to do it justice, admits this. Yet, strangely enough, it does not see how its suggestion of partizanship is negated by the fact.

We are not habitually hostile to the Zemindari interest. A long course of study and observation has taught us to regard the Permanent Settlement as one of the dearest institutions in the present stage of our political and social evolution. During the long controversy on the Bengal Rent Bill, without partizanship, and without boring the public every week with everlasting discussion, we gave unwavering support to all the legitimate claims and just grievances of the landlords. And we did so without fee, declining handsome offers. We have no wish to pose as virtuous overmuch, and do not pretend to judge those who received more or less adequate honorariums for in some cases splendid, and in all excellent, service. We only mention the fact.

Nor do we bear any grudge to individual Zemindars in our neighbourhood or elsewhere. It is not many years since, a brother of the present Zemindar whose doings are under notice, having been in trouble with his tenantry in the neighbourhood of the present petitioners, was denounced by Government. In fact, the whole family in all its branches has a bad notoriety which may prevent fairplay towards any stray member of the clan who may happen to be decent-lived. On that occasion, however, as so^{oai} expense we were convinced that, in the particular matter at any rate, the Zemindar had been more sinned against than sinning, we came forward in his defence and succeeded in saving him.

As for the warmth of our language, we have no reason to be ashamed of it. Believing in the facts, what other language was it possible for us to use? How in the face of such an oppression could a writer be more tame? It is all very well for a foreigner to measure words, but a son of the soil who hears with his own ear, in his own vernacular, a tale of persecution of a village extending through eighteen long years, may be pardoned a lapse towards the weakness of humanity. If there has been any indication of it, however, it has been cured by the unmistakable call for inquiry.

The friends of the munsiffs who have put up the Englishman have hardly been well-advised. The Englishman itself has called for the other side of the matter before condemning the "luminaries of the law." But we have been waiting ever since the 23rd February without seeing any particular vindication. How long is our contemporary prepared to wait for it, before joining in the chorus? The press ought not to be employed lightly, either for allegation or contradiction. And then the said friends or satellites of luminaries ought to know that a newspaper in attack does not spend all its resources or use all its armoury of facts. Verb. sap.

Our contemporary shows extraordinary simplicity. "No doubt," we are told, "the rayyets are often to blame." Perhaps, but can the writer be ignorant that there are Zemindars who make a business of harrassing their tenantry? And does he not know even his own friends? The writer goes on—"Zemindars' agents do not find it such an easy job to collect their rents that they will refuse to receive them when tendered." We will not call it a veritable partizan argument, but it is an orthodox Zemindary view. It may be true in many cases, it may be true even in most. Still there remains room for considerable exception. Half the everlasting tenant difficulty in Bengal would be over if tenants did not combine to resist, or if landlords obstinately did not refuse any relations with the tenantry except through the Courts. It is the existence of such Zemindars that has introduced into the law the provision which permits tenants to deposit rent in Court. The Englishman cannot believe that Zemindars' agents will refuse rent when tendered. Yet it is the notorious practice of certain Zemindars not to receive rent. They would be glad to receive it at their demand, certainly, but not at the old or established rate. It is the harrassment to which the tenants are subjected by the refusal that finally breaks the back of resistance to extravagant demands and reduces them to terms. It is a policy resorted to for the particular purpose. That policy is to pound the tenants into a pulp by litigation. These Zemindars do not hope to win their cases—not at all; their boast is to bring the victims to terms by very failure. "Another such victory," cried Pyrrhus after the battle of the Liris, "another such victory and I am undone!" So in the case of the poor Bengal rayyets. They cannot stand the strain of a constant succession of even decrees in their favor. When crotchety or partial judicial officers officiously convert the tenants' decrees into the landlords', Heaven save the poor! for man is leagued to humble them to the dust.

Whatever the strict merits of the quarrel, we are proud of these poor ignorant rayyetry, who have maintained this unequal contest against the most noted Zemindary family in Bengal whose example has gone far to keep up agrarian difficulties in the country. Some of them wearied of the struggle have abandoned the village, a few only have submitted in meekness to the landlord's terms, but the majority still hold out. It is these poor men, not the perspiring and vapouring Baboos, who form the true people of Bengal. They will constitute the base of the national structure of the future. They have done their part and it is now for the public and Government to do theirs. For eighteen years they have maintained their rights against every obstacle. It is time enough for Providence to come to the rescue of those that have so nobly helped themselves. Of course Province works no special miracle in each case but acts through human agencies. Let the public and the Government be those blessed instruments.

THE HINDU MARRIAGE SEASON.

THE Indian Daily News has a "local" headed "The Bengalee Marriage Season" introduced with the statement that this month, Falgun 1294 B. S., is very auspicious for the Bengalee Hindus—as if the Bengali Hindus formed a sect by themselves with an astronomy and astrology to themselves—and that the month was peculiarly propitious to them. The secret is disclosed at the end that our contemporary has adopted the communication of a correspondent with all its peculiarities of thought and expression. It is true that this is the marriage-season, that many unions have taken place in Falgun and many more are expected in Baisakh—the month after next—as after it for a period of two years the season will not be auspicious for Hindu marriage. The writer notices two marriages among the respectable Banias in town and two in Kayastha families. The nephews of the Bania Baboo Sreenath Dutt were wedded to daughters of, speaking roundly, Messrs. Bissonath Law & Co. On Tuesday, the daughter of Baboo Guru Prosunno Ghose, youngest son of the late Baboo Sibnarain Ghose, was married to a son of Baboo Nundolal Bose of Bag Bazar. Besides the usual presents to neighbours and friends and acquaintances throughout town, issued on the occasion by both families, the Boses gave a Nautch on the evening of Saturday. On Tuesday evening, the party moved slowly in regular procession of lights and silver sticks, and music, before the bridegroom seated on an illuminated throne on the shoulders of liveried chairmen, followed by a large number of friends in fine equipages and other guests in hired conveyances of the second and third classes, the Derbyshire band from Dum-Dum footing it all the way playing. Baboo Guru Prosunno, who with his intimate friends and relations received all his guests at the door, welcomed the wedding party at his entrance in the street. The bridegroom descended from his chair of state and was conducted to the cushion of state of rich gold-embroidered silk velvet ready for him in the court—no longer open—of the public male apartments in front of the domestic chapel. The dress was not quite a success. The everlasting choga of our own introduction is not suited to such occasions. The old jama is the thing for such ceremonies and it ought not to be enveloped within a night-gown. Jewellery, of the female kind in especial, is at best a barbarity, which ought to be definitively discarded. At any rate, the bazon sits awkwardly on the rounded sleeve of the loose flowing cloak. It was also a mistake in art to fix the musnud at the left side of the enclosure in the quadrangle. The question is governed by Hindu prejudice, or else its proper position, was in the centre near the entrance, with the back to the beautiful hall of worship. It was interesting to see the soft-featured handsome Bengali boy step into the royal seat and sit on his knees in true Durbar style, reminding one of Oriental court life and of the days when our people ruled or administered provinces and kingdoms. The two little pages in blue gowns began plying silver handled yak tails, as the European band in scarlet filed in front round the enclosure. The bridegroom in kincobs and jewels on embroidered silk cushion attended by military music, is nothing extraordinary in marriages in high life in Calcutta, but it is the disposition that brings out the full effect, and many costly wedding assemblies fail of impression for want of a proper place. It is not every wealthy family that is the fortunate owner of such a fine mansion so easily lending itself to scenic effect. Perhaps, the distinction of this marriage is in the union between two of the greatest and best houses, literally speaking. The Boses of Bagbazar's residence is an immense and imposing pile designed and constructed by a famous Bengali engineer, while the Ghoses' is an elegant structure lifted up to the skies above the heads of all the houses in Calcutta. The architect of the latter was evidently cramped for space, but this very necessity, while it limited the proportions of the open quadrangle which is a sine quanon of Hindu domestic architecture, has proved its great advantage in the way of internal embellishment and effect on ceremonial occasions. There is here no sense of long straggling barracks on all sides as in many of the larger mansions of our wealthy. With a canvas cover the court is converted into a roomy saloon surrounded by a double-storeyed colonnaded galleries on three sides, with the well-arched hall of public worship of polished stucco reposing in chaste beauty on all the fourth. Leaving a broad margin for walking and communication, the centre of the floor is railed off into an enclosure for an assembly-room or place for dancing, for squatting upon in Oriental fashion or for furnishing with sofas and chairs if necessary, the railing surmounted by figures holding branches of numerous glass globes for gas illumination. The gas of course pales the candle lights of the chandeliers in the chapel and in the galleries, but gas within doors is always a nuisance and as the supply is not always certain, it is never prudent to dispense with ordinary means of illumination. The above will, we hope, give Europeans and readers at a distance an idea of our marriage pageants as well as of the points and peculiarities of the architecture of native homes and might afford our own people some hints for future conduct.

We must not, however, forget another union next day nearer home—in our house we may say—between the younger of the two sons of the late lamented Baboo Dwarkanath Mitter (Judge of the High Court) and a daughter of Baboo Devendra Dutt (son of Baboo Rajender Dutt) of the Wellington Square family. There were the usual features of native marriages in the shape of noisy music and make-believe military display of Bowbazar band and Choona Gully horsemen, their path lighted by frail candelabras of talc shades, the whole capped by the modern infliction of a battery of electric light from the top of a ticca ghara. The bridegroom was driven in a four-in-hand open chaise by the Mussulman Rarcy of Dhurmollah, who in his long cloak and tall Afghan hat belted by pugree, presented a noble spectacle and was by far the greatest attraction of the procession.

Baboo Mustafi undertook a most onerous and delicate task far beyond any unfledged graduate of Calcutta. A work like this ill-done might be a national calamity. It is no easy thing, for a foreigner specially, to eschew slang while collecting bona fide idioms and accepted colloquialisms.

* The Speaker or English idioms, colloquial forms of expression, and instructive proverbs from the writings of the best modern authors, rendered into idiomatic Bengali, teaching how to carry on conversation. By Manmatha Mustafi, B. A. Calcutta, 1888.

This compiler has done so. He has evidently relied on the best authorities.

A more dangerous part of his functions was the rendering the English into Bengali.

Here he was quite at sea without chart or compass. The whole ground is uncertain and debatable every inch of it. Under the circumstances, he deserves credit for the success he has achieved in this first venture. The difficulty of the author was intensified by the virtual abolition of the Bengali language by the Pandits and their successors, the improvers of the language of the people. The author improves wonderfully as he proceeds. The book will be a great help to schoolboys and students, whose seniors themselves might consult it with advantage.

The proverbs are the least successful part of the collection. To begin with, they are not proverbs, most of them, but inane remarks which are not even truisms. For they have not always the merit of truth. Such is the maxim that disfigures the head of the title-page. It is true and not true.

SAPADAPI, SARADAPI.

Reply to Query.

I notice a query put forth in your issue of the 11th instant, by a correspondent who has subscribed himself "K." as to who the goddesses Sapá and Sará are, in the saying "Sápádevi, Sarádevi." Your correspondent is not apparently aware that the expression is not "Sápádevi, Sarádevi," as he has erroneously put it, but is "Sápádapi, Sarádapi" (Sápát+api and Sarát+api) i. e., "Even by curses and by arrows—both." The passage originally is the concluding portion of a śloka, by which a Brahman hero (either Parasuram or Dronachárya, I forget which) challenges his antagonist and tells him that he has the power to destroy the latter both by a curse being a Brahman saint and by an arrow, being a warrior :—

"Agratome bacho bahni,
Prishthatah sasaram dhanuh,
Ubhábhyancha samartho (a) ham,
Sápádapi Sarádapi."

In my mouth is the fire of speech, on my back is the bow with arrows, I am powerful (enough to destroy you) by both—by a curse, as well as, by an arrow.

So "Sápádapi Srádapi" should, in my humble opinion, be applied only to a case in which the speaker wishes to illustrate the fact, and to impress upon the person whom he addresses, that the former is strong enough to defeat or destroy the latter in every way, i. e., under all circumstances. The saying is not however used in this sense nor in the one in which your correspondent says that it is done. In ordinary conversation, in Bengali, as you yourself cannot but be aware, the expression almost invariably signifies "cursing and abusing."

Just so. Our Correspondent ought more often to come forward. He is in a rich and virgin field.—Ed. R. & R.

A WARNING TO THE WIDOWER IN DECLINING AGE.

SIR,—As most of the Bengali Hindus, with slight pretensions to Western culture, unfortunately becoming a widower in the vale of years, talk of matrimony and sometimes enter into it so late in life, I think, Mr. Editor, the following translation, from a Zend book of a well-known author—Sadi-i-Shirazi—might open the eyes, at least, of some of your sensible readers, who may have to decide the question for themselves. Sometime ago, an old educationist, verily an octogenarian, simply for the satisfaction of a mania, got himself yoked to a tender girl of 12. Woe to the parents that could so ruthlessly sacrifice their daughter for the sake of lucre! woe to the match-makers and go-betweenes that could bring about such an unhallowed union for the sake of undue favors! Are there no thunders in Heaven to visit these monsters? Will not the retributive justice of God overtake them? Can human depravity go further? Will not society imprecate curses on those who took active part in the wedding?

"An old man, telling a story about himself said, 'When I married a young virgin I bedecked a chamber with flowers, sat with her alone, and had fixed my eyes and heart solely upon her. Many long nights I passed without sleep, repeating jests and pleasantries to remove shyness and make her familiar. On one of those nights I said "Fortune has been propitious to you, in that you have fallen into the society of an old man of mature judgment, who has seen the world and experienced various situations of good and bad fortune, who knows the rights of society and has performed the duties of friendship, one who is affectionate, affable, cheerful and conversable. I will exert my utmost endeavours to gain your affection, and if you should treat me unkindly, I will not be offended; or, if like the parrot, your food should be sugar, I will devote my sweet life to your support. You have not met with a youth of rude disposition, with a weak understanding, headstrong, a gadder, who would be constantly changing his situations and inclinations, sleeping every night in a new place and every day forming some new intimacy. Young men may be lively and handsome, but they are, as a rule, inconstant in their attachments. Look not for fidelity from those, who with the eyes of the nightingale, are, every instant, singing upon a different rose bush. But old men pass their time in wisdom and good manners, not in the ignorance and frivolity of youth. Seek for one better than yourself and having found him, consider yourself fortunate; with one, like yourself, you would pass your life without improvement."

"He said, 'I spoke a great deal after this manner, and thought that I had made a conquest of her heart, when all of a sudden, she fetched a cold sigh from the bottom of her heart and replied :— "All the fine speeches that you have been uttering, have not so much weight in the scale of my reason, as one single sentence which I heard from my nurse, that, if you plant an arrow in the side of a young woman, it is not so painful as the society of an old man." In short, (continued he), it was impossible to agree, and our differences ended in separation. After the time prescribed by law, she married a young man of impetuous temper, ill-natured and in indigent circumstances; so that she suffered the injuries of violence with evils of penury. However, she returned thanks for her lot and said "God be praised that I escaped from the internal torment and have obtained this permanent blessing. Amidst all this violence and impetuosity of temper, I will put up with your airs, because you are handsome and young. It is better to burn with you in hell than to be in paradise with the other (old man). The scent of onions from a beautiful mouth is more fragrant than the odour of the rose from the hand of one who is ugly.""

Notwithstanding the frailties, imbecility, and other concomitant defects of old age as described above, when an unquestionably beautiful and delicate girl of 12 years is forcibly married by her parent, for the sake of a few hundred rupees, to a dark gloomy constellation, having a hideous mouth, emitting constantly offensive smells, her internal torture in having thus fallen into the constant company of such a horrid creature, can be better imagined than described. She would be daily in her agonies, invoking the curses of Heaven both upon herself, upon the cruel parents, upon the husband, and lastly upon the match-makers for this unhappy union.

THE CONFIDENTIAL CIRCULAR.

(First published by the "Sunjibani.")

From—J. C. Veasey, Esq., Inspector-General of Police, L. P.

To—All District Superintendents of Police.

(Through Magistrates and Deputy Commissioners.)

Dated Calcutta, the 13th December 1887.

A recent occurrence having shown a lamentable failure on the part of the Police in the discharge of their duties as an Intelligence Department, and it being considered necessary that the scope of their responsibilities in this respect should be defined and extended, the following instructions are now issued :—

2. Sub-Inspectors in charge of stations will, in future, submit weekly to the District Superintendent a confidential report on such of the undermentioned subjects as may be indicated by that officer, who is to vary them as he may think expedient with reference to the circumstances of the District concerned, and to his estimate of the capacity and trustworthiness of the subordinate in question. The information communicated is to be obtained from all available sources, the authority being mentioned whenever possible, and officers should be encouraged to report freely everything, however apparently trivial, that can have a possible political significance.

3. The District Superintendent, and in the case of Railway Police, the Assistant Inspector-General will extract from the reports all that he thinks worthy of notice, and submit the same in translation, combined with information gathered from other sources and explanatory notes, when necessary, in a weekly confidential diary, through the Magistrate of the District, or in the case of railways, to the Inspector-General direct.

4. This diary, which is to be in half margin and in the District Superintendent's own handwriting, will be submitted every Saturday after working hours, will be treated as a confidential communication, and will not be sent into the office. The cover containing it must be marked 'D. O., and the District Magistrate will be instructed to send it by the next post direct to this office, after perusal, marking the cover "Confidential Special Branch," and not to return it to the District Superintendent.

5. The diary will be written up from day to day, and each paragraph will bear a weekly serial number. Officers receiving and forwarding diaries will enter in them any action they have taken, or intend to take, regarding any matter mentioned in them, and will sign such diaries and enter the date on which they forward them.

6. District Superintendents must understand that for these orders to have the desired result, the cordial co-operation and interest of all officers in the chain of correspondence is absolutely necessary. They must not, therefore, content themselves with merely passing on reports as received, but must comment fully on them, adding all such information as they may be able to obtain from independent observation and inquiry, and Sub-Inspectors should invariably have it impressed upon them that the collection of information for the weekly report is by no means the least important part of their duties, and that aptitude for this kind of work will recommend them for advancement.

7. List of Subjects to be reported upon.

(a) All political movements, sects, leaders, publications, and the like.

(b) Information regarding religious sects, changes in doctrine and practice having a political significance, propagandism.

(c) The arrival, sojourn, departure, and proceedings generally of suspicious characters and foreigners, special attention being paid to possible foreign emissaries and to the movements of wandering gangs of criminals, the presence in any place of noted criminals, and any circumstance regarding their habits that may come to notice.

(d) Rumours or published opinions disturbing the public peace; popular feelings and rumours.

(e) Religious excitement; comments on laws and Government measures.

(f) Illicit trade in arms and ammunition with special reference to any prosecution under the Arms Act for smuggling, and to any discoveries of concealed arms.

(g) Affairs in independent or semi-independent Native States, and rumours regarding them.

(h) Constitution, objects, and proceedings of native societies whether established for political or ostensibly for other objects.

(i) Political or mass-meetings: their origin, organization, and result as to public feeling in the neighbourhood selected with especial reference to any tendency towards, or probability of agrarian excitement.

(j) Recruiting for the Indian Army or for Native States.

ABOLITION OF IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.

A Bill to amend the law relating to Imprisonment for Debt.

Whereas it is expedient to amend the law relating to imprisonment for debt; It is hereby enacted as follows:—

1. (1) This Act may be called the Debtors Act, 1888; and

(2) It shall come into force at once.

(3) The several portions thereof have the same local extent as the enactments to which they respectively relate.

2. After section 245 of the Code of Civil Procedure the following sections shall be inserted, namely:—

“245A. Notwithstanding anything in the last foregoing section or in any other section of this Code, the Court shall not order the arrest of imprisonment of a woman in execution of a decree for money.

“245B. (1) Notwithstanding anything in section 245 or in any other section of this Code, when an application is for the execution of a decree for money by the arrest and imprisonment of a judgment-debtor who is liable to be arrested in pursuance of the application, the Court may, instead of issuing a warrant for his arrest, issue a notice calling upon him to appear before the Court on a day to be specified in the notice and show cause why he should not be committed to jail in execution of the decree.

“(2) If appearance is not made in obedience to the notice, the Court shall, if the decree-holder so requires, issue a warrant for the arrest of the judgment-debtor.”

3. In section 250 of the said Code, between the word “shall” and the word “issue,” the following shall be inserted, namely:—

“subject to the provisions of sections 245A and 245B.”

4. After section 337 of the said Code the following shall be inserted, namely:—

“337A. (1) When a judgment-debtor appears before the Court in obedience to a notice issued under section 245B, or is brought before the Court after being arrested in execution of a decree for money, and it appears to the Court that the judgment-debtor is unable from poverty or other sufficient cause to pay the amount of the decree or, if that amount is payable by instalments, the amount of any instalment thereof, the Court may, upon such terms, if any, as it thinks fit, make an order disallowing the application for his arrest and imprisonment, or directing his release, as the case may be.

“(2) Before making an order under sub-section (1), the Court may take into consideration any allegation of the decreeholder touching any of the following matters, namely:—

(a) the decree being for a sum for which the judgment-debtor was bound as a trustee or as acting in any other fiduciary capacity to account;

(b) the transfer, concealment or removal by the judgment-debtor of any part of his property after the date of the institution of the suit in which the decree was made, or the commission by him after that date of any other act of bad faith in relation to his property, with the object or effect of obstructing or delaying the decreeholder in the execution of the decree;

(c) any undue or unreasonable preference given by the judgment-debtor to any of his other creditors;

(d) his refusal or neglect to pay the amount of the decree or some part thereof when he has or since the date of the decree has had the means of paying it;

(e) the likelihood of his absconding or leaving the jurisdiction of the Court with the object or effect mentioned in clause (b) of this sub-section.

(3) While any of the matters mentioned in sub-section (2) are being considered, the Court may in its discretion order the judgment-debtor to be imprisoned, or leave him in the custody of an officer of the Court, or release him on his furnishing sufficient security for his appearance on the requisition of the Court.

“(4) A judgment-debtor released under this section may be re-arrested.

“(5) If the Court does not make such an order as is mentioned in sub-section (1), it shall cause the judgment-debtor to be arrested if he has not already been arrested and, subject to the other provisions of this Code, commit him to jail.”

5. To section 380 of the said Code the following shall be added, namely:—

“On the application of any defendant in a suit for money in which the plaintiff is a woman the Court may at any stage of the suit make a like order if it is satisfied that such plaintiff does not possess any sufficient immoveable property within British India independent of the property in suit.”

6. In section 640 of the said Code, after the words “from arrest in execution of civil process” the words “in any case in which the arrest of women is not prohibited by this Code” shall be added.

7. In section 642 of the said Code, for the words and figures “except as provided in sections 256 and 643” the following shall be substituted, namely:—

“except as provided in section 337A, sub-section (5), and sections 256 and 643.”

8. After section 652 of the said Code the following shall be added, namely:—

“653. (1) At any time after a warrant of arrest has been issued under this Code, the Court may cancel it on the ground of the serious illness of the person against whom the warrant was issued.

“(2) When a judgment-debtor has been arrested under this Code the Court may release him if in its opinion he is not in a fit state of health to undergo imprisonment.

“(3) When a judgment-debtor has been committed to jail, he may be released therefrom—

(a) by the Local Government, on the ground of his suffering from any infectious or contagious disease, or

(b) by the committing Court, or any Court to which that Court is subordinate, on the ground of his suffering from any serious illness.

“(4) A judgment-debtor released under this section may be re-arrested, but the period of his imprisonment shall not in the aggregate exceed that prescribed in section 342 or section 481, as the case may be.”

9. The last sixteen words of section 8 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1874, and the whole of section 31 of the Ajmere Courts Regulation, 1877, are hereby repealed.

10. (1) For the first fifty-five words of section 48 of the Act of the Governor of Fort St. George in Council, No. VIII of 1865, the following shall be substituted, namely:—

“No person shall be imprisoned as a defaulter for a longer period than six months whatever the amount of the arrears may be, nor for a longer period than six weeks if the arrears do not exceed fifty rupees.”

(2) For the proviso to section 163 of the North-Western Provinces Rent Act, 1881, the following shall be substituted, namely:—

“Provided that the time for which a debtor may be confined in execution of a decree under this Act shall not exceed six weeks when the amount decreed (exclusive of costs) does not exceed fifty rupees, or six months in any other case.”

OPINION OF THE PRESS.

.....this interesting book. We are justified in so terming it, not on account of any romantic adventures that the author has to relate, nor of any very new discoveries in geography or natural history. There is something particular as regards ethnology; and a great deal of human nature in the book, shown to the reader with a simplicity and candour which bear testimony to its truth. Called from the busy haunts of men in the city to dwell for a time in Independent Tipperah as a judicious adviser to its Chief, Doctor Mookerjee relates his adventures during the several journeys to and fro in that capacity, without revealing the secrets of the State, like a good diplomatist. He has adhered strictly to the advice which he offers to his brethren of the Native Press, and has written what he saw and knows, without revealing all, considering what he might properly say and what withhold..... The above seems to be a curious passage to be found in a book of travels, and appears to have no connection with the subject. But it arises from a casual reference to a slaughter house, and a writer who "thundered weekly against the outrage of locating shambles in the immediate vicinity of a Hindoo temple"—where, in fact, no temple could be said to exist. Hence, the Doctor advises his fellow-scribes not to be Pharisees, righteous overmuch, but to look and be sure of their facts. In the same spirit, he has written his book. He gives an account of his travels, which seem often to have been voyages, upon the wide-spreading rivers of Eastern Bengal which in the rains become almost inland seas. On these he philosophises on the nature of the country and the people, making careful observation of his facts; and though he sometimes fancies he knows better than his boatmen, and more than suspects that they are getting the better of him, he submits with a grace that would have done credit to Socrates, and accepts the apparently inevitable in the interests of peace. The Doctor is a close observer of nature, animate and inanimate, with an eye to the picturesque as well as to the sublime and beautiful. And although there is a vein of cynicism running through many of his observations, it is tempered by such evasive, good nature, that even a stranger would conceive him to be a laughter-loving rather than a stern philosopher. This is evident in his descriptions of his boatmen and others, while he denounces the lawlessness which has made the poor fishermen suspicious even of honest intentions, because they have so long been the helpless victims of marauders stronger than themselves. Their only defence is flight or deceit, and the latter is their justification as a mode of self-protection. We are shown not only the weakness of the people, but the shortcomings of the administration that leave these things possible..... The author is impartial in his censures..... There is much in the book to which space forbids us to refer. That it is not a prosy one may be gathered from the fact that, for its 300 pages, there are nearly as many index references. Many of the subjects are necessarily but lightly treated, but all sensibly and fairly. And Dr. Mookerjee is such a master of the English language that in the whole book we have scarcely found a phrase that might not have been written by an Englishman "to the manor born." There is nothing in it at which any one could reasonably take offence; and there is much from which both Englishmen and natives may learn greatly-needed lessons.—The Indian Daily News, Nov. 22, 1887.

"TRAVELS IN BENGAL. Such is the title of a most interesting little work published a short time ago. Its author is Babu Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee, the well-known Editor of the Reis and Rayyet, the most original, cleverly-written and interesting journal in India. Babu Sambhu Chunder is one of the veteran Indian writers in English. He is the master of a most happy, racy pleasant style, which you can easily make out from amongst the writings of a hundred different men. In racy humorous writing Babu Sambhu Chunder has no rival among his Indian contemporaries. He won his first laurels, we believe, by his writings in his own periodical, the Mookerjee's Magazine, now long-defunct. In this magazine articles of great learning and excellence appeared, mostly from the pen of Babu Sambhu Chunder. He has written several other booklets. His Causes of the Mutiny; Mr. Wilson, Lord Canning and the Income Tax; the Career of an Indian Princess, Her Highness the late Secundra Begum of Bhopal; and the Prince in India and to India are publications which attracted considerable notice. His latest production "Travels in Bengal" is a work of great merit. It is at once a most faithful and interesting picture of natural scenery and life in Bengal, although Mr. Mookerjee does not profess to write a picture of Bengal life and uses his pencil in its portraiture only in passing. The dedication is characteristic. [Extract.]

The "Travels" are travels in East Bengal, travels and voyages between Calcutta and Independent Tepperah. We do not believe many people in this side of India know that there is such an independent State as Tipperah. But nevertheless such a state exists. We will give here a summary of its history in the words of Mr. Mookerjee—He writes:—[Extract.] Mr. Mookerjee was Dewan of Independent Tipperah for some five years in all between 1877 and 1881. The travels are an account of his voyages to and from Tipperah.

Those who have travelled in Bengal, particularly in its Eastern districts, which are the districts described in Mookerjee's book, will bear him out in his statement that Lower Bengal is not stale, flat and unprofitable, that, on the contrary, she is the beautifullest country in the world. She has no high mountains, but she has rivers apparently as vast as the sea, to make her scenery grand and majestic. She has a hundred rivers ever overflowing with water, thousands of transparent lakes, covered with the lily and a hundred beautiful water-flowers, thousands of seas of ever-waving paddy fields, thousands of clusters of bamboo and of great trees dressed in beautiful creepers adorning the river banks, to make her the loveliest country in the world. Even a Bengali needs to see and travel Bengal to adequately know her thousand witching charms. For a foreigner it is well nigh impossible to get even an approximate idea of her, if they are like from description, however faithful. Let us hear what our author has to say on the subject. We read:—[Extract.] "The Bay sea is thus inimitably described:—[Extract.]

We will quote a passage of another character:—[Extract.]

We could cull many such gems. But space forbids it. We will, however, quote some passages of another kind. Our traveller, though old in years, is evidently young in heart, for no one in the romantic age of youth could be more appreciative of female charms than our traveller. In every other page you find our author describing in terms of enthusiasm some rural girl or woman of beauty. [Extract.] In the next page we find our traveller's attention [Extract.]

There is the description, physical and moral, of a Colonel, which we cannot resist the temptation of reproducing, although the article has already exceeded the usual length. [Extract.]

We have now given extracts enough to show that the little book of travels is most delightful reading. It contains graphic descriptions of natural scenery, faithful portraiture of men and manners, and happy, good humoured observations on them. There is not an ill-natured or unkind word in the whole book—it overflows in every page with the milk of human kindness. Every observation testifies to the author being a keen observer of men and things, as an example of which we can mention the instructive and interesting chapter on the Native Christians of Portuguese extraction in Tipperah. Again, although the book does not pretend to deal with life in Bengal, the glimpses of that life we find in it are very considerable and pleasant. We will now conclude by recommending the book to all who may wish to spend a few hours amidst happy thoughts and pleasant pictures.—

S. K. C.

The Tribune, Nov. 26, 1887.

If we have not before noticed Mr. Sambhu C. Mookerjee's Travels in Bengal, which was published some months ago, it is not because the little book is either dull or pointless. It contains, on the contrary, much interesting matter, though some of the incidents are over-weighted with detail in what is facetiously called a "little booklet." The author's view as a rule is, by the way, facetious: he is given even to punning; but he is also sentimental in the highest degree—"a naked Whiteman" hurts his susceptibilities; a Hindu girl, bathing in the river, throws him into an ecstasy of delight: "she had such large languishing eyes!" But he is nothing if not philosophical, and his reflections on this or that social and political subject are not without their moral. Mr. Sambhu C. Mookerjee was formerly Minister to the "last of the Nawabs Nazim of Bengal, Behar and Orissa" and afterwards Minister of the Maharaja of Tipperah. He is a man, therefore, of experience, and when he speaks his brethren should listen to him.... Travels in Bengal is a readable book, and it abounds in anecdotes which are often as instructive as amusing, and it is not spoiled by too many political allusions, though, of course, some few have crept in.—The Pioneer, Dec. 1887.

It may be well-known to all of our readers that Babu Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee the veteran editor of the Reis and Rayyet newspaper, has just published a book describing the four voyages that he made between Calcutta and Independent Tipperah when he had to go and to return from the latter place in the capacity of the minister to its prince. The literature yet produced in the English tongue by our own countrymen is very scanty and any sensible addition to it cannot well escape the attention of the public press. Much greater therefore should be the attention claimed on behalf of a book which comes from the pen of so well-known a writer in the field of Indian journalism as Babu Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee. That gentleman's career as a writer fills nearly the last thirty years, and there has hardly been any subject of public importance during that long period which has not occupied his attention. Master of an inimitable racy style, with a vast store of classical allusions ever ready at the call, and possessing an infinite fund of humour, our author often enlivens every thing that he touches, and his peculiar strength lies in description. We therefore welcome the appearance of this book more especially as the subject is one which to make it interesting, requires a lively colouring and a rich, picturesque and imaginative description. There exist several books of travels written by eminent Englishmen, and every one of these differs perhaps, in their conception and plan of execution. Of these none was more widely read in the course of the last few years than Carlyle's reminiscences of an Irish Journey in 1849. That book is made up of extracts from diaries and the worst features of it are the bitter and caustic personal remarks interspersed throughout the book. However that may suit the polished and fashionable taste of England, in our country it would have been singularly out of place and we are glad that Babu Sambhu Chunder has confined himself to the description of those natural sceneries he passed through, and the means of travel in the distant and little-known regions of East Bengal. That the rivers of Bengal, with their circuitous and entangling courses do enshrine in them a deep spirit of poetry and are of sincere interest to the real man of imagination, is proved by the fact that Sir William Hunter, than whom a more accomplished man of letters never passed the best years of his life in Bengal, should have chosen the subject for his very interesting address at Oxford, the other day. The gentle waves, the gentler ripples, the grassy banks, the ever-entwining courses, the pleasant air, the sceneries on both sides make the rivers of Bengal a genuine thing of interest to those whose eyes are perpetually fed by the artificial gloss and dross of civilization and few could have set perhaps the loveliness of our rivers in better light than our accomplished author. His eloquent sentences, marching in regular order one after another, and embodying in their selves, every minute detail, that can lend to a scene its finest artistic effect, seem to place the reader in the very midst of sceneries described, and the man of leisure who would acquaint himself with the state of things in East Bengal, can hardly resort to a better book. The journeys which are described in this volume are certainly unevenful and though they correspond to facts as they furnish no interesting situation, no critical moments, to the seeker of intellectual excitement and this will no doubt constitute a serious objection to the book on the part of sensational seeking readers. None has however any thing to quarrel with the choice of a subject that any author may choose to write upon and none of the outside public can afford any explanation as to why the author should have preferred one subject to another. We think however there are one or two indications of bad taste. Still we welcome the appearance of this book and trust that it is but the first of a long series of works in writing which our author should spend the matured experience and the literary facility of a well-spent life.—Young Bengal, Feb. 2, 1888.

We owe an apology to Mr. Sambhu C. Mookerjee for the apparent negligence with which we have treated that delightful work of his—Travels in Bengal. Mr. Mookerjee, as almost every one knows, is one of the best English scholars in India; he writes as gracefully as does the most scholarly Englishman, and ample proof of this is afforded in the pages of his book before us, which is an interesting narrative of four journeys,—“two trips to Tipperah and two trips back”—accompanied by historical, geographical, cartographical and many other—ital notes of the lands passed through. We confess we have been but through the first half of the work, and, as we have proposed to review it in two papers, we think our progress sufficient for present purposes. Our author has not, as far as we have read, met with those thrilling adventures we read of—oft with a certain amount of sneaking disbelief—in the average hunter's narratives or traveller's tales; peaceful as the bosom of a still lake were his journeyings in Bengal Proper. He carried no formidable weapons with him, save and except a rusty old gun which, when called into requisition once, refused to go off; and yet withal, few more delightful works of travel in India have we read than the one now under our hands. The charms of true yet eloquent description, the force of observation, the gift of seeing sermons in stones, are all possessed in a great degree by Mr. Mookerjee; and we are pleasantly surprised at the lively and fascinating manner in which he can palm off on the reader the dreariest incident of his trips. Mr. Mookerjee will forgive us if we mention that we think him a very gallant old gentleman—with the accent on the second syllable. He has evinced in his little work a weakness for describing the Beauties of Bengal with all the poetic ardours of a Strophon. Did we not know enough of the erudite and good old "Babu" editor, we might be inclined to call this particular weakness of his, in Carlyle's language—"a Byronism of taste." Here is how he speaks of a beautiful damsel he saw disporting in the running waters of the beautiful Megna, at Sonargoan.— [Extract.]

But the above excerpt is not the best thing in the book by far. Although every line in it which we have gone over, is a line that we ourselves having written, would not wish to blot out, there are passages in it which surprise us and raise our hearts to a higher level by their eloquence, their beauty and wealth of expression. Running through the pages of Travels in Bengal is a vein of quiet humour—that humour which makes us fall in love with writers and tempts us to fly to them for solace in trouble, for a return of serenity in moments of vexation. Mr. Mookerjee has, in his work, added one more to the innumerable anecdotes relative to the fidelity of man's best friend among brutes—the dog. The sentinel duties of a canine phenomenon—Tom by name are related in glowing terms, but we shall not rob the author of one of his finest plums by transferring it into our columns. This review, as we have already stated, is but the introductory one. In our next, or a little later, we shall take up Mr. Mookerjee's book where we are leaving it off, and make our readers a little more familiar with one of the cleverest native gentlemen of the day and with his interesting book on travels in Baboodom. Mr. Mookerjee, like all his fellow mortals, is human, and he has let us know this in his present work. How, we propose to state only in our second review. Would he however pardon us if we surrender to the temptation of finishing this up with his pretty remarks about Mooring and the Moon. After "the contending gods of the elements" had "left off" one night when our traveler was on the bosom of the Megna, he watched Luna issue from behind the clouds in all her grandeur and radiance. That sight, so delightful to the mind with a leaning towards the aesthetic and poetic, gave vent to the following: [Extract.]

Now, the above will prove a grand surprise to the European readers especially, who may perhaps be unkind enough to doubt that it was written by a "Babu" just as people have doubted that Shakespeare was really the author of Shakespeare and Tennyson the author of Tennyson. Mr. Mookerjee and we part here, but when work is done and we sit in our cosy arm-chair at home and watch, as is our wont, the blue smoke curl gracefully away from our pipe, we shall dream with waking eyes of the beautiful Megna and the damsels of Bengal, of the moon and the waters, and we know that we shall again take up the Travels in Bengal and satisfy our wish of getting to the end of such a pleasant little work.—The Malabar and Travancore Spectator, February 4, 1888.

Vol. VII.

CALCUTTA, SATURDAY, MARCH 10, 1888.

No. 314.

TO THE GOVERNMENT KHAIR KHWA.

A LEGAL DOGGEREL.

DEDICATED TO A NATIVE JUDGE ON THE BENCH IN A SMALL OUT OF THE WAY STATION IN UPPER INDIA.

There was a Judge of Poor-in-luck-up,
Who very much with pride was stuck up,
He is a d—d Cachmerie sly,
His proper name is Kala Seaie.*

As representative of the Queen,
In the Revenue Court he's seen.
He's a learned man, as doth appear,
From his great work the Gazetteer.

Seated on the Judge's bench in state,
Naked as to his legs and pate,
With a fragrant hookah by his side,
He calls for a case to be tried.

Ho! Sheristadar, what's on to-day?
The case of Runjeet Sing you say?
Peon! call in the rascal, I'll soon squelch—
The rest was cut off by a *****

Plaintiff now enters in a fright,
States to the Court his claims, his right,
With greatest clearness and precision.
But then the all-prejudged decision
Rudely destroys his dearest hopes
Of gaining back his fields and topes!
And now 'tis plain the Court had meant
To make award for Government!

The Judge, with mouth now filled with pán,
Treats the poor devil's case with scorn.
Clearing his mouth from the red juice,
Addresses plaintiff—'Tis of no use
Now here fresh matter to disclose.
The Judge here wiped his mighty nose.
Think not, dear reader, that I rail,
He wiped it on his own coat tail.

'Kil Fishey Lall at his right hand
Was seated, looking quite as grand
As Judge himself, for one scarce sees
Which is the chap that gets the fees,
Or which the Judge in judgment sitting,
For this is friendship unbecoming
Between any Judge and his Vakils.
I'm sure 'tis thus the public feels.

* Blacking.

The Bench having pronounced its fiat,
Awaits the issue now in quiet.
And as the Judge sits scratching his toe,
Baboo Fishey Lall grunts Hein! just so,
Your judgment's good, so without loss
Of time you should get great kudos,
And the Government for you should stir,
Make you an Ass. Commissioner,
Or, to preclude all further fudge,
Appoint you to High Court as Judge.

The English Pleader, at this butter,
Smil'd, as the Judge began to stutter,
Having just put a fresh gallowrie*
Highly spiced "immensa ore."

Fishey Lall!—at last he stammered—
With your praise I feel enamoured.
The English pleader, trying to joke,
Got in his face a puff of smoke,
Which, going into his mouth so slick,
Made him feel uncommon sick.

The case now done and tied up his brief,
He asks the Court if he may leave.
Once outside, he takes a last fond look
With thumb to nose, what's known as snook,
And mutters with a look so leary
Suum ust budzat Cashmerce,†
Through many Courts I've chanced to rove,
Yet Court like this ne'er seen Bai Jove!

A NUMBER of Burmese convicts—transported for life for the crime of defending their hearths and homes and branded as Dacoits—have escaped from the convict settlement in the Andaman Islands to the forest. IT has been decided to run a railway between Sialkot and Jammu, a distance of 25 miles. We wonder where the impoverished Durbar is to find the ways and means, without borrowing.

THE Exodux Question receives a further development this year. Hitherto it has been the practice to leave in Calcutta one Assistant Secretary in the Military Department, in charge of the Military, Home, Foreign, P. W. D. and Revenue and Agricultural Departments. Col. Collen has obtained sanction to remove a larger portion of his office to Simla leaving the Military Department to the mercies of its Chief Clerk.

IT is reported from Vienna, under date the 16th February:—

"The Parliament House was besieged to-day by hundreds of students who noisily demanded admittance to the galleries to hear the debate on the Government Bill placing certain restrictions on liberties of students' clubs in University towns. The students smashed the iron railing in front of the ticket office, and made their way to the conversation rooms of the House on the pretence of wanting to speak with several well-known anti-Semitic Deputies. One of the latter, Herr Patta, went out to them and led a number into the galleries without tickets. The Minister of Public Instruction delivered a temperate speech, pointing out that the restrictions now proposed are such as have long been in force in German Universities, such as Leipsic and Berlin and hinted that what had forced him to bring in a Bill was the unpatriotic, anti-Austrian, and anti-Semitic conduct of a portion of the students, who are misled by political agitators, and then left in the lurch, after their whole career has been ruined. The speech was received with cries of derision on the benches of the German National Party, and with groans and disorder among the students, to such an extent that the President threatened to have the galleries cleared. The debate was eventually adjourned till to-morrow."

THE late Jam of Lus Beyla disinherited by his will his eldest son, Meei jam Ah Khan, now a state prisoner in Quetta. He had rebelled against his father and, while committing many outrages at the capital, had attempted the Jam's life with a drawn sword. The second son—a boy of 8—Meir Jam Yakub Khan is named in the will as heir. The inhabitants are desirous to have the boy as their Jam.

DR. LAWRI, Residency Surgeon, Hyderabad, has found a preventive of if not a cure for cholera. The Doctor is of opinion that while the disease is about, no one who takes 3 to 5 grains of quinine before each meal will take the disease.

AT the Bow Street Police Court, on January 28, a summons was obtained for the Earl of Durham against James Davis, proprietor of the Bat, for a libel against his Lordship. It was stated that, under pretence of discussing the recent turf dispute between Lord Durham and Sir George Chetwynd, an article in the Bat, under the head of "Letters to Notable Sportsmen—the Earl of Durham" insinuates that Lord Durham drove his wife to insanity by his brutality, it being true that he instituted a suit for nullity of his marriage on the ground of her insanity.

ANOTHER Libel case in the sporting world:—

"Mr. Archibald McNeill—special correspondent of the Sportsman at the prizefight in France between Smith and Kilrain—was either brutally murdered and flung into the sea, or, somehow, tumbled into the harbour at Boulogne. This lamentable affair has created, and continues to create a great sensation here, and the editor of the Sporting Times took occasion to say of the late Mr. McNeill's employer that when first the news reached England, he treated the matter with indifference, and subsequently attempted to use it for advertising purposes. Mr. Ashley declares that Corlett's statements are absolutely untrue, indeed, that he has been so upset in his mind by the death of his unfortunate and valued contributor that he has hardly been able to attend properly to business since the event took place. Moreover, that so far from acting shabbily in the matter, he was willing to incur any expense to bring the assassin to justice. Mr. Ashley and Mr. Corlett have been at loggerheads for the past fifteen or twenty years, and they never lose an opportunity, on the race course and elsewhere, directly and indirectly, of insulting and reviling each other, yet strange as it may seem, both are acute men of business, cautious in their affairs, and not otherwise ungenerous in their dispositions. Should the case come into Court—though, as yet, the writ is not served—an attempt will be made to rake up the past lives of both these Turf 'prophets,' doubtless to the public entertainment. Mr. Corlett is an owner of racehorses, whose colours of white and gold are sufficiently familiar at minor meetings, while Ashley, in partnership with Sidney Smith, owns probably the largest sporting news agency in the world."

MR. PHILLIP P. Piedade, Honorary Treasurer of the Fort Convent of the Society of St. Vincent de Paul, Bombay, acknowledges and thanks the receipt of the following donations:—

"His Highness the Maharaja of Travancore, Rs. 50; Nawab Syakhat Ar Hoosein of Purneah, Rs. 30; Nawab Bahadoor of Moorshedabad, K. C. I. E., Rs. 25; Sir Rama Swamy Moodliar, Kt., C. I. E., of Madras, Rs. 10; Maharajah Sir Jotendro Mohun Tagore, Kt., of Calcutta, Rs. 10; Rai Mahabir Prashad Sha Bahadoor, Zemindar of Chupra (Behar.) Rs. 10; Raja Mohima Ranjan Chaudhry of Rangpur, Bengal, 10; Horendro Narain Singh Chaudhry, Zemindar of Goalpara, Assam, Rs. 10; Dayaram Gudumli, Esq., B. A., L. L. B., of Ahmedabad, Rs. 10; Babu Frigunand Upadhya, Zemindar of Chupra (Behar), Rs. 5; Palle Chentsal Row Pantulu, Esq., C. I. E., of Madras, Rs. 5; Ananga Mohan Ray Chaudhry, Zemindar of Tusbhandar, Rangpur, Bengal, Rs. 5."

IT has been calculated that—

"Three million women of the United States work for money. Of these 6,00,000 are agricultural labourers, mainly in the cotton fields of the South; 6,40,000 are employed in manufactories, while 5,30,000 in the laundries of the country insist that 'the Chinese must go'; 2,80,000 are milliners, and 2,00,000 find employment as dress-makers; 60,000 earn their bread in the tailors' shops and 960,000 are saleswomen, teachers, telegraph operators, typewriters, book-keepers, typesetters, and nurses. There are 2,500 female physicians."

THE following is going the round of the native Press:—

"A young Hindu of some village near the Kharian tahsil, district Gujrat, had a row with his wife some years ago, and married another young girl by paying some hundreds of rupees to the father of the girl. As his first wife was obedient to his parents they turned out disgracefully the new bride and bridegroom. The latter after some days begged pardon, and entered his father's house. The bride tried her best to enter her husband's house by threatenings and beggings, but to no effect. On the other hand, she was distinctly told by husband's parents that she could marry another husband. She waited for about seven years, during which time she left no stone unturned in inducing her husband's parents, but to no good end. At last her father brought her to Jhelum, few days ago, and declared his daughter unmarried. A young man of the Jhelum city offered 300 rupees to her father, and married his daughter on the night of the 9th current in the house of Pandit Ganesh in Bag Mohulla. On the 10th current, the bridegroom was very jolly in his relations, and telling his friends that he did a very profitable bargain yesterday. Instantly a man of the bride's village came to the spot, and stated that this girl was married long ago. The new bridegroom, fearing from the law and caste system, turned out the poor girl, who crying and telling that she would die but won't leave him. Her father was, at last, compelled to return the money, and took his daughter back. While they were on their way towards home they were called by a cavalry man who bought the girl for 300 rupees or more. Mr. Editor, you will be surprised to learn how the Hindus are making bargain of their daughters in these days. They have no fear from Law, Religion, or Society. I solicit that our Justice Government will kindly put a stop to evils like these."

The writer's language may be slovenly, but he is a genuine reformer. We shall not be surprised if our Justice Government should circulate his valuable communication for the opinion of the tennis-loving officials.

THE next or 2nd Criminal Sessions of the High Court begins on Monday next. Mr. Justice Norris has been told off for the duty. The calender is a light one.

MR. MARSDEN has fined the driver of a second class hackney carriage Rs. 50, for using his carriage without registering. The man had applied for registration but the carriage not being in proper condition, it was refused. He holds a certificate from the South Suburban Municipality, but that gives him no jurisdiction in Calcutta.

SURGEON MAJOR Kali Pada Gupta, M. B., is Gazetted to officiate as Sanitary Commissioner for Bengal, in addition to his own duties, during the absence of Brigade-Surgeon R. Lidderdale. Would the Calcutta Corporation have accepted him as their sanitary officer? The Commissioners showed their appreciation of Native worth by rejecting the offer of Dr. K. D. Ghose.

THE sly foxes who affected to despise the shrievalty itself when it fell to a man of no birth nor fortune, and without the advantages of high caste or commanding position, are now punished. In Bengali parlance, they may be found dead at their own quarters. The shrievalty may be a sinecure, and is open to derision as an ephemeral sinecure. But it may have its chances, like the visit of the Prince of Wales in the late Dugumber Mitter's time. Though such princely visits are like angels'—in their rarity only—there are numerous incidents of other kinds which may bring the Sheriff to the front. Such an incident has come to dignify the shrievalty of 1888. We refer to the requisition published in a morning paper "To the Hon'ble Dr. Mahendralal Sircar, C.I.E., TO R. of Calcutta, to convene a public meeting in the Town Hall at 11 A.M. on Thursday, March 22nd, in honor of the retiring Viceroy. Is it not something for a professional man and almost plain citizen to be requested by the Reises of the country—Rajas, Maharajas and Nawabs to attend other leading men—to issue his fiat for a gathering of the nation, to discuss the administration of Her Majesty's Representative in the East? It is a mere formality, no doubt, and Dr. Sircar has, as a matter of course, complied with the requisition and called the meeting in the terms of the requisition, but what are honors and dignities—specially the official honors and dignities for which mankind hankers—but so many forms and formalities? Man is a weak little creature whose greatness is made up of trifles. It is mostly mere affectation when men take up a high attitude. A toy himself, his life bounded by a span, what should man's honors be but baubles? It becomes our insignificance to have a due respect for shows and shadows.

THE French are awaking to the folly of undertaking Colonial obligations before they were secure at Home :—

"During the debate in the French Chamber on the colonial estimates, on the 13th February, M. Etienne, Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies, refuting some of the criticisms of M. de Lanessan, said that the actual expenses on account of Indo-China would not exceed 70,000,000fr. The uniting of the Indo-Chinese settlements under one administration had simplified the machinery of government, and the number of troops could now be reduced by 10,000 men. M. Felix Faure, speaking on behalf of the Government, declared that the policy of France must consist in maintaining a firm but benevolent protectorate in Indo-China. The state of affairs there was perfectly satisfactory, and the army of occupation might be shortly reduced, but it was necessary to act with prudence in the matter. M. Delafosse, of the Right, and M. Perrin, Radical, maintained that the occupation of Tonquin was a danger to France so long as threatenings of war resounded on her European frontier. A vote was then taken on the credit of 20,000,000fr. on account of expenditure in Tonquin, and the Chamber, by an even vote of 256 against 256, threw out the credit. M. Tirard, the Premier, thereupon declared that if the vote implied the evacuation of Tonquin, the Government declined to accept the responsibility of such action; but if it simply signified a request to effect economies, the Ministry were prepared to adopt the course indicated. He therefore called upon the Chamber to vote a credit of 10,800,000fr., or 200,000fr. less than the sum originally asked for. The reduced credit was then adopted by 264 to 256."

That shows the direction of the wind and the complications expected on the Continent.

Holloway's Pills.—With darkening days and changing temperatures the digestion becomes impaired, the liver disordered, and the mind despondent, unless the cause of the irregularity be expelled from the blood and body by such an alterative as these Pills. They directly attack the source of the evil, thrust out all impurities from the circulation, restore the distempered organs to their natural state, and correct all defective or contaminated secretions. Such an easy means of instituting health, strength, and cheerfulness should be applied by all whose stomachs are weak, whose minds are much harassed, or whose brains are overworked. Holloway's is essentially a blood tempering medicine, whereby its influence reaches the remotest fibre of the frame and effects a universal good.

NOTES AND LEADERETTES.

THE Report of the Public Service Commission was made public on Tuesday the 6th instant. We give elsewhere a portion of the Recommendations.

THE Indian Government is not the only one afflicted with monarchs retired from business. Egypt too has her Dhuleep Singh in Ismael Pasha. More fortunate in his advisers and advocates than the—Cub of the Punjab, the Ex-Khedive has brought his claims against the Government to a settlement, thanks to the exertions and management of Mrs. Marriott. Of his claim for 116,000*l.* annually from the Civil List, Ismael is to receive land of the value of 1,630,800*l.* sterling, and 100,000*l.* for his claims for growing crops. His palaces and effects in Egypt and Constantinople, valued by him at 575,000*l.* sterling, have been restored to him.

THE Model State is in a bad way. Slowly but surely the toils are encompassing Travancore. Heaven save the ruler who alienates the Press. It was sheer folly in the Durbar to despise its numerous and clever enemies of its own household. Though baffled oft, they never lost heart, but rather mutually kept themselves in countenance. And now at length their persistent exposure of misrule in the great Malabar Raj is telling. The days are gone by when the favour of a Governor was an all-sufficing resource. The visit of the Governor of Madras to Travancore was an event of great importance in this connection. It might be the turning-point in the controversy. It was regarded with different feelings by the two sides—with hope by the accuser and misgiving by the accused. Both sides prepared for it. Those who had hitherto been representing the Court and Government of Travancore as utterly corrupt and incorrigible, now filled the air with their lamentations and curses and their prayers to Lord Connemara. To help the Governor in his inquiry they formulated their charges and culminated a whole pamphlet. The Durbar was no less active. It comported itself as if it was its last chance, but it bestirred itself characteristically. It exhausted itself in a grand reception of the new comer, appealing to Lord Connemara's human heart and Irish imagination. The malcontent cause was "dished" by the Court in a magnificent display. But it didn't do, after all. It merely staved off the threatened crash. The Governor went away apparently pleased, but not, we suspect, without giving His Highness and Minister a quiet hint to set their house in order. Accordingly, there are signs of activity in that direction. At the same time the press itself is being used to bolster up the reputation of the administration. The Sarvani too has been apparently shelved, for the moment.

MR. SWINHOE'S rule as Khedive is over, and he has been shelved. The Commissioners who had elected him Vice-chairman of the Suburban Corporation, would not reappoint him, but have found their next man in Baboo Ashutosh Biswas. The official Chairman Mr. Forbes accepted his new Vice in a great little speech. He said—

"for himself that he was perfectly satisfied with the selection the commissioners had made. In fact, if he had been called upon to make the nomination, his first impulse would have been to continue existing arrangements, but after that he should certainly have suggested Baboo Asutosh Biswas—first, because he was a thorough-going business man, and secondly, because he was the leader of the opposition. He was sanguine that the appointment of Baboo Asutosh Biswas would terminate a deal of the friction which existed, and one who had hitherto been against him would now be with him."

After all the trouble he has had from the elect of Demos, the District Chief could scarcely help regarding with sly humour the prospects of the new arrangement. For Mr. Swinhoe the struggle is over:

The last of danger and distress is passed. Baboo Biswas' trial and agony begins. He will be lucky indeed if, at the end of his term, he can secure his re-election. But therein he is lucky. Long before the determination of his municipal vicerealty, the Corporation itself will have been dissolved as a separate entity and received into the bosom of the metropolis. Our best wishes attend Babu Ashutosh.

WE received on Tuesday the following telegram from Cuttack :—

"An evening party was given by Baboo Madhu Sudan Das last night to meet Mr. and Mrs. Metcalfe. European and native elite, consisting of about 400 ladies, gentlemen and children, attended. The house was nicely decorated and a canopy was tastefully drawn up in the compound. Refreshment was provided for all; amusements terminated with firework. Then Baboo Madhu Sudan Das spoke on behalf of his countrymen, dwelling upon the necessity of good feeling between the ruler and the ruled, and concluding with expressions of sorrow at parting with our worthy Commissioner so suddenly on account of ill health, and offering thanks to Mrs. Metcalfe for the interest she took in the medical help of the women. Mr. Metcalfe then rose to thank Baboo, Madhu Sudan Das and his friends and countrymen, for the feeling they expressed about him, and while recalling to his memory the services rendered by his grandfather, father and brother to this country, said that there were still men in India who consider the Metcalfes as their own, and from his experience he has no doubt of the loyalty of the natives, and the key to rule them is kind treatment. He attributed the ill-feeling between Europeans and natives to defective moral education and expressed a hope that it would soon disappear. Baboo Kallypada Banerjee opportunely observed while the goodbye was illuminated 'I hope it shall not be the last.' The entertainment was a grand success and Baboo Madhu Sudan Das deserves thanks."

We hope Mr. Metcalfe has not left any accounts unadjusted in Cuttack. We miss the voice of Young Orissa in the demonstration. We should like to hear Baboo Deno Nath Banerjee on the merits of the "worthy Commissioner." Mr. Metcalfe scarcely showed good taste in utilising what was at best a social compliment—if it was not an exacted tribute from one not quite a free agent—for glorifying his family. Perhaps that was the only way left to him of covering his own insignificance. In default of any achievements of his own, he was reduced to revel in the pleasures of memory and dwelt on the services rendered to this country by his grandfather, father and brother. Perhaps, it would not be amiss to describe the enjoyment as belonging rather to the "pleasures of the imagination." Mr. Metcalfe, we presume, did not descend to particulars, or he might have found it difficult to make out a case for so many of his name. With one notable exception, the Metcalfes have been an obscure "lot," and even the great Sir Theophilus has been far more lucky in a biographer than considerable in action. He was an honest man, however, and though there was something almost ludicrous in the nervous haste with which he broke the fetters from off the Press so soon as he got the chance during his acting incumbency as Governor-General, under the certainty almost of their reimposition by order from Home, we are bound to be grateful to him, the more so as he had always advocated such a measure and sacrificed himself in carrying it out. To us his greatest claim to respect has always lain in his high personal character. Herein he was truly great. He was thoroughly honorable. In a corrupt age he was incorruptible. Would that his kinsmen and descendants could say half as much for themselves!

THE latest venture in journalism in Sind is a twice a week Everybody's Paper—so named par excellence, but in reality most ominously. What is everybody's business is nobody's business. The subscription 4 annas a month is meant to attract a large number, but the lordly European will, we fear, have nothing to say to such a concern. The old Nabobs used to pay for their common kitchen vegetables—brinjals and gourds and so on—with Rupees and gold mohurs. Nor was it so preposterous as the vulgarity of these latter days might think. We say the point of a joke lies in the hearer's ear. The same analogy holds in everything else. The price of a thing lies in the position of the purchaser. Every man has his price—in other than the Walpolean sense. As there are alternative laws of demand and supply—demand creating supply equally with supply inducing demand—so there are conflicting principles governing price, one being the result of competition and another imposed by custom, while a third conforms to status of the buyer. Many of the fees we pay are kept up at their present figures by the second rule. And even in the present reign of political economy, there are occasional instances of the operation of the last principle. Many respectable people have a horror of the cheap, even where there is no fear of the nasty.

THE Daily Athenaeum of Hyderabad, though in its 9th volume, is a paper with which our acquaintance has just begun. Nor are we disposed to regret the circumstance: we can not have lost by the past, as we do not remember the paper mentioned before in the press to any purpose. It cannot be so now. The present management will make itself felt. The Hyderabad Athenaeum can no longer be the obscure journal that it has been. Already it is the smartest thing of its kind going. The Deccan ought to be proud of our contemporary. If local society had not been too stupified by the upas influence of the great Pagoda Tree, it would know how to appreciate the light and wholesome literature that is supplied to it. A true wag is a rare bird and ought to be cherished when found. Such a genial spirit is now at Chudderghaut, coining his brain into jokes for the benefit of Hyderabad and India. We take one of them from the issue of the 3rd March:—

"We are authoritatively informed we were in error in supposing that Sir Asman Jah was ever Prime Minister to any other Potentate but his present Master. We feel bound to accept the contradiction as gracefully as it has been given. We hope the authorities won't trouble to apologise. We are always open to conviction—except on a charge of libel."

OUR contemporary, we fear, will have many troubles from the sensitiveness of the Court. Symptoms of puzzlement are already apparent:—

"We regret we are precluded by a severe attack of Lord Dufferin's 'imperative private reasons' from accepting a kind invitation to a game of chess with His Highness this evening. We have requested Mr. Forbes, who is a good player, and who doesn't set so much store upon his head as we do, to be the bearer of this apology, and to act as our substitute. The funeral will take place at 8 o'clock to-morrow morning."

NOTHING daunted, Sir Wag follows up in this vein:—

"A recent ruling of the Government of India has struck the Bee Yeas and Yem A's dumb with consternation. The only device left, to console them, is to make them all C. I. E.'s. What's the use of a literary degree that is to be 'for the future omitted from all notifications in the Gazette of India'? This last camel has broken the straws' back, and was all that was wanted to complete Lord Dufferin's unpopularity with a certain class of the community."

AN extraordinary case of baffled suicide at the capital of Hungary has been the sensation of the hour. Janos Meryassi had lived far too long for his means of supporting himself and family. All other resources being exhausted, he descended to the street—not the highway. For though he shrunk from no toil, he aspired not to the knight-hood of industry. He may have made himself a bit of a public nuisance, but was no danger to passengers. Thus for the last ten years has he gone on, commencing with his seventy-fourth year. He is a grand fellow, this beggar. There is little likelihood of Janos' galloping straight to—the Equator, say, or the bowels of the earth or any other equally intolerable furnace—even though provided with the fleetest thorough-bred. This poor man begged not for himself alone but supported his aged parents. They are a venerable family, the father 115 years of age, the mother 110 years, and the son 84, and thoroughly respectable. There are ups and downs, in life, however, even the life of a beggar. The depression of trade lowered the temperature of the atmosphere of benevolence. Perhaps modern progress—political economy and the new morality too quenched the spirit of charity. Poor Janos' collections became small by degrees and ominously less, until they ceased. He starved, as a consequence, but what was worse, saw father and mother starve. This was the straw that broke the camel's back. Our noble beggar could not stand this long. The brave man's courage failed at this point. He resolved to flee from the desperate battle, though his parents should be left in the lurch. One day he made a clean leap from the Bridge of Sighs connecting Buda and Pesth. Happily, he was not unobserved. A Member of the Hungarian Parliament gallantly rescued him.

VARIOUS methods are adopted in Europe, by individuals as well as communities, for keeping down numbers. The most successful of these Malthusians has appeared in Hungary, in the shape of a possibly fair but certainly hot soft one. Her method is simplicity itself—sharp and summary. We cannot say she deserved success, but she commanded it nevertheless, for a long series of years, and it was only by an accident that she came to trouble. Even then she can hardly be said to have failed. If she ends with getting her due, as we devoutly trust she will get—on the gallows—she will have only succeeded the better—crowning her Malthusian career by any reduction in population.

This tigress in human form is a peasant woman of Hungary who, having cultivated the most advanced doctrines of political economy, had lately taken to religion. Desirous of joining the religious sect of the Nazareans, she called upon a priest at Zenta, and, in accordance with the rule of the Order that converts must make a clean breast of all sins committed throughout their life, she made the following horrible statement:—

“I have had eight children, and have killed them all. My first, a boy, named Victor, born in 1874, was four months old when he died. Another was born in 1879. I forget what we called him, but he did not live more than a few days. On February 29th, 1880, I had twins, Peter and Rosa. I killed them a week after their birth. My daughter Juliana was born April 11th, 1881, and was dead two days later. Agnes, of whom I was confined on March 29th, 1882, also lived only a few days. On May 5th, 1883, I again had twins; one was still-born and I killed the other a month afterwards. My last child came in May, 1884. I disposed of it in two days. I poisoned all my children with a decoction of poppies. They were all previously baptised. I did not want any children. My husband knew nothing of what I had done. I lived on bad terms with him, and wanted to vex him.”

Bad as this wretched woman had been, the Nazarean pudre to whom she came for what crumb was possible to her from faith or superstition was worse. He quietly handed her over to the Police. She was a true penitent now, and she renewed her confession before the magistrates.

TO R. MATHEW ARNOLD is still doling out to his countrymen his it at cences in America. The only things he found cheap were oysters the ce. We cannot answer for the first and do not care for it. We the ily believe what has been said about the second. Before an in- it hvable Destiny consigned us bound hand and foot to the un- th certainties and inequalities of the abomination of made ice, we in the far East were supplied with the natural product from the Western Continent. Sometimes there used to be a glut in the market. On one occasion, attracted by the monopoly enjoyed by the Tudor Company a competitor appeared with another ice ship in the Hoogly. He reduced the price to half an anna per pound. Then Mr. Ladd, of the Tudor Company, offered to supply his constituents for nothing. They had only to send a servant with a blanket and a name to get ice to any reasonable quantity free of charge.

Mr. Arnold is a man of delicate sensibilities, and he was bored by the American Loconomenology.

“Brigsville, Grigsville, Jacksonville,’ and so on ad infinitum—‘comes on the ear of a cultivated person like the incessant cutting of pins.’ Happily, it was not all wrong on the other side of the water—“The Americans do not persist as we do in making invidious distinctions between persons by the use, for some, of the affix ‘Esquire,’ a term which came from the great frippery shop of the middle ages.”

THERE is something like an instinctive partiality throughout the world to Physiognomy. It is an art that seems to come easy to man. Every body believes in it; nay, everybody professes it, more or less, consciously or unconsciously. For, though no two men’s systems might agree, all men are at one in this that they all judge others at first sight—assign them different characters without knowledge, before there has been opportunity to observe behaviour or actions. But whatever truth there may be in this summary procedure, it is clearly being abused. The art is being discredited by pedants and professionals. Face-reading is slippery enough, even in the living subject. But there is no end to modern progress or—pretension, and some have set themselves up photograph readers. They are such mighty and unerring physiognomists, that they will tell your character from a common carte-de-visite. The illustrated journals now often keep one of such cheap prophets on their establishment, much as American papers are understood to keep a fire-eater to receive personal chastisement on the editor and fight his actual battles, whose duty it is to humour the constituents by reading their characters from their photos. It must be the veriest guess-work, seeing that, besides the inherent difficulties of the subject, photography itself is a most unreliable art. No physiognomist with a care for reputation should hazard it on anything short of a good painter’s representation. But in these days of competition, a man cannot always afford to be particular, and luckily there are fools enough.

It is never too late to mend, and the Indian Mirror is not so incorrigible as people take it. It formerly eschewed publicans and sinners of all kinds and sexes. But with age came wisdom and it took wine under its protection. And now it has taken to patronising another institution of the Devil. We read in the Indian Mirror of last Sunday:—

• “We are glad to see that the proprietor of the Emerald Theatre in Beadon Street intends holding performances to-night in aid of the fund that is now being raised for the erection of a tombstone of the late Mr. Michael Modu Shudun Dutta. From their programme it appears, that Meghnad Bala will be put on the stage, to-night, and we doubt not, that frequenters of stage will muster strong at to-night’s performance, with a view to show their appreciation of the great distinguished poet’s services to the cause of our national literature.”

THE Emperor William of Germany has at last paid the debt of nature, dying at the advanced age of 91, at 8½ on Friday morning. The ailing Crown Prince on whom the succession devolves, had already been called up from San Remo, and was to reach Berlin to-day. Bismarck was also called.

REIS & RAYYET.

SATURDAY, MARCH 10, 1888.

THE PIONEER AND OURSELVES.

WE are so intimately identified with the author that we have refrained from noticing any notices of Mookerjee’s Travels, or else we might have had a genial laugh at the Madras critic who has written himself down a Dryasdust and is vexed that the book, published about the time when the great Congress was holding at their city, contains not a word about it, and was equally silent about social reform as about political regeneration. Of course the feeble and fatuous malice of “that intellectual enuch” of a critic nearer home who in the Calcutta Review has classed the Travels with the Biography, in a strange lingo, of the late Mr. Justice Onoocool Chunder Mookerjee, as the two most characteristic works of Bengali scholarship and genius, would have deserved a regular, if summary, chastisement. At the same time we might have explained the one or two minor objections which may be discerned in the stream of unbroken kindness and appreciation which the book has evoked. We might, for instance, to refer to the late brilliant criticism from the City of the Zamorin, urge the moral purpose and esthetic justification of the author’s introducing the petty circumstance of his helping his poor chairmen to fill in the Postal forms for making their little remittances home. These are matters of no great moment, however, and whatever they may be worth, they are more the author’s concern whose reputation or whose vanity they might touch, than the journalist’s. There was one criticism, however, which directly involved us in controversy, but which we have apparently avoided. The Pioneer in its review wrote:—

“.....his reflections on this or that social and political subject are not without their moral. Mr. Saunblu C. Mookerjee was formerly Minister to the last of the Nawabs Nazim of Bengal, Behar and Orissa and afterwards Minister of the Maharaja of Tipperah. He is a man, therefore, of experience, and when he speaks his brethren should listen to him. In his philosophical reflections he beseeches his brother journalists not to ‘throw their vitriol ink about’ without examining and making sure of what they are about. ‘Weigh well your words, think of their effect, and for God’s sake remember your responsibility. . . . Stick to facts; never invent calumnies; never imagine grievances.’ Excellent advice truly; would that it could be followed; and yet we have an unpleasant feeling that in a certain journal with which Mr. Mookerjee’s name is popularly associated the precepts are not followed. We remember a certain remark some months ago about the Oudh Talukdars and their attitude towards Sir Alfred Lyall; and also a cock-and-bull story about Colonel Marshall and a high spirited native sentry at Hyderabad. There was certainly a dash of vitriol in the ink that was then thrown about.”

Surely, the force of perversity could no further go. That strange medley of a criticism can only be explained on the charmingly simple principle of

I do not like thee Doctor Fell,

The reason why I cannot tell.

But this I know full well

I do not like thee Doctor Fell.

The Baboo is not to expect mercy for even that unconscious imitation which it is said to be the best and most effective flattery. This poor author will seem to most of his own countrymen to be quoting from the Pioneer. Yet the Pioneer goes to the most absurd lengths in order to humble him. Perhaps, he is rightly served! Thus are the Natives who turn Christians from conviction served by European fellow-Christians. The Sermon on the Mount repeated by Baboo lips grate on the ears polite of many Anglo-Indians.

In vulgar Billingsgate, specially in this country, the relations on both the mother's and the father's side of the victim are not spared. Our contemporary, in somewhat similar fashion, not only introduces into its review the author's professional career, but rakes up the incidents of its past. That is far from fair. A book is a book and is to be judged as such and by itself, without travelling out of its four corners. It is no objection to a book that its author does not practise its doctrines. It is alas! notoriously easier to preach than to practise good counsel. Even the Pioneer sometimes offers sound orthodox views which its general conduct belies. How difficult it must be for natives to please their European fellow-subjects when an author might be reproached for inconsistency on such a pretence!

Leaving the author, we come to ourselves. We are quite prepared to join issue with our contemporary. It would have been more convenient had he stated his charge in an independent form, without introducing it by the back-door and in another, for us rather awkward, connection. Then we would have been compelled to notice it sooner. Be that as it may, the charge is not a light one. It affects the credit of the Native Press. It affects in especial the conduct of a paper which is not only respectable in the eyes of the public but which, according to the lights vouchsafed to us, seeks to maintain the highest standard of honor and morality. It may go wrong, but never of evil or malice aforethought. It uses strong language from conviction or the need of making impression, and it employs bitter language by way of reprisal, sometimes as the only expression of self-respect for a subject race, always with a view to legitimate discipline. Beyond that, its very prejudices—for who is there that can honestly and intelligently say that he has none?—are not bitter, and are always amenable to reason. It has no animosities, personal or public. Without either party ties or party predilections, it is a native journal, but no class organ. It is not provincial. Of Bengal by accident, it is simply Indian. Under Hindu conduct, it is more Islamic than many Mussulmans turned out of our Colleges. Its politics are national and loyal, in a statesmanlike, not a stump-oratorical sense. It believes in the permanence of British Power in India as a condition sine qua non of order and progress until the final fusion of the native and foreign races into a harmonious body politic and society. It were preposterous to suppose that the conductor who, though an Indian, thinks in English, owes his culture and all the peace and possibilities of his country to Europe, whose highest hourly delight is in communion with European thought, could entertain aught but the highest respect for Europeans and the highest appreciation of all that is best in European society.

If such a paper stinks in the Pioneer's nostrils, our contemporary is to be pitied. It is a case for Sir Julius Vogel and Sir Mackenzie Morell. It has an unpleasant feeling that Mr. Mookerjee's excellent precepts are not followed in Reis and Rayyet. And it proceeds to proof. It adduces two instances. The first count in the indictment is founded on a remark we are alleged to have made some months ago about the Oudh Talookdars' attitude towards Sir Alfred Lyall. The Pioneer is a more careful reader of our columns evidently than we are rememberers of our own. So far as we can call to mind, we never wrote a leading article on Sir Alfred Lyall's relations with Oudh, or any in which the subject was introduced. We did not, we believe, notice it in a leading note, but at the end of a small paragraph of news, we disposed of the Talookdari adulation to the retiring Governor, and that in a line. We simply, by a wink as it were, suggested its unreality. This is the head and front of our offending. The other count rests on a scene between Colonel Marshall and a sentry at the palace, Hyderabad, which we alone in the press published. Upon these two cases our credit for honourable journalism of sweetness and light is compromised with our contemporary. This is a hard measure, and is reserved only for the native press, we suppose. If on a couple of such occasional instances, a newspaper were to forfeit all claim to consideration, it would be hard with the wisest and the most lucky. Even admitting blame in those cases, where is the evidence of vitriol-throwing? Both instances are statements of fact, and their publication does not necessarily imply dishonesty or evil disposition. Perhaps the first is a matter of opinion. There is still less reason to be ashamed of it. If we suspected the genuineness of the demonstration in Oudh, we had our reasons for so doing. Our contemporary might now learn that we were not far wrong. The second is pure news, in every sense. Received as news, it was communicated as news. The vitriol is only in the Pioneer's mind. The news was contradicted officially from Hyderabad and we published the contradiction. And yet the Pioneer persists in feeling vitriol. If the account was a cock and bull story, does the Pioneer really imagine we concocted it to the Colonel's discredit? But it was no cock and bull story at all, but actual fact. We were a good deal surprised when it was officially contradicted by telegraph, but we were not convinced of our error. We knew we had not invented the account and we had no reason to think that our informant had hoaxed us. Accordingly, we telegraphed back to have the true facts. A rejoinder came saying that the whole story was without foundation, nothing of the kind having happened. We had now no alternative but to publish the contradiction. But so strong was our instinct on the subject that we did nothing more. There was no withdrawal from our side and no expression of regret for what we had originally related. And we were right in the course we adopted, hazardous as it was. The Pioneer must have received a similar communication, and it was in reliance on it that it, in December last, still harped on the falsity of the story. Since then, our contemporary has, we believe, grown wiser. Of late, there are signs that it has been disillusioned about Hyderabad affairs. After having helped to make Colonel Marshall's reputation, our contemporary is charging its erstwhile protegee with all manner of obscurantism and virtual absolutism. It must have substantial grounds for such an extraordinary change of front. It need not be ashamed of the inconsistency. There is no real shame except in dishonesty and falsehood. Now that the old spell is broken and its eyes are opened, will it enquire and tell the world whether that incident related in this humble native journal was true or false?

HYDERABAD.

And now we may as well dispose of here some other Hyderabad topics.

The most important event of late in Hyderabad or in India, has been the famous offer of the Nizam of sixty lacs to the British Government towards the defences in the North Western Frontier. We were indignant at the low intrigue and pettifogging dodge, and, in few but unmistakable words, denounced the whole transaction. We protested against its adoption. We suspected its character and were alarmed at its consequences. We could not believe the Nizam, boy as he is, to have, in any sane moment, been a party to such a proposition. Even Asiatic princes do not make ducks and drakes with their money, unless there is any personal pleasure to be derived from the waste. The Nizam cannot afford to pay the sum. The country would be ruined if it attempted to pay it by three instalments. Nor has the Nizam any right to appropriate the revenues of the State in that way. Apart from these questions, it would be a bad precedent, demoralising alike to the Native States and the Imperial Power. On these several weighty grounds, we condemned the Hyderabad bait, and we appealed to the Viceroy personally to save the Empire from such a scandal of taking it. If the offer was not strictly taken—in the jingling coin—it has not been refused either. The compliment was accepted, and an elaborate letter of thanks from the Viceroy was sent to the Nizam through Colonel Marshall who had come all the way to Simla on this theatrical mission.

The juggler who brings news of endless money to an impoverished ruler, is sure of the most extravagant "ovation." Witness Bubble Law at the Court of France! The Hyderabad Cagliostro marched as the Conquering Hero through the land, and was received with almost sovereign consideration.

The Nizam's loyalty, of course, shamed the other Princes into similar offers. The Government of India proceeded to devise the best way in which the gift could be taken and utilised. Various schemes have been suggested and discussed between the Governments in India and England. Before any have been determined upon, grave doubts intervene whether the rupees will ever be forthcoming. In fact, the whole thing has been a huge humbug. The Statesman first got scent of the real facts of the case. Day after day, as is its wont, it kept hammering away at it. The Government at last was constrained to look into it. We believe it has some ground for suspicion. And now the Pioneer itself is, after having extolled the offer and abused us for casting doubt on its reality, backs out of it. Well may our contemporary do so. It was a thing of a kind from which respectability must ever shrink. Since the Red Treaty through which the British first walked into power in India, there has not been so great an imposition.

NOTES FROM GUJERAT.

Surat, Mar. 5th

The recent Municipal Elections that took place at Surat are worthy of something more than a passing notice. Because of the sad demise of Rao Sahib Daolatrao Surbhai, a Municipal Commissioner for Ward No. 2 had to be elected. Three candidates, viz., Messrs. A. G. Almond, Manchershaw P. Kaikobad, and Bhikharidas Vakil, entered the lists; but Mr. Almond came off successful, although Mr. Manchershaw exerted himself to the best of his energy. It is gratuitously urged now and again by some of the Anglo-Indians that the Indian bête noire harbours an aversion to everything that is English. But let such an one see, with his eyes wide open, what an impartial view of affairs the natives generally take. A European gentleman, who is a representative of commerce, is elected in preference to a native of position and local influence, and well-known for his public spirit and intelligence. Will it serve to silence them?—it is enough to knock the bottom out of their anti-native movement.

The ill-devised ukase of the Bombay Government, just communicated to the authorities of the Civil Hospitals and Provincial Dispensaries, will, it is feared, operate very badly on the sick poor of the Province of Gujerat. By it the doctors are authorised to charge a consultation fee of 8 annas, and three annas for the medicine prescribed, to persons earning Rs. 40 per mensem, or those paying Income Tax. Some three months previously the Bombay Government had asked of the different Municipalities as to the advisability of introducing such an ill-judged measure. The consensus of opinion was it is ill-advised to levy fees on a people whose impecuniosity is well-known, and withal, who have just commenced to crusade against the old religious prejudices and superstitions which made it binding upon them not to resort to any relief which could be had by making use of the English drugs. Another argument brought forward by the municipalities to prove its unjustification was that these dispensaries already received aid in the shape of grants from the municipal coffers, which are maintained by levying taxes upon the people. It is a matter of considerable regret, that in these days of rigid economies and retrenchments, Government should make it a point of raising the wind out of the institutions, marked out by charity for her own, and originally intended for administering comfort to the afflicted. In Lord Reay the Province has secured a very humane and sympathising ruler; and it breaks upon the people as a thunderstorm when they come to know that the same ruler has concerted measures which refuse to take ken of their pain and suffering. It seems that somehow or other the Governor gave too much importance to the fallacious fact that the rich, too, make a more than free use of the Hospitals designed for the poor. But it is not only the people will suffer most; the doctors, too, will be put to a deal of inconvenience and trouble before they will be able to find out whether the patient in search of relief earns Rs. 40 per mensem, or more or less. Thus you will see that the whole machinery is thrown out of order for the sake of false economy. Time alone will show whether the action proves a success or a failure.

Another official announcement, just issued by the Government to the effect that henceforward all free-studentships in the High schools should be abolished, is equally unwise, and will, it is feared, tend to lay the axe at the very root of all kinds of education. The un wisdom of this untoward action of the Government is more than clearly proved when we sit to think that in Bombay education is difficult of attainment unless we incur a deal of expense; and hard-up as the Guzeratis are, every one of them is not expected to undergo this heavy expense. At present it is considered scarcely to be within reach of even the middle class, of course not to talk of the poor. It is admitted on all hands that the fees charged in the Government High Schools are a great bar to those who are in earnest quest of knowledge. In the face of these prohibitive influences already at work, to make the poor pay for their education means nothing more than to refuse them to furnish with that intellectual equipment which is so very necessary in these days of civilization and keen competition. It is not known on what grounds Government have thought fit to arrest the intellectual development of the country. I grieve to add that such a measure should have seen light in the time of such a renowned educationalist as Lord Reay. Freeships are not such a heavy charge upon the exchequer as may admit of any and whatever justification on the part of the Government of the injudicious measure which has for its object the boycotting of the poor from the humanising influence of liberal education.

Amidst the mechanical din of political controversy, the Gaekwar's return to Baroda does not require to be overlooked. The Maharajah's triumphal entry, with a new handle to his name, will ever remain a red letter day in the annals of Baroda. The demonstrations of the people in honour of his return had been as sincere as they had been spontaneous, and clearly showed in what regard and respect he is held by them. The Maharajah's engaging look, learning, and ready condescension to the poorest as to the richest, have earned for him a popularity which a Prince may well like to emulate. The sole aim of undertaking this grand tour was simply to recruit his impaired health, but his subjects eagerly wish that His Highness will not fail to introduce into his progressive State those enlightened and salutary measures which he had occasion to observe with his own eyes in Europe. They expect that the Maharajah will confer on them lasting boons, such as will afford them facilities for creating new arts and industries, stimulate trade and commerce, found and foster technical education, bring in sound sanitation, and free them from the unnecessary burden of heavy taxation, and many other hardships. When the ruler of Baroda begins in right earnest the work of these reforms, we shall set down that the journey was made not for "the conquest in England of the star that now adorns his breast," but was a self-imposed task for the good of the subjects.

SUMMARY OF THE CONCLUSIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION.

General.—1. That no proposal can be supported as sound in itself or likely to be a final solution of the problems embraced in the present enquiry, which involves a departure from the principle enacted in Section 87 of the Statute 3 and 4 Will. IV., Cap. 85, or from the policy set forth in Her Majesty's Proclamation of 1858.

The Competitive System.—2. That admission to the branch of the Civil Service known as the Covenanted Civil Service should continue on the system established by Section 32 of the Statute 21 and 22 Vic., Cap. 106, i. e., by competitive examination open to all natural born subjects of Her Majesty and held in accordance with Regulations made from time to time under the Statute. 3. That it is inexpedient to hold an examination in India for the Covenanted Civil Service simultaneously with the examination in London. 4. That the minimum and maximum limits of age for Native candidates at the open competitive examination held in England should be nineteen and twenty-three years respectively. 5. That the chief vernacular languages of India and the Persian language should not be added to the subjects of the open competitive examination in England, but should be included among the special studies to be entered upon by the successful candidates preparatory to duty in India. 6. That Her Majesty's Civil Service Commissioners should be invited to take into their consideration the question of the adequacy of the marks at present assigned at the open competitive examination to the Sanskrit and Arabic languages, and the suitability of the standard exacted. 7. That the proposal to fix the number of Native candidates to be selected by competitive examination in London and to select them by an examination separate from that of European candidates, and especially adapted, as regards limits of age and otherwise, to the conditions of Natives of India, does not commend itself to the Commission, which is of opinion that the competition in England should remain open as heretofore without restriction or distinction, as by the present law provided, to all natural-born subjects of Her Majesty of whatever race or colour or creed or place of birth who can satisfy the preliminary conditions prescribed in the rules framed by the Civil Service Commissioners, and that selection should be made impartially and indifferently from among the candidates according to their order of merit as ascertained in one and the same examination. 8. That the rule which admits of selected candidates for the Civil Service, after completion of their two years' probation, remaining an additional year in England for the purpose of taking a University degree, is inconvenient as disturbing the annual recruitment for the several Provinces of India; that it is a departure from the principle that the general education of students should be completed before and not after they enter upon the special studies designed to fit them for duty in India; and that to expend the revenues of India in helping candidates who, having passed their period of preliminary training successfully, are pronounced qualified for service in India, to complete their general education is an indefensible arrangement. 9. That the general conditions of service accorded to officers of the Covenanted Civil Service, who are recruited in England, do not appear to be in any way suitable to Natives of India obtaining office under the Statutory Rules or otherwise appointed in India.

The Statutory Service.—10. That the existing Statutory system has failed to fulfil the expectations anticipated from it; that it is for sufficiently good reasons condemned, not only by particular sections of the Native community, but also by the very large majority of officials, both European and Native, who have had practical experience of its working; that it should be abolished, and that Section 6 of the Statute 33 Vic., Cap. 3, should be repealed.

The Covenanted or Imperial Service.—11. That in the present circumstances of the country, the claims of Natives of India to higher and more extensive employment in the public service, and the admission of competent Natives of each Province of India to a due proportion of the posts heretofore reserved for the Covenanted Civil Service, can be best provided for by reducing the Covenanted Civil Service to a corps d'élite, by limiting its numbers to what is necessary to fill the chief administrative appointments of the Government, and such a number of the smaller appointments as will ensure a complete course of training for junior Civilians, and by transferring a corresponding number of appointments to a local service to be separately recruited in each Province of India. 12. That the use of the term "Covenanted Civil Service of India" should be discontinued, and that the term should be replaced by the expression "Imperial Civil Service of India." 13. That the members of the Imperial Civil Service of India should be bound to serve wheresoever and in whatsoever capacity the Government may see fit and should be eligible for any appointment for which the Government considers them qualified. 14. That no change in principle should be made in the Statute 24 and 25 Vic., Cap. 54, which directs that all vacancies in certain offices shall, save under special circumstances, be filled up from amongst the Covenanted Civil Servants of the Crown in India. 15. That, subject to the arrangements in force for recruiting from the Army Staff Corps in the Punjab and Assam, the Schedule attached to the Statute 24 and 25 Vic., Cap. 54, should be so extended as to include analogous appointments in those and all other Non-Regulation Provinces. 16. That the number of appointments reserved in the Schedule attached to the Statute 24 and 25 Vic., Cap. 54, should be reduced, and that the Schedule recommended in Appendix N. to this Report should be adopted. 17. That if the cadre of the Covenanted Civil Service is larger than would be required under the proposals now made, the Government should, in the future recruitment for the Covenanted Service, have regard to the reduced Schedule in order to give due effect to those proposals; and that regard should further be had to the fact that there are some appointments outside the Schedule which it will probably be the policy of the Government usually, though not exclusively, to fill from the Imperial Service and others to which members of the Imperial Service will only occasionally be appointed. 18. That a provision should be inserted in the Statute 24 and 25 Vic., Cap. 54, enabling the Secretary of State in Council, with the concurrence of a majority of members present at a meeting, to remove appointments or classes of appointments from the Schedule, or to include them in the Schedule, as may seem desirable from time to time, provided that no such order shall take effect until it has, with the reasons for making it, been laid for ninety days before both Houses of Parliament. 19. That Section 3 of the Statute 24 and 25 Vic., Cap. 54, should be so amended as to provide for special appointments being made to offices specified in the Schedule on account of exceptional merit and ability proved in the public service, and to judicial offices specified in the Schedule on account of exceptional merit and ability proved in active practice as a barrister, advocate, or pleader of a High Court, as well as "under the special circumstances of the case." 20. That Section 4 of the Statute 24 and 25 Vic., Cap. 54, should be amended and supplemented as follows:—(a) the period within which the pleasure of the Secretary of State in Council should be expressed should be six months; (b) in the event of the pleasure of the Secretary of State in Council not being expressed within six months, it should be declared that approval is to be presumed; and (c) in the event of the appointment being disapproved, the law should declare that no official acts performed by the officer, until he receives notice of such disapproval, shall on that ground be held invalid. 21. That in filling up the higher appointments which it is now proposed to exclude from the Schedule of 1861 regard should be had to the claims of officers of the Covenanted Civil Service who competed in or before the year 1870, and also to the claims of officers belonging to the Army Staff Corps or Uncovenanted Service who were appointed to the ranks of the several Commissions in India prior to that year.

The Provincial and Subordinate Services.—22. That the proportion of judicial and revenue appointments excluded from the Schedule attached to the Statute 24 and 25 Vic., Cap. 54, should be gradually amalgamated with the higher appointments in the Executive and Judicial Departments of the present Uncovenanted Service and should be recruited locally. 23. That local recruitment should be made separately by the Local Governments of the several Provinces to meet their own special requirements, and that the service so recruited should be called the "Provincial Civil Service." 24. That members of the Imperial and Provincial Services should, as far as possible, be put on a footing of social equality, and that, when they occupy similar offices, they should be graded together in the official precedence list. 25. That below the Provincial Service there should be a lower service to be called the "Subordinate Civil Service"; that in the Executive Department the line of division between the Provincial and Subordinate Services may be conveniently drawn between, on the one hand, the appointments of Deputy Collectors or Extra Assistant Commissioners, and, on the other hand, the appointments of Tahsildars, Mamlatdars, or Mukhtyarkars; and that, as regards the Judicial Department, the line should be determined, separately, by each Local Government for each Province, subject to the sanction of the Government of India. 26. That the Provincial Service should be filled up partly by promotion from the Subordinate Service and partly by recruitment. 27. That, in view of the probability of promotion from the Subordinate Service to the Provincial Service, the rules for the recruitment of the Subordinate Service in each Province should be carefully revised in such a way as to adapt them to the altered circumstances which will be introduced if the general recommendations of the Commission are accepted; that the greatest care should be exercised in the selection of Tahsildars and similar classes of officers, and that Tahsildars should not be appointed without careful preliminary training in a post which will fit them for the duties of the higher office. 28. That, for the purpose of the recruitment of the Provincial Service, no uniform system applicable to all Provinces can at present be recommended, but that a system of open competition should be adopted wherever the Government of India considers it not inexpedient, and that, where open competition is considered unsuitable, a system of competition among candidates previously selected is preferable to a system of nomination, provided that the number of candidates selected for each vacancy is sufficient to make the competition a real one. 29. That in regard to first appointments to the Judicial branch from the ranks of barristers, advocates, or pleaders, competition would be out of place; but that no barrister, advocate, or pleader should be so appointed who has not been in the active practice of his profession for at least three years, and is not qualified by such a knowledge of the vernacular language as is required on the part of other persons before first appointment to the Provincial Service. 30. That no person should be considered eligible for recruitment in the Provincial Service unless he furnishes satisfactory evidence--(a) that he is not over twenty-five years of age (except in the case of barristers, advocates, or pleaders appointed to the Judicial branch otherwise than by competitive examination); (b) that he has attained a prescribed preliminary standard of education, and especially of qualification in one of the vernacular languages of the Province in which he is to be employed. The vernacular standard should be a high one, involving a thorough knowledge of the language and ability to write and read the written character with facility; and the evidence required should ordinarily be either a certificate of having passed in the vernacular language and literature by the highest standard of the vernacular school examination, or passing that standard before a Board of Examiners appointed for the purpose of the examination; (c) that he is of sound health, good physique, and active habits; and (d) that he is of good character. 31. That all persons appointed to the Provincial Service by recruitment should be subject to a period of probation or training during which time their appointment should be probationary or provisional only, unless in special cases the Government considers such probation or training unnecessary. 32. That the Government of India should retain power in very special cases and under prescribed conditions to make direct appointments to offices in the higher grades of the Provincial Service. 33. That, in order to provide a sufficient guarantee of fitness, the exercise of this power in the case of the Judicial branch should be confined to barristers, advocates, or pleaders of the High and Chief Courts, who are suitable in other respects and have shown distinguished ability in the exercise of their profession for a period of not less than ten years, but that in the case of any such occasional appointment the qualifications described above in regard to a thorough knowledge of the vernacular should be fully insisted upon. 34. That the recruitment of the Provincial Service should be in all cases made under rules to be sanctioned by the Government of India, such rules being published for general information and republished annually in the Local Government Gazettes. 35. That in the High Courts of Calcutta and Bombay the number of Judges selected from the Judicial branch of the Provincial Service or from advocates or pleaders of the High Courts should be increased, and that a similar course should be pursued in regard to the High Court at Madras in the event of the strength of that Court being increased to six Judges. 36. That, if the Statute 24 and 25 Vic., Cap. 104, is amended, advocates of High Courts should be expressly declared to be eligible for the appointment of Judges of the High Courts. 37. That the orders of the Secretary of State and of the Government of India, passed in 1879, which forbid the appointment without previous sanction of persons other than Natives of India to offices carrying salaries of Rs. 200 a month or upwards in certain Departments of the Uncovenanted Service, should be cancelled; and that, when it is considered necessary to recruit Europeans for the Provincial Service otherwise than under the published rules, the recruitment should be made in Europe and by Her Majesty's Secretary of State. 38. That it is inexpedient to lay down a rule restricting the recruitment for the Provincial Service to residents of the Province concerned; but that, while recruitment for the Provincial Service should be open to all natural-born subjects of Her Majesty, the Government of India should prescribe from time to time such limitations in respect of residence or otherwise as may be considered expedient, and that, as a general rule, recent residence of at least three years in a Province should be an essential condition of admission to the Provincial Service. 39. That the grades of pay in the Provincial Service and the pay of appointments to be held by its members, together with the general conditions of such service as to leave and retiring annuity, should be fixed on independent grounds and bear no relative proportion to those of the Imperial Service. 40. That the pay of officers of the Provincial Service appointed specially to high office for exceptional merit and ability, on the rare occasions on which the Secretary of State may exercise the powers reserved to him, should receive special consideration at the time; and that for appointments made directly by Her Majesty the pay and the rules governing leave and pension should be the same for all incumbents whether belonging to the Imperial or the Provincial Service or appointed from outside the service of Government. 41. That with regard to appointments to which graded pay is not attached but which it may be intended usually to fill from the Provincial Service, the pay should be fixed with reference to what is required for the Provincial Service and not by a consideration of the pay which would be required for members of the Imperial Service when appointed. 42. That retrospective effect should not be given to alterations made in pension rules against the will of persons, being already in the service of the Government, who may be injuriously affected thereby; and that, when alterations are made, persons in the service should be allowed the option of adhering to the old rules or accepting the new rules as a whole with all their advantages and disadvantages. 43. That the recommendations of the Commission regarding the creation of a Provincial Service and the recruitment of that service are subject to due consideration for the rights of existing incumbents of all classes of appointments which may be affected by its proposals. 44. That Statutory Civilians in actual service should be absorbed into the Provincial Service in such positions as, having regard to the circumstances of each case, the Government of India may consider to be equitable. 45. That before the dismissal of any member of the Provincial Service, otherwise than on the result of a judicial investigation, he should be afforded an opportunity for enquiry under the law for the time being in force relating to enquiries into the behaviour of public servants.

OPINION OF THE PRESS.

.....this interesting book. We are justified in so terming it, not on account of any romantic adventures that the author has to relate, nor of any very new discoveries in geography or natural history. There is something particular as regards ethnology; and a great deal of human nature in the book, shown to the reader with a simplicity and candour which bear testimony to its truth. Called, from the busy haunts of men in the city to dwell for a time in Independent Tipperah as a judicious adviser to its Chief, Doctor Mookerjee relates his adventures during the several journeys to and fro in that capacity, without revealing the secrets of the State, like a good diplomatist. He has adhered strictly to the advice which he offers to his brethren of the Native Press, and has written what he saw and knows, without revealing all, considering what he might properly say and what withhold..... The above seems to be a curious passage to be found in a book of travels, and appears to have no connection with the subject. But it arises from a casual reference to a slaughter house, and a writer who "thundered weekly against the outrage of locating shambles in the immediate vicinity of a Hindoo temple"—where, in fact, no temple could be said to exist. Hence, the Doctor advises his fellow-scribes not to be Pharisees, righteous over-much, but to look and be sure of their facts. In the same spirit, he has written his book. He gives an account of his travels, which seem often to have been voyages, upon the wide-spreading rivers of Eastern Bengal which in the rains become almost inland seas. On these he philosophises on the nature of the country and the people, making careful observation of his facts; and though he sometimes fancies he knows better than his boatmen, and more than suspects that they are getting the better of him, he submits with a grace that would have done credit to Socrates, and accepts the apparently inevitable in the interests of peace. The Doctor is a close observer of nature, animate and inanimate, with an eye to the picturesque as well as to the sublime and beautiful. And although there is a vein of cynicism running through many of his observations, it is tempered by such evident good nature, that even a stranger would receive him to be a laughter-loving rather than a stern philosopher. This is evident in his descriptions of his boatmen and others, when he denounces the lawlessness which has made the poor fishermen suspicious even of honest intentions, because they have so long been the helpless victims of marauders stronger than themselves. Their only defence is flight or deceit, and the latter is their justification as a mode of self-protection. We are shown not only the weakness of the people, but the shortcomings of the administration that leave these things possible..... The author is impartial in his censures..... There is much in the book to which space forbids us to refer. That it is not a prosy one may be gathered from the fact that, for its 300 pages, there are nearly as many index references. Many of the subjects are necessarily but lightly treated, but all sensibly and fairly. And Dr. Mookerjee is such a master of the English language that in the whole book we have scarcely found a phrase that might not have been written by an Englishman "to the manor born." There is nothing in it at which any one could reasonably take offence; and there is much from which both Englishmen and natives may learn greatly-needed lessons.—The Indian Daily News, Nov. 22, 1887.

"TRAVELS IN BENGAL. Such is the title of a most interesting little work published a short time ago. Its author is Babu Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee, the well-known Editor of the Reis and Rayyet, the most original, cleverly-written and interesting journal in India. Babu Sambhu Chunder is one of the veteran Indian writers in English. He is the master of a most happy, racy pleasant style, which you can easily make out from amongst the writings of a hundred different men. In racy humorous writing Babu Sambhu Chunder has no rival among his Indian contemporaries. He won his first laurels, we believe, by his writings in his own periodical, the Mookerjee's Magazine, now long-defunct. In this magazine articles of great learning and excellence appeared, mostly from the pen of Babu Sambhu Chunder. He has written several other booklets. His Causes of the Mutiny; Mr. Wilson, Lord Canning and the Income Tax; the Career of an Indian Princess, Her Highness the late Secundra Begum of Bhopal; and the Prince in India and to India are publications which attracted considerable notice. His latest production "Travels in Bengal" is a work of great merit. It is at once a bright faithful and interesting picture of native scenery and life in Bengal, although Mr. Mookerjee does not profess to write a picture of Bengal life and uses his pencil in its portraiture only in passing. The dedication is characteristic. [Extract.]

The "Travels" are travels in East Bengal, travels and voyages between Calcutta and Independent Tipperah. We do not believe many people in this side of India know that there is such an independent State as Tipperah. But nevertheless such a state exists. We will give here a summary of its history in the words of Mr. Mookerjee—He writes:—"[Extract.] Mr. Mookerjee was Dewan of Independent Tipperah for some five years in all between 1877 and 1881. The travels are an account of his voyages to and from Tipperah.

Those who have travelled in Bengal, particularly in its Eastern districts, which are the districts described in Mookerjee's book, will bear him out in his statement that Lower Bengal is not stale, flat and unprofitable, that, on the contrary, she is the beautifullest country in the world. She has no high mountains, but she has rivers apparently as vast as the sea, to make her scenery grand and majestic. She has a hundred rivers ever overflowing with water, thousands of transparent lakes, covered with the lily and a hundred beautiful water-flowers, thousands of seas of ever-waving paddy fields, thousands of clusters of bamboo and of great trees dressed in beautiful creepers adorning the river banks, to make her the loveliest country in the world. Even a Bengali needs to see and travel Bengal to adequately know her thousand witching charms. For a foreigner it is well nigh impossible to get even an approximate idea of what they are like from description, however candid and faithful. Let us hear what our author and say on the subject. We read:—[Extract.]

The Bay sea is thus inimitably described. [Extract.]

One will quote a passage of another character:—[Extract.]

We could cull many such gems. But space forbids it. We will, however, quote some passages of another kind. Our traveller, though old in years, is evidently young in heart, for no one in the romantic age of youth could be more appreciative of female charms than our traveller. In every other page you find our author describing in terms of enthusiasm some rural girl or woman of beauty. [Extract.] In the next page we find our traveller's attention [Extract.]

There is the description, physical and moral, of a Colonel, which we cannot resist the temptation of reproducing, although the article has already exceeded the usual length. [Extract.]

We have now given extracts enough to show that the little book of travels is most delightful reading. It contains graphic descriptions of natural scenery, faithful portraiture of men and manners, and happy, good humoured observations on them. There is not an ill-natured or unkind word in the whole book—it overflows in every page with the milk of human kindness. Every observation testifies to the author being a keen observer of men and things, as an example of which we can mention the instructive and interesting chapter on the Native Christians of Portuguese extraction in Tipperah. Again, although the book does not pretend to deal with life in Bengal, the glimpses of that life we find in it are very considerable and pleasant. We will now conclude by recommending the book to all who may wish to spend a few hours amidst happy thoughts and pleasant pictures.—

S. K. C.

—The Tribune, Nov. 26, 1887.

If we have not before noticed Mr. Sambhu C. Mookerjee's Travels in Bengal, which was published some months ago, it is not because the little book is either dull or pointless. It contains, on the contrary, much interesting matter, though some of the incidents are over-weighted with detail in what is facetiously called a "little booklet." The author's view as a rule is, by the way, facetious: he is given even to punning; but he is also sentimental in the highest degree—"a naked Whiteman" hurts his sensibilities; a Hindu girl, bathing in the river, throws him into an ecstasy of delight: "Necessary had such large languishing eyes!" nothing if not philosophical, and his objections on this or that social and political subject are not without their moral. Mr. Sambhu C. Mookerjee was formerly Minister to the "last of the Nawabs Nazim of Bengal, Behar and Orissa" and afterwards Minister of the Maharaja of Tipperah. He is a man, therefore, of experience, and when he speaks his brethren should listen to him....

Travels in Bengal is a readable book, and it abounds in anecdotes which are often as instructive as amusing, and it is not spoiled by too many political allusions, though, of course, some few have crept in.—The Pioneer, Dec. 1887.

It may be well-known to all of our readers that Babu Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee the veteran editor of the Reis and Rayyet newspaper, has just published a book describing the four voyages that he made between Calcutta and Independent Tipperah when he had to go and to return from the latter place in the capacity of the minister to its prince. The literature yet produced in the English tongue by our own countrymen is very scanty and any sensible addition to it cannot well escape the attention of the public press. Much greater therefore should be the attention claimed on behalf of a book which comes from the pen of so well-known a writer in the field of Indian journalism as Babu Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee. That gentleman's career as a writer fills nearly the last thirty years, and there has hardly been any subject of public importance during that long period which has not occupied his attention. Master of an inimitable racy style, with a vast store of classical allusions ever ready at the call, and possessing an infinite fund of humour, our author often cultivates every thing that he touches, and his peculiar strength lies in description. We therefore welcome the appearance of this book more especially as the subject is one which to make it interesting, requires a lively colouring and a rich, picturesque and imaginative description. There exist several books of travels written by eminent Englishmen, and every one of these differs perhaps, in their conception and plan of execution. Of these none was more widely read in the course of the last few years than Carlyle's reminiscences of an Irish Journey in 1849. That book is made up of extracts from diaries and the worst features of it are the bitter and caustic personal remarks interspersed throughout the book. However that may suit the polished and fashionable taste of England, in our country it would have been singularly out of place and we are glad that Babu Sambhu Chunder has confined himself to the description of those natural sceneries he passed through, and the means of travel in the distant and little-known regions of East Bengal. That the rivers of Bengal, with their circuitous and entangling courses do enshrine in them a deep spirit of poetry and are of sincere interest to the real man of imagination, is proved by the fact that Sir William Hunter, than whom a more accomplished man of letters never passed the best years of his life in Bengal, should have chosen the subject for his very interesting address at Oxford, the other day. The gentle waves, the gentler ripples, the grassy banks, the ever-entwining courses, the pleasant air, the sceneries on both sides make the rivers of Bengal a genuine thing of interest to those whose eyes are perpetually fed by the artificial gloss and dross of civilization and few could have set perhaps the loveliness of our rivers in better light than our accomplished author. His eloquent sentences, marching in regular order one after another, and embodying in their selves, every minute detail, that can lend to a scene its finest artistic effect, seem to place the reader in the very midst of sceneries described, and the man of leisure who would acquaint himself with the state of things in East Bengal, can hardly resort to a better book. The journeys which are described in this volume are certainly uneventful and though they correspond to facts as they furnish no interesting situation, no critical moments, to the seeker of intellectual excitement and this will no doubt constitute a serious objection to the book on the part of sensational seeking readers. None has however any thing to quarrel with the choice of a subject that any author may choose to write upon and none of the outside public can afford any explanation as to why the author should have preferred one subject to another. We think however there are one or two indications of bad taste. Still we welcome the appearance of this book and trust that it is but the first of a long series of works in writing which our author should spend the matured experience and the literary facility of a well-spent life.—Young Bengal, Feb. 2, 1888.

We owe an apology to Mr. Sambhu C. Mookerjee for the apparent negligence with which we have treated that delightful work of his—Travels in Bengal. Mr. Mookerjee, as almost every one knows, is one of the best English scholars in India; he writes as gracefully as does the most scholarly Englishman, and ample proof of this is afforded in the pages of his book before us, which is an interesting narrative of four journeys,—“two trips to Tipperah and two trips back”—accompanied by historical, geographical, cartographical and many other—ical notes of the lands passed through. We confess we have been but through the first half of the work, and, as we have proposed to review it in two papers, we think our progress sufficient for present purposes. Our author has not, as far as we have read, met with those thrilling adventures we read of—oft with a certain amount of sneaking disbelief—in the average hunter's narratives or traveller's tales; peaceful as the bosom of a still lake were his journeyings in Bengal Proper. He carried no formidable weapons with him, save and except a rusty old gun which, when called into requisition once, refused to go off; and yet withal, few more delightful works of travel in India have we read than the one now under our hands. The charms of true yet eloquent description, the force of observation, the gift of seeing sermons in stones, are all possessed in a great degree by Mr. Mookerjee; and we are pleasantly surprised at the lively and fascinating manner in which he can palm off on the reader the dreariest incident of his trips. Mr. Mookerjee will forgive us if we mention that we think him a very gallant old gentleman—with the accent on the second syllable. He has evinced in his little work a weakness for describing the Beauties of Bengal with all the poetic aidours of a Strepson. Did we not know enough of the erudite and good old "Babu" editor, we might be inclined to call this particular weakness of his, in Carlyle's language—"a Byronism of taste." Here is how he speaks of a beautiful damsel he saw disporting in the running waters of the beautiful Megna, at Sonargoan:— [Extract.]

But the above excerpt is not the best thing in the book by far. Although every line in it which we have gone over, is a line that we ourselves having written, would not wish to blot out, there are passages in it which surprise us and raise our hearts to a higher level by their eloquence, their beauty and wealth of expression. Running through the pages of Travels in Bengal is a vein of quiet humour—that humour which makes us fall in love with writers and tempts us to fly to them for solace in trouble, for a return of serenity in moments of vexation. Mr. Mookerjee has, in his work, added one more to the innumerable anecdotes relative to the fidelity of man's best friend among brutes—the dog. The sentinel duties of a canine phenomenon—Tom by name—are related in glowing terms, but we shall not rob the author of one of his finest plums by transferring it into our columns. This review, as we have already stated, is but the introductory one. In our next, or a little later, we shall take up Mr. Mookerjee's book where we are leaving it off, and make our readers a little more familiar with one of the cleverest native gentlemen of the day and with his interesting book on travels in Baboodom. Mr. Mookerjee, like all his fellow mortals, is human, and he has let us know this in his present work. How, we propose to state only in our second review. Would he however pardon us if we surrender to the temptation of finishing this up with his pretty remarks about Mooning and the Moon. After "the contending gods of the elements" had "left off" one night when our traveler was on the bosom of the Megna, he watched Luna issue from behind the clouds in all her grandeur and radiance. That sight, so delightful to the mind with a leaning towards the aesthetic and poetic, gave vent to the following: [Extract.]

Now, the above will prove a grand surprise to the European readers especially, who may perhaps be unkind enough to doubt that it was written by a "Babu" just as people have doubted that Shakespere was really the author of Shakespere and Tennyson the author of Tennyson. Mr. Mookerjee and we part here, but when work is done and we sit in our cosy arm-chair at home and watch, as is our wont, the blue smoke curl gracefully away from our pipe, we shall dream with waking eyes of the beautiful Megna and the damsels of Bengal, of the moon and the waters, and we know that we shall again take up the Travels in Bengal and satisfy our wish of getting to the end of such a pleasant little work.—The Malabar and Travancore Spectator, February 4, 1888.

There are capital medicines besides—for piles, all the 20 kinds of flux—such as spermatorrhœa, diabetes, &c.—diarrhœa, rheumatism, puerperal complaints, cataract of the eye, nagra, asthma, &c.

[Certificate.]

"I have known Babu Rajendra Nath Ghoshal Kubitaj for upwards of 15 years, and I can bear ample testimony to the wonderful efficacy of his medicine in the treatment of diseases of the womb. While Assistant Surgeon of Monghyr and subsequently, I have known him to cure the most obstinate cases of uterine Leucorrhœa and other uterine derangements, organic and functional. I can safely call his medicine the Specific for Leucorrhœa and painful menstruation. Ladies who have been subject to these diseases for years and were barren have been cured and borne children.

THE STORY OF A K. S. I.

A Lay of Ind.

BY A B. C. S.

There was a Taluqdar so bold,
Who lived in Fyzabad,
And lots of silver and of gold,
Lacs of Rupees he had.
And houses fine and acres broad,
As far as eye could scan,
He got by force and kept by fraud,
He was a clever man.

And when within the Ballie Guard,
That little band at bay,
Through famine sore and battle hard,
Maintained the unequal fray,
He waited till it should be seen
Which way the fight would go,
For he would strike a blow

He played that double game with skill,
Saved half a dozen lives.

He did not treat our babies ill,
Or massacre our wives.
But sent our foes all he could send,
Told us all we would know,
For he was neither faithful friend
Nor honorable foe.

So when we gained the victory,
He kept his rank and lands,
And officers of all degrees,
And Taluqdars of Oudh,
He knew so well how all to please,
Did sound his praises loud.
But though he had rank and honors high,
One thing still grieved him sore,
He had not got the K. S. I.
They gave to Bulrampore.

"Now since he has got that blessed thing,
I swear by Gungajec,
My name is Maun Sing,
A K. S. I. I'll be."

So to the Chief Commissioner
He went and thus did say—
"Give me the Star of India,
You dare not say me nay,
For, if I and my Taluqdars,
The fact you must confess,
Consent not to your precious laws,
Won't you be in a mess?"

Then give me India's Star,
Which you so vainly want,
What I bid them they will do,
What I forbid they shant.
Thus will the Barons give consent,
And you may bless your fates,
And go and pass your bill of laws
And rent for Oudh estates."

So as the ox submissive kneels
And meekly bears the blows,
The youthful legislator feels
The hook within his nose.
So honest John in Simla's hills,
Unwilling but lachar,
So much he wished to pass those bills,
He gave the rogue the Star.

Ho! Senators wise in Council board,
Ho! soldiers brave in fight,
Join all due honors to accord,
To greet your new-made Knight,
For, he shall sit your ranks among,
At the great Oudh Durbar,
And glittering on that neck unhung
They'll hang the Exalted Star.

NEWS AND COMMENTS.

THE triad of Scribes and Pharisees of native Indian politics of the day are Surrender Not, No render to Cæsar, and the latter's bottle-holder of a Bad show. The family name of the last is written with an initial B, but since he outraged the family and the family disowned him, he has been driven to the Grimm Law.

It is the age of economists, calculators, and statisticians. Here is a sample of—sweets to the sweet! It is said that one pound of honey is gathered by the bees from 90,000 to 225,000 flowers. Why not from 50,000 to 1,50,000?

IT is the day of the publicans and sinners, likewise. In Holy Benares itself, at the late elections to the local board, an obscure Kalwar has been chosen against a wellknown gentleman, a Koolin Kayastha, Baboo Bireswar Mitra, a Fellow of the Calcutta University, Professor of Law at the Benares College, and one of the leaders of the local bar.

THE Agent to the Governor-General for Central India has been to Rutlam, to invest the Maharaja with the Order of the Indian Empire. In the course of his Durbar speech, Sir Lepel Griffin made the startling announcement:—

"In another part of Central India, it will, in a few days, be my painful duty to deprive a ruling Prince of all his administrative powers, in accordance with the sentence passed on him by the Supreme Government for the continued neglect and abuse of them."

The Holkar is believed to be the Prince in question.

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given, any other being unnecessary, and likely to cause confusion.

THE Boorooa Mangal at Benares was this year saddened by a disaster. In the ride of the united procession, a boat containing 20 or 30 souls was run down by three larger boats and sank immediately in a deep part of the river. It is satisfactory to learn that all were saved except 3.

THERE was a fire at the Ichapore Gun Powder Factory on Monday last, in one of the mill rooms. There was no loss of life and but little damage to property. The cause is being investigated DARBHANGA is out on a shooting excursion in his estate on the Koosi in North Purnea, leading the Duc d'Orleans, Prince Henri d'Orleans, the Duke of Montrose and the Marquis and Marquise de Mores. The party have taken the field with 80 elephants.

THE Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal is touring through the Hazareebagh districts. On Saturday he held a Durbar for bestowing khillats on the Maharajas of Chota Nagpore and Sirgooja.

THE Government of India mourn the death of Emperor William thus in a Gazette of India Extraordinary issued in black in the afternoon of Thursday the 15th :—

"Official intelligence having been received from Her Majesty's Secretary of State for India that the funeral of His late Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Germany will take place on the 16th instant, the Governor-General in Council directs that as a mark of respect to His Imperial Majesty's memory, flags shall be hoisted half mast high from sunrise to sunset on that day in all forts and stations throughout India and that 91 guns, corresponding with the age of His late Imperial Majesty, shall be fired at all Head Quarters Stations."

THE Englishman quotes from a Bombay paper the following notable sentiment on the Emperor's death :—

"We remember nothing so pathetic in history, except, perhaps, the death of Socrates."

That is grand, beyond question, whatever it may mean. It is the Mesopotamia of obsequial, and, we may add, obsequious literature, and must act like Mother Seigel's Syrup on the surviving relations and friends of the Emperor—specially old Dowagers and Duchesses. It is difficult for ordinary mortals to perceive any point of resemblance between the death of the Emperor William and the death of Socrates, beyond the mere death. But genius conquers difficulties and it is the privilege of wit to discover analogies that escape the world.

IN the House of Commons, on the 14th, a Bill substituting solemn affirmations for oaths has been read a second time, with a majority of 100.

THE Goa Government have adopted the petroleum duty of British India.

THE escort of the Afghan Boundary Commission returning to India, reached, on the 5th instant, Jija which is about 34 miles from Salzawar on the left bank of the Adraskand on the road from Farah to Herat. All reported well.

H. H. the Sultan of Zanzibar is on a visit to the hot springs at Boshor on the Oman coast. He arrived at Muscat on the 4th instant, and left next day for Gobra without landing.—Press Commissioner.

THE Privy Council have upset the decision of the Judicial Commissioner, D. Duthoit, in the Bulrampore case. Their Lordships seem to be of opinion that the Senior Maharani alone is entitled to succeed and to adopt, the Junior Maharani receiving only an annuity of Rs. 25,000 for life. Their Lordships leave open the questions between the Senior Maharani and the son adopted by her.

THE Mirror does not mince matters—not even in compliments. When it has a chance of making a salaam to the great, it simply goes down flat on the floor on all fours. A recent editorial note concludes with an appeal thiswise :—

"but we hope Sir Steuart Bayley His Honor the present Lieutenant-Governor will not act upon the petition of the Ranis, who may have been again duped by interested parties."

THE following in the same issue of our contemporary is symptomatic of a graver aberration :—

"Mr. Grierson's paper on the Medical Literature of Hindustan, read at the Vienna Congress, has been published by Mr. Alfred Holder, Editor of the 'Court and University Press,' Vienna."

Mr. Grierson is a wellknown scholar, who has made the study of Hindustani specially his own. But the public was not aware that he was a medical man into the bargain and had been devoting himself to the medical literature of Upper India. We are not sure whether it will be grateful to the Indian Mirror for this curious piece of news, seeing that the statement quoted is followed by the explanation that

"The essay has special reference to Tulsi Das, whose place in the history of India is of the first importance. As Mr. Grierson says, his Ramayana, apart from its literary merits, is a remarkable work from the mere fact of its universal acceptance by all classes of the Hindu community."

To parody a famous sentence of Tom Paine's, that explanation itself requires an explanation to make it intelligible. What possible connection may exist between Medicine and Tulsidas passes our understanding. Is the Ramayana—the Tulsidas at any rate—a work in medical literature? The Sphinx must solve her own riddle, as Emerson would say. The Mirror is the High Priest of Theosophy, and what appears like the raving of a mad man may be the right thing in occult science as interpreted by the rum chums Sen and Padshah.

THE Lieutenant-Governor has ordered exemption, from the 1st of 1888, of rice and grain, pulses of all kinds, seeds of all kinds, from payment of the terminal charge levied on goods conveyed on the East Indian Railway into and from the station of Howrah. Passenger on the railway are also saved the terminal fees.

THE pretty little country town of 4,000 inhabitants called Mount Vernon, in the State of Illinois, was, on the 10th February, chastised very nearly out of existence altogether, like the "Cities of the plain." The cyclone was preceded by the usual thunder and rain for some time. Then the ominous low rumbling sound was heard, and presently a black cloud, like a dense concrete mass spreading from heaven to earth and seemingly filling all space, swept over the land by way of drawing the cap over the eyes of the victim. In the darkness the relentless deed was done—the city was nearly destroyed. It was the lashing of a moment. That blast of the hurricane had blown down a greater part of the town. Fire now completed the havoc of the other elements. The wretched inhabitants who could fled in dismay from the fury of storm and conflagration, leaving their fellows—men, women and children—crying for help. It was not till midnight, the wind and rain subsiding, their confusion abated and their courage and sense of duty revived and they proceeded in right earnest to rescue the wounded and the dying from the ruins, or save those who were encompassed by the flames which still raged and put down the fire.

Such was the "terrible tornado" as it is called. In the East, towards the Chinese coasts, it would have been a "simoom." In India, we have invented a word for circular atmospheric disturbance of intensity—"cyclone," which since 1864 we have come popularly to apply to all tufans, gales, hurricanes and storms of violence. That word has now been incorporated in the English dictionaries.

ONE of the least harmful dissipations of Oriental leisure is marrying or giving in marriage. The good Maharaja of Benares is at once too old and respectable to think of engaging in the Tamasha combual in propria persona. But he is blessed with a son and, joy upon joy, that son has a son. The latter is a child of course, but in a country where contracts are made between wombs on the chance of sexual difference of their outcome, that is no impediment. Accordingly, for some time, both the son and the grandson have been in the matrimonial market. The Maharaja naturally longs to complete the line of Indian happiness by seeing his grandchild married. A suitable bride has been selected and the necessary arrangements being quietly made. Meanwhile, by way of training and preparation for a not very fruitful family which has not had much practice in the line, the young father, the Maharaj Kumar, with his wife, the mother of the boy who is his rival in the matrimonial mart, living, has married a second time—not her, but another girl,—a different one, too, by the way, from the intended bride of his son. Our blessed customs and ways are so remote from the experiences and associations of other countries and peoples that we think it safe in the interest of our European readers to be thus precise.

The great marriage is not quite so close, we take it, seeing that our friend Raja Siva Prasad is still writing to the Pioneer from Ghazeepore apparently engaged in drawing what much is possible out of the land before the Russians should come and disposses all Bania landlords

MR. HOWELL has arrived at Hyderabad and has taken over charge from Mr. Cordery. It is to be hoped the new Resident will be able to suppress the intriguers that prey upon the Nizam.

LORD DUFFERIN leaves Calcutta on Thursday, the 29th March, and arrives at Simla on or about the 9th May, taking in Rewah, Lucknow, Murree, Srinuggur, Umballa and Pinjore in the way.

The Lieutenant-Governor returned to the capital yesterday, after his tour in the Hazareebagh District.

NOTES AND LEADERETTES.

STEUART BAYLEY having been prevailed upon by the irrepressible Raja of the town to receive it back to caste, the reign of Baboo Kissen Mookerjee, hitherto, by grace of the god Beames, standing official Chairman of the municipality, has ended in Uttarpara. In exercise of the newly conferred privilege of electing their own Chairman, the new Board have elected Baboo Siv Narayan Mookerjee. As the Jeykissen-Peary Mohan "Caucus" triumphed at the recent general election, and the Board is now composed almost entirely of one party, there is a complete devolution of power. We are rather alarmed at the prospect. For the credit of the country, we hope the victors will use their success with moderation. We rely upon the correcting influence of Babu Jeykissen, the patriarch of the camp.

PERTAB SINGH, the Sikh Sirdar, who, having been detected in political intrigue in the name of Maharaja Dhuleep Singh, had been thrown into confinement, has escaped from the District Jail of Lahore. This does not speak well for the loyalty or efficiency of Jail administration in the Frontier Provinces. Or, did the authorities connive at the escape for want of sufficient evidence justifying the gentleman's detention, as the Government of Lord Mayo would have done well to let the poor hide-man of Colootollah go out of Dr. Fawcus's castle on the Maidan? If Pertab be an enemy and a determined character, he will yet be heard of.

A PLANTER of Java is credited with the discovery of a process of manufacturing indigo which, without deterioration of quality, increases the yield from 25 to 35 per cent. Java planters have an initial advantage over the employers of free labour in India. The Culture System which chaimed Mr. J. W. Money, of the Calcutta bar and of the Indian family of that ilk, into the production of his two vols. on the problem How to manage a Colony, is a vicious institution incompatible with the freedom and improvement of the children of the soil. It is demoralising to the Whites too. In the long run, it is somehow fatal to the prosperity of the governing race. Such selfishness has reduced the once extensive colonial empire of Holland to insignificance. The immediate advantage of the system to the European planters is obvious. If to that advantage they have added the benefit of a new and economical process, they will be able to distance all competitors in the markets of the world. That is a dark prospect for Indian manufacture. We hope our Planters will take heed bet. TH.rompt inquiries ought to be made into the discovery. There does not seem to be any mystery about it, as we would of planters who have given the new method a trial. But if necessary a man should be sent over to learn the process quietly, and all the ways of production in Java.

ONE G. Henrickson of Australia has suggested to the Victoria Central Board of Health a cure for snake bite. Many years ago, Liebig had remarked that the gall bladder of swine contains an acid distinct from that of any other animal. The Australian has recently observed that pigs are proof against snake bite, and he is disposed to attribute the immunity to their gall, and suggests that experiments be made on other animals to prove or disprove its efficacy. Snakes are not proof against themselves. It were strange to find pigs alone safe from the universal enemy of animal life, Liebig's acid notwithstanding.

The matter is no doubt worth inquiry. But care should be taken to ascertain the toxic virulence of the snakes. The Victorians might with advantage import a cargo of cobras. We can let them have the article cheap. There need be little fear of the reptiles degenerating in the "pilgrim fathers." Certainly inattention to these precautions has been the source of much error and repeated mistakes, entailing great sacrifices. About fifteen years ago great credit was claimed by, and given to, Australia for discovering a specific against snake-poison. We ourself took great interest in the discovery and imported from Sydney 15 copies of Professor Halford's pamphlets, hoping that at last God had vouchsafed the cure for the attack of the insidious reptile, which bites thousands of the poor of our country to a torturing death. Alas! for the poor, it proved an Australian "sell." There was nothing particularly new in Professor Halford's treatment by ammonia, unless it be that he recommends hypodermic injection. But injection or no injection, nothing avails against bite in earnest of the genuine worm of death—which we always thought a very appropriate character for the Father of Evil to assume. Not that Professor Halford's experiments are apocryphal, but there must have been a screw loose somewhere. We once thought the ever-deceiving snake played the Professor false. They shammed and shied and withheld their hypodermic injection and so on. But now it appears that the Halford cure has been exploded in Australia itself.

Oh! glorious is the Festival of Spring that pride subdues,
Decking the common things of life with rich, unwonted hues.

Right glorious is the Holi o' Hind! that likes not hollow mould
Of hearts from eager sympathies fenced round with cautious gold.
The poet and the painter then walk forth with step unbound,
And gaze abroad with glistening eye, that never seeks the ground,
Like the fiction bravely coin'd of the poet devotee,
Nature, that shackled ever was, triumphantly seems free.

But it is past—strange, innocent Millenium of a week;
Next morn their usual pasture dull the sober'd herd will seek.

The Indian Carnival has this year come to a mournful ending, at one place at least in Bengal. The scene was in the backwoods, beyond the purview of the Press—out of reach of reporters—so the world moves on in its accustomed groove of joy and sorrow, business and recreation, in absolute unconcern because in blessed unconsciousness, as though nothing had been the matter anywhere. Else there would have been a twenty-four hours' sensation and some days' conversation, and perhaps some pious if not very rational impeachment of the Hindu religion and some political reflections on, or rather against, the Hindu character.

In the heart of the wild country skirting Lower Bengal on the West, lies the Pachete hills of Maunbhoom. These hills are the seat of a petty principality of some pretensions in the past though now fallen and even obscure. Though now a mere Zemindari, and not the best managed either, Pachete, like Vishumpur and other neighbouring chiefships, was not without political importance in the days of the Mogul and the Pathan. Without prestige, shorn of power and privilege, the quasi Rajput Raja lives in solitary grandeur in the midst of the wilderness, feeding his pride on the traditions of the past. Of course, he sticks to the ways of the old world and maintains all the fasts and festivities of his forefathers. He patronises musicians and dancing women, athletes and fakirs. Shawl-dealers and jewellers and perfume-fumers visit him. For the Indian ballet, he has a special weakness. During his confinement in 1857, at Burdwan, on suspicion of treason and war against Queen Victoria, though in reality in retaliation for unparliamentary language towards officials and tweaking their nose (metaphorically)—he had had professional girls brought up from Calcutta to relieve his loneliness. Returned home and to freedom, he caused the old Pachete hills to ring with revelry and joy—fit token of deliverance.

At the principal festivals and on special occasions, musicians and dancing girls from various parts repair to Kashipore. For the last Holi, three or four girls had been ordered up from Patna and a similar batch from Calcutta. The Calcutta consignment was a miscellaneous lot, consisting of a Jewess, a Mussulmani from Muchooa Bazar named Mukhan, and a brace of khemtis from Sonagachi. These different artistes performed before the light-hearted if hoary-headed patron throughout the festival. On the last evening they assembled as usual at the Rajbari in the hall of audience situated between the male apartments and the ladies' quarters. The large room was laid out with carpets and lighted with chandeliers. At one end was placed the Raja's divan or cushioned seat on the floor. All the professionals were in attendance at the same time, for though one set only performed at a time the others sat in the same room.

The scene was lively and might have been picturesque but for that element of barbarism which lurks in even the most pretentious efforts of Orientalism. Thus in this Raja's room—and he was by no means singular—a number of torches were introduced, blackening the walls, fittings and furniture and poisoning the room with their stench, and altogether destroying the beauty of the scene. These torches finally became the death of the party and of several of those who shared in the amusement.

One of the peculiar amusements in the festival is the throwing of red powder on men and women, attacking them with soft balls of frail solu covers filled with the powder, and injections of red liquid. This powder was scattered about in heaps on the carpet and on clothing of the people, and even on the very torches. Mixed with the oil which was ever and anon being poured on the rag padding of the flambeaus whence it dripped on the ground, these accumulations of the powder became quite inflammable and at last ignited into a flame—first on the torches and next, by droppings from these, on the floor. Soon the whole room was in a blaze. At first some attempt was made to stamp out the fire but the ignis fatuus suppressed at one spot reappeared at another. There was a panic and a "stampede." The Raja easily slipped into the seraglio. The Jewess had the good sense to follow him. To males that refuge was not open. The other women might have gone there, but they did not. Their dresses caught fire, and, struggling with modesty and the element, they fled in all other directions. The men were scarcely better off. Many were more or less burnt, some cruelly. One death occurred on the spot, it is said. The Mussulmani dansu of Calcutta returned home only to die. It is due to the Raja to say that he pressed all the strangers to remain and offered them every medical assistance in his power.

Such is the story of the Holi in Kashipore in Pachete as we can gather at Calcutta. We hope Government will order an inquiry.

THE London Daily News has thus happily "dished" the dapper Duke:—

"We may well excuse Charles Darwin for not seeing the full interpretation even of the facts which he has himself made known to us." So says his Grace the Duke of Argyll in Murray's Magazine for February. The Duke's whole article, supposed to be a review of Mr. Francis Darwin's Life of his father, is intensely funny. The assumption of superiority on the critic's part is the more delicious because it is obviously genuine, and in return for the amusement he gives us 'we may well excuse' the McCallum More for not seeing himself as others see him. Mr. Darwin, probably the most imaginative man of science who ever lived is dismissed by ducal authority to the category of mere 'observers.' Of course Mr. Darwin was an eminently acute and vigilant observer, but to declare that he was nothing else shows a deplorable lack of general intelligence, as well as of scientific knowledge. The Duke's proof of his proposition is as charming in its simplicity as the proposition itself. Mr. Darwin wrote 'My power to follow a long and purely abstract train of thought is very limited'; and 'his own estimate of his work is the true one.' This singular method of reasoning would prove the Duke of Argyll to be the greatest man in the world. For the Duke, as Sir William Haicourt pointed out, regards himself as infinitely above Mr. Darwin in science, and Mr. Gladstone in statesmanship. Let us leave him to the uncovenanted mercies of Professor Huxley."

The Duke is a wonderful pachyderm, however. For all the chastisement inflicted on him by the doughty Professor, he goes on as if nothing had been the matter with him. It is a great thing in England to be a Duke, even a poor Scotch one, and the McCallum More is one of the Queen's Own into the bargain. He has been so often and so thoroughly discredited and punished for literary intrusion into matters which do not concern him—for impertinent sciolism in subjects which he never cared to study properly—for cavalierly or rather ducal treatment of thorough specialists—that but for the fact that John Bull dearly loves a lord and, to give the duke his due, for the merit of his style, the entrées of the leading magazines would long since have been lost to him. There is something of the spider in his literary character. With all his sins, my Lord Duke of Argyll is no vulgar scribbler. Yet, we confess, the imperturbable pertinacity with which he again and again gathers up and mends his broken nets and lays them out to en-mesh the royal tigers of research as if they were mere flies to fall an easy prey, looks more like a symptom of malady than evidence of healthy literary activity.

Who shames a Duke? For break one cobweb through,
He spins the slight, self-pleasing thread anew:
Destroy his fib or sophistry; in vain!
The creature's at his dirty work again,
Throned on the centre of his thin designs,
Proud of a vast extent of flimsy lines!

WE are astonished to read, for the first time in the Madras Eastern Guardian of the 10th March, the following paragraph purporting to be a quotation from the Hindoo Patriot of this city:—

"The favourite lathi belonging to the noted badmash Ibrahim Arab, of Machooabazar, who so long exercised a terror over the residents of that quarter, and who was lately sentenced to a severe term of imprisonment, has been retained as a memento of this ruffian and has been mounted in silver, and the prisoner's sentence engraved thereon. The stick, which its owner delighted to nickname karak bidglee, is what usually solid and weighty, and as a weapon of assault it must have been a very ugly customer. The lathi is to be sent to England very shortly and the work of mounting has been placed in the hands of Mr. A. Steiner, jeweller of Chowringhee, at whose establishment it was to be viewed the other day."

Who is the precious dilettanti who has taken a fancy to this work of virtu though not of virtue, by any means? Men and women suffering from ennui will resort to desperate shifts for a little excitement or even occupation. According to the Tamils, the barber without work will shave a kitten. Proverbs to the same purport abound in Bengal and Hindustan. In Europe, for one thing, people go about collecting postage stamps of different countries. Some are seekers of autographs—others are shearers of notabilities. An aristocratic British authoress actually applied to the formidable Mahomad Ali Pasha of Egypt for a lock of his head. But the great Moslem would not be shorn even by a Nazarene lady who was a blue-stocking into the bargain, and he parried her attack with the good humoured offer of the legacy of his whole beard—for whatever it might be worth—to her.

Nothing could shame these hunters, however, and the mania continued unabated. Latterly, one of these intrusive innocents improved upon her predecessors by seeking the cast-off rags of men of any distinction. This kind of thing is silly enough, but it is also a nuisance. To its victims—we mean the eminent men who are hunted after—it is intolerable. But perhaps the most mischievous form of lion-hunting is the hunt after noted criminals and mementoes of them. And it is to this category of activity that the incident in the paragraph belongs. It is difficult to understand the rationalité of appreciation of the blackguard. There is nothing particular about the stick except its having been the cowardly weapon of its owner. To mount it in silver and preserve it, duly labelled and catalogued, for posterity, is the most contemptible degeneracy of hero-worship. Nor can it go without its evil influence on the public mind. The Villain of the Halfpenny sheets naturally becomes the model of many of the ragged boys who devour such literature. Madame Tussaud's Chamber of Horrors is now recognised as a virtual school of crime. Can we doubt what influence upon the rascality of the town has been exercised by the news that this modern Abraham's stick has been mounted in silver and is to be sent to Her Majesty for the benefit of her people?

The Police of Calcutta may, from natural feeling, respect a certain depredator and ruffian. Having allowed this very man to terrorise over the town, they may even regard his weapon as a trophy. But why should they do ought to glorify him and furnish a model of rascalocracy?

It would be curious to know the author of the bright idea who gave the orders? There is a little legal difficulty in the matter which seems to have escaped the ingenious person. The stick, for whatever it may be worth, is the State's and who can alienate the public property?

A CORRESPONDENT of the London Spectator has unearthed a curious passage from the "Leabhar Breac" quoted in Dr. Reeves's "Adamnan's Life of St. Columba," revealing the state of native civilisation in Ireland towards the close of the 7th century. The old Irish code is a curious indigenous product. Adamnan was an Irish Manu, and, of course, a worthy man. He contributed a notable piece of ecclesiastical legislation still known after him as the Law of Adamnan, which improving upon the Decalogue, enjoins—Thou shalt not kill women. It would scarcely occur to any one to preach such a precept in especial without occasion. What a horrible society it must be where such a law is required! The Irish must have felt the degradation implied in such legislation and they put as much of a good face upon the matter as possible. The traditional origin of the Law of Adamnan is thus given in the "Leabhar Breac" as follows:—

"Adamnan happened to be travelling one day through the plain of Bregia [a district roughly corresponding to Meath] with his mother on his back, when they saw two armies engaged in mutual conflict. It happened then that Ronait, the mother of Adamnan, observed a woman, with an iron reaping-hook in her hand, dragging another woman out of the opposite battalion with the hook fastened in one of her breasts. For men and women went equally to battle at that time. After this, Ronait sat down and said,—'Thou shalt not take me from this spot until thou exemptest women for ever from being in this condition, and from excursions and hostings.' Adamnan then promised that thing. There happened afterwards a convention in Ireland, and Adamnan, with the principal part of the clergy of Ireland, went to the assembly, and he exempted the women at it."

That scarcely improves the matter. A single case would hardly cause a law. Indeed, it is confessed that the women went to war like and with the men. That is a degradation to which savages of any respectability do not descend. Tacitus tells us that the ancient German women accompanied their male relations on their military expeditions and marches, but not to fight. They were an important factor in the wars of the tribe, but not as combatants. Their presence in camp encouraged the men, and the difficulty of retreating with their families and the prospect of their womankind falling a prey to the ill usage and rapine of the victor in the event of the day's fortunes going against them, impelled them to desperate courage and deeds of impossible prowess. That was all. They were too chivalrous to let the softer sex share with them the actual brunt of warfare. Even those barbarians who impose on the sex the rougher duties of ordinary life, spare women the obligation of bearing arms. Not so the Irish. Alone among races, they put the gentle sex to this ungentle use.

THE Indian Mirror threatens to report the papers of a different persuasion—when matter suitable and sufficient accumulate on its hands. Grose is carefully studying the enemy and taking notes. Would that our contemporary could be induced to take half the pains for love to form its own judgments!

Says the Indian Mirror:—"We are preserving with care all the cuttings of the Pioneer and the Englishman." Our contemporary forgets that that is a game open to the opposite side too. But probably it relies upon some historical (we mean natural-)advantages. We do not remember such an exposure as that of our contemporary by the Tribune. The Lahore paper did not expend a word and yet it succeeded in giving a perfect picture of the mind of the Calcutta editor—unto his very motto—veluti in speculum. The Tribune simply reproduced some extracts from the Mirror in chronological order, giving the Calcutta editor's deliverances from day to day on Nepal affairs, each pronouncement differing from the preceding utterance, though all pitched in the same oracular key. So much for the Mirror's consistency or judgment!

REIS & RAYYET.

SATURDAY, MARCH 17, 1888.

THE MUNICIPAL REVOLUTION.

Municipal Bill as recommended by the Select Committee, is a programme for Municipal Revolution. The annexation of the Suburbs naturally brings with it new responsibilities, but there is no end to the new obligations, new imposts and new offences, created under the Bill. The changes contemplated are sweeping. A scholar himself, Sir Henry Harrison has evidently fed his soul on the Augustan ambition. He has at last found his opportunity, and he naturally makes the most of it. If he cannot, by his fiat, convert the City of the Ditch into one of stone, he may, with the help of an accommodating legislature, hope to leave it a spruce English town of brick and stucco. At any rate, he will do his best to turn the city of bustees into a city of sewers, drains, privies, urinals, and "compounds."

The difficulty of municipal reformers has always been how to cleanse the Augean stable of our Black Town. Granted the necessary powers, Sir Henry is sanguine of success. He will make a determined effort to purify the city. We thoroughly sympathise with the object, but we confess we are not quite so hopeful, and feel almost alarmed at the patent steam broom that is being forged at the legislative workshop. The grandeur of the programme is likely to cause panic—in a self-governing country it would have ensured the rejection of the Bill. It is a stiff Malthusian dose for an old Eastern community. Mr. Malabari has found unexpected allies in Sir H. Harrison and his Health Officer Dr. Simpson. Through a reform in domestic architecture and economy, they promise to themselves that solution of the infant marriage question which reformers have so long been striving after. But, in improving the city of its close, ill-ventilated, crowded habitations, a great many honest and dishonest citizens will be improved off its face. There is no mincing of matters in the proposal. It is stern as Nature herself.

The new measures may all be good and necessary, but a vigorous working of the Act will be severely felt for generations and may cause an outcry which Government may be compelled to listen to. If the improvements can be effected at moderate cost, no reasonable man will object. But European sanitation is an expensive luxury, the cost being out of all proportion to the capacity of a poor, unenterprising, custom-ridden population.

The new measures are so many and so extensive, that the residents ought to be given sufficient time to make themselves acquainted with them. The Hon'ble Kallynath Mitter's motion for six weeks' time was perfectly reasonable, and if the law is not to come into operation before April next year, the Council with good grace might have complied with the request. At any rate, if the Bill is to be hurried through the Council this session, the Act should be freely circulated in the vernaculars among the residents to prepare them for the improvements in store for them.

With these preliminary remarks, we proceed to lay before our readers the important provisions of the Bill.

The Act comes into operation on the 1st April 1889, but elections may be held after the Act has been assented to by the Governor-General. This provision appears in the Mofussil Act, but we entertain grave doubts of its legality. A law cannot be worked in part while it is inoperative as a whole. The Governments of India, here and even at Home, are painfully deficient in law, and therefore it was that we hailed the recent appointment of Sir Charles Turner as contributing a needed infusion to the personnel of the Council of the Secretary of State. It is ignorance as often as wilfulness that leads Indian officials to break the law. But what hope of the thorough Reign of Law in a country in which the legislature itself has no loyalty and reverence for it, in which the makers of law lend themselves to tricks calculated to destroy its prestige? We trust the Advocate General will show a proper jealousy of such degradation of legislation, and we commend the whole subject to the notice of the Law Member.

We pass over the constitution portion, as it has already been passed by the Council—an unusual course even in the history of Indian Legislatures. The term "Municipal purpose" has been liberally defined, and many openings for expenditure sanctioned hitherto not allowed. While the Divisional Commissioners come down upon mofussil municipalities for educational grants, and taxed them for expending the municipal fund for providing caskets for the Address to the Queen on her Jubilee, the Calcutta Corporation will be free to expend its revenues and perhaps to borrow money, for primary and technical education and for public entertainments. The sanitary rage for Calcutta is not exhausted by the extension of its municipal area, but the municipal fund is expected to provide for sanitary reforms by the neighbouring municipalities. We were at one time led to suppose that the drainage system was not to be introduced into the Suburban portion of the town, and were glad that at least an area of the new town would be spared the nuisance. But the Bill we now find makes it imperative to extend and complete the typhoid-generating works throughout the town. Instead of employing their time in devising a remedy against the existing evil, the Select Legislators coolly recommend the means of its spread with borrowed capital. Dr. Sircar is not on the Select Committee, and we doubt not he will raise the whole question in Council. A strong stand should be made against the extension, and Government asked to appoint a Committee of experts on the merits and demerits of the system.

The Bill retains the power of the Local Government to supersede the Commissioners for default and neglect of the duties prescribed, but makes the provision less indefinite and allows an appeal to the Governor-General in Council against the order of the Lieutenant-Governor. The appointment of Chairman shall continue in the Local Government, but he, as all officers of Rs. 500 a month and upwards, shall be removed from office on the vote of 2-3rds of the Commissioners at a special meeting assembled. The Chairman is no longer to be the Commissioner of Police and his lowest pay is fixed at Rs. 2,500. For appointments of Rs. 200 and upwards, the nomination whereof rests with the Chairman, he may be required to select 3 candidates, one of whom shall be appointed by the Commissioners. The Vice-Chairman is declared eligible, if elected or appointed, as a member of the Port Commission and the local Legislative Council. Any servant of the Corporation below the Vice-Chairman, may be suspended or fined, subject to confirmation by the final removing authority. Following the Bombay Acts, the Commissioners, their officers and servants and all are declared public servants as defined in Sec. 21 of the Penal Code. Instead of the Town Council of 30, there will a General Committee of 18—twelve being elected by the 50 elected Commissioners, one nominated by the Bengal Chamber of Commerce, one by the Calcutta Trades Association, one by the Port Commissioners, and three by the 15 nominated Commissioners.

The Bill recognizes the propriety of exempting carriages from taxation when not used, but horses and animals, whether worked or not, must continue to bear the full tax. The neighbouring municipalities, whenever found entitled, are to be given a share of the cart registration fees. The Municipality is empowered to levy a tax of 4 annas for every ten gallons of petroleum brought into Calcutta for consumption therein. The Police rate is withdrawn, Government bearing the entire cost of the Police, but the House rate is increased to 13 per cent. under the name of the General rate. The water rate is unaltered, that is, remains at 6 per cent, but "houses and lands, no part of which is within 150 yards of the nearest stand-pipe or other supply of filtered water..., shall pay 3 per cent less than houses otherwise situated." The law has always drawn a distinction between houses on streets piped and unpiped for filtered water, but the Commissioners never observed it in the application of the Act. Will the new law improve their sense of right in this respect? The lighting rate will not exceed 2 per cent. But the night soil fee is converted into a rate of 2 per cent, without exemption for service not done. And all these rates are to be recovered in advance, half from the owner and half from the occupier. This was inevitable after lapse of years. The Bill yet preserves the integrity of the special rates, the General Fund, being charged for any deficiency of any particular fund, but the General Fund is not to benefit by any surplus of the special funds. After so many innovations making for increased income—after so many proofs of zeal and boldness, Sir Henry Harrison unaccountably stops short of the logical goal of his ideas—his ideal. He does not propose a consolidated rate of all kinds. That would be the legitimate conclusion of his policy, and it would really put money in his purse. As it is, he could not divert funds from their fixed uses, and the unexpended balances must simply accumulate like Thellusson's legacy. Practice, however, overrides law, and the Commissioners have drawn cheques on the security of these separate funds for general purposes, and it may be repeated, though Sir Henry does not take the power. A fresh and an oppressive source of income is the system of assessment introduced, the per centage on the cost of buildings, or their selling value, which is calculated to double and treble the present assessments, and to raise the revenue accordingly. This is an innovation which is not to be submitted to in silence, either by the Council or the general body of ratepayers.

We stop here to-day.

HYDROPHOBIA EN MASSE.

THE English papers report what they call a shocking case of hydrophobia just occurred near Carrigallen, Co. Leitrim, in Ireland. The modesty of the grammar scarcely does justice to the proportions or painful interest of the subject. It is a caseful of cases rather than a single case. "Over thirty people," we are told, "ate of a pig which had been bitten by a rabid dog, and about a week afterwards a whole family, named Stewart, were seized with hydrophobia." Here is indeed a multum in parvo of horrors! The account goes on—"One Philip McGovern was immediately called in to apply his cure for hydrophobia. He completed the treatment, and all patients are expected to recover. The other persons who ate the meat and had not exhibited bad symptoms were also under treatment." Putting an extraordinarily cheerful face on a frightful matter. It is covering death's heads with paste to look like life and even painting a smile over them! If these Irish victims of poisoned pork lend themselves to the illusion, they must either be grossly ignorant or possess a heavenly temperament. For our part, we can not contemplate their situation without anxiety or alarm. What are McGovern's claims to so much confidence? He may be only a local Sangrado with faith in himself and commanding the faith of his patients, but mere faith will scarcely, in these sceptical days, cure an organic or constitutional ailment, any more than it will remove mountains. His system seems simple. He forthwith completed his treatment and pronounced the patients out of danger. That, we take it, is all the ground of expectation of recovery. The simplicity of these Irish is equal to that of their Philip's therapeutic method. If it is not a secret, we ought to know what this treatment is. And all the thirty ought to be sent for treatment to Pasteur and other experts. It would not be amiss if some good Samaritan could send the Chandernagore specific for their benefit. The lives of thirty men are in imminent peril. A whole family of unoffending Christians is threatened with summary extinction in cold blood, in a time of peace. The public ought to interfere. The victims should certainly be watched. If they develop any symptoms of violence, it may be necessary to isolate them. Some patients show an irresistible impulse to bite others, and such bites may communicate the virus. There is a funny story in one of Charles Lever's novels of a 'cute Irishman clearing a whole railway car of passengers for his comfort by a sudden announcement that he had the rabies!

It is too soon to conclude the recovery of these thirty Irish. This canine poison is at once deep and insidious, and works in the system for a great length of time—for months and even years. It is also so easily communicable. One mad dog or jackal may affect many households, and has actually been known to decimate whole villages. And as yet no satisfactory remedy is known. This points to the duty of the State in the connection. The subject is one peculiarly within the province of Governments to inquire into. We are not alarmists. So far from sharing the horror of the dog of so many of our countrymen, we have great admiration and respect for this companion and friend of man. In our anxiety for our own, we should not forget the rights of the lower animals. We preach no crusade against any that are capable of the slightest civilization.

THE LIEUTENANT-GOVERNOR AT PURULIA. THE MUNICIPAL ADDRESS.

We, the Members of the Municipal Corporation of Purulia, the head-quarters of this District, on behalf of ourselves and our fellow-citizens, beg most respectfully to approach you with this our address of welcome, and to express our gratification in receiving Your Honor for the first time in the District of Manbhum.

The town of Purulia owes its origin to the existence of the British Government. The interior of this District is, indeed, studded with the ruined monuments of an ancient faith, and the traces of a former civilization. But that faith is now extinct, and that civilization has long since passed away. A hundred years ago the spot on which Your Honor is now standing was covered with jungle, and abandoned to the herdsman and the hunter. The town itself can trace its history back only to the year 1837; and in its steady development, in the swelling volume of its commerce and the growth of its political life, it may be said to mark the era of progress and enlightenment which opened with the accession of Her Majesty the Queen.

Difficulties of communication in these Districts have, hitherto, been a subject of concern outside the ordinary tours of Your Honor's predecessors. The only previous instance of this District and Town having been similarly honored, is the visit of Sir Richard Temple in 1876. It is therefore with peculiar satisfaction that we have witnessed the resumption of work on the Bengal-Nagpur Railway. This great work cannot fail to lend a powerful stimulus to the development of this District in every respect, to enhance the value of land, to attract the capital necessary for the exploitation of its mineral wealth, and to introduce its economic and industrial products to the markets of India and Europe.

We would express our hope that, when the opening of the line shall have brought Manbhum into unbroken railway communication with the labour districts of Assam, Your Honor may be pleased to reconsider the law that regulates the recruitment of coolies. The evils that attend the existing system are daily brought home to us; and, in our humble judgment, it will be possible to mitigate them by an amendment of the law.

Finally, we venture to approach Your Honor with a prayer that some assistance may be afforded to us in our efforts to improve the supply of drinking water in the town of Purulia. The Saheb-bandh, which was constructed through the exertions of Col. Tickell, and which for 35 years has supplied the townspeople with water, has of late years somewhat silted up and is in danger of deteriorating. It is our wish to re-excavate a part of the bandh, and to clear out and deepen that section which is most resorted to: but unfortunately such a work is quite beyond our means. We do not venture to ask for a grant of money from Provincial Funds: but we bring to Your Honor's notice that after the Famine of 1866, a sum of money was set aside for the support of the orphan children of those who died at the time, and that sum of Rs. 6,000 is still at credit of this Fund, and is no longer required for its original purpose. We venture to hope that Your Honor will regard the improvement of Water-supply of the town as a proper object to which the surplus may be applied, and be pleased to place it at our disposal for expenditure on this account.

NOMENOLOGY OF THE A. B. PATRIKA.

A word about the philological self-examination of the Amrita Bazar Patrika. Amrita is nectar; and it is aconite, says the Patrika himself. It is, of course, left to each man to find out for himself as to which of these meanings fits the Patrika most; and there are many good people, I believe, who think that the Amrita of which "the Patrika is a bazar" is not nectar but the poison, aconite; for the symptoms of your brother curiously coincide with those of this drug. Proofs: Mental—"Great nervous excitability." Head—"Congestion with great heat; sensation of emptiness." Eyes—"Aversion to light, &c., &c." P.

Miscellaneous.---46. That inasmuch as the posts of chief administrative officers of districts and Judges involve very responsible duties, the principle of selection should be more completely adopted in regard to those appointments; and that when in the order of seniority officers become eligible for appointment to the posts of Collector or Judge, there should be no hesitation in passing over those persons who have not given distinct evidence that they are fit for such office. 47. That, as a general rule, officers of the Imperial and Provincial Services, if declared ineligible for promotion, should, after a certain period of service, be liable to be compulsorily retired on reduced pensions calculated with reference to their period of effective service. 48. That a Board of Examiners should be appointed in each Presidency and Province who should perform duties similar to those entrusted to Her Majesty's Civil Service Commissioners in England, and that, whenever possible, non-official Europeans and Natives should be represented on such Boards.

Special Departments: General.---49. That when the Commission has made no specific recommendation respecting recruitment and conditions of service in any Department in which changes are suggested, it advises the adoption, as far as may be practicable, of the same rules as to preliminary qualification, recruitment, probation and general conditions of service as it has recommended for the Provincial Service, and that the recommendations of the Commission in regard to the several Departments are subject to due consideration for the rights of existing incumbents of all classes of appointments which may be affected by its proposals.

Accounts Department.---50. That the office of Comptroller and Auditor-General should be included in the Schedule attached to the Statute 24 and 25 Vic., Cap. 54, and that the offices of Accountant-General, Civil Auditor, and Sub-Treasurer should be removed from the Schedule. 51. That indigenous agency should be more largely introduced into the Enrolled List, and that the sources of recruitment for that list should be extended, appointments being made---(a) of outsiders by open competitive examination; (b) to a limited extent, as at present, for the Covenanted Civil Service; (c) by the promotion of Chief Superintendents who have proved that they possess capacity for the superior branch; (d) by the exceptional appointment of officers who have shown marked ability in the charge of Treasuries or in other Departments of the Provincial Service. 52. That the Government of India should continue to reserve to itself a discretion of appointing to the Enrolled List any person whom it may deem it conducive to the interests of the public service so to appoint.

Archaeological Survey Department.---53. That facilities should be given to a limited number of graduates of the Universities, sufficiently prepared by previous study, to undergo a course of training in Epigraphy.

Customs Department.---54. That the Commissionership of Customs, Salt and Opium in the Presidency of Bombay should continue to be included in the Schedule attached to the Statute 24 and 25 Vic., Cap. 54. 55. That of the three Collectorships of Customs at Madras, Bombay, and Calcutta and the Assistant Collectorship at Bombay, only the two most responsible appointments, namely, those at Bombay and Calcutta, should ordinarily be held by members of the Imperial Service, and that it is unnecessary to include the appointments of Collector of Customs at Madras and Assistant Collector at Bombay in the cadre of the Imperial Service for purposes of recruitment. 56. That the present system of recruitment by selection should be retained in respect to the other superior appointments in the Department, but that if these appointments are not filled by promotion from the subordinate ranks or by transfer from the Provincial Service, the persons appointed should only hold their offices provisionally until they have satisfied substantial probationary tests. 57. That there is no ground for exclusion of qualified candidates of any race from the Appraisers or Preventive branches of the Department.

Education Department.---58. That recruitment should be made in England only for (a) Principalships of Colleges; (b) Professorships in those branches of knowledge in which the European standard of advancement has not been attained in India; and (c) a smaller number of Inspectorships than at present. 59. That recruitment of Professors should be ordinarily of specialists, and, when practicable, for a term of years, with power of reappointment. 60. That the remuneration of officers recruited in England should be fixed with reference to the attainments required and the duties to be performed in each case. 61. That the present graded lists of the superior branch of the Department should be abolished, due regard being had to the interests of existing incumbents. 62. That all other educational appointments should be filled up locally by the present mode or modes of recruitment, on the principles recommended in this Report as to conditions of service for the general Provincial Service. 63. That there should be in each Presidency and in the larger Provinces at least one college with a staff of Professors capable of teaching up to the highest European standards, under a European Principal; and that the same object should, as far as practicable, be kept in view in smaller colleges. 64. That the inspection of schools and colleges should be carried on by an agency entirely separate from the teaching staff and recruited from a different source.

Forest Department.---65. That the staff of the Department should be divided into an Imperial Branch and Provincial Branches, and that, as in the Imperial Civil Service, the Imperial Branch of the Forest Service should be a corps d'élite, limited to the number of officers necessary to fill the superior controlling appointments and such a proportion of the Assistant Conservators' posts as will ensure a complete training for the junior officers. 66. That the Imperial Branch should be recruited in England, and that the conditions of service as to leave and pension should be assimilated to those of the Imperial Branch of the Public Works Department. 67. That the present rule which disqualifies married men from presenting themselves at the examination in England should be modified, as it might operate to debar Native candidates from competing for appointments in England. 68. That the Government should keep in view the policy of training in India men qualified to take charge of the higher administrative appointments so as to avoid as far as possible the necessity for expanding the Imperial Branch of the service. 69. That the rules at present prescribed by the Forest Code for the admission of candidates in India should be retained as providing a system of recruitment for the Provincial Branches of the Department suitable to existing circumstances.

Geological Survey Department.---70. That so long as no adequate provision is made for the teaching of Geology and the allied sciences at Indian colleges, appointments to the higher grades of the Department should ordinarily be made by the Secretary of State without respect to the nationality of the candidates. 71. That Sub-Assistants should not be recruited in greater numbers than are required for the purposes of the Department, i. e., to assist the more qualified Surveyors; but that Sub-Assistants should be promoted to the superior grades if they give proof of capacity for independent work. 72. That it is open to doubt whether the organization of a Department for Geological Survey is expedient to any greater extent than is required to secure systematic investigation.

Holloway's Ointment and Pills.—Counsel for the Delicate.—Those to whom seasons of changeable temperatures are protracted periods of trial should seek the earliest opportunity of removing all obstacles to good health. This cooling Ointment, perseveringly rubbed upon the skin, is the most reliable remedy for overcoming all diseases of the throat and chest. Quinsey, relaxed tonsils, sore throat, swollen glands, ordinary catarrh, and bronchitis, usually prevailing at this season, may be arrested as soon as discovered, and every symptom banished by Holloway's simple and effective treatment. This Ointment and Pills are highly commended for the facility with which they successfully conquer influenza; they allay in an incredibly short time the distressing fever and teasing cough.

73. That the graded system appears unsuitable for a service in which the work to be performed calls for the highest efficiency in an equal degree throughout the whole term of employment. 74. That the system of engaging specialists for a limited term of years is advantageous and should be continued.

Jail Department.---75. That when Superintendents of Jails, Central or District, are not medical officers, more opportunity might properly be given to Natives of India to show their fitness for these appointments from which they are at present practically excluded. 76. That the qualifying service for the important position of Superintendent of a Central Jail should be such as will ensure a thorough preliminary training, and that no person should be appointed to that office who has not served three years in the Jail Department, or in the superior grades of the Police Department, or in both combined.

Meteorological Survey Department.---77. That in the present state of scientific education in India, the Commission is unable to recommend any change in the system of recruitment for this Department.

Mint Department.---78. That the rule in the Notification of the Government of India, No. 3570, dated 19th September, 1884, which prescribes that Commissioned officers only shall ordinarily be appointed to gazetted offices in the Assay Department, should be cancelled. 79. That further enquiry should be made whether the scheme of training for temporary appointments involves unnecessary expense. 80. That, as a general rule, where a scientific education, as distinct from probationary departmental training, is required to qualify officers for service in any Department, the cost of such education should be borne by those who seek employment rather than by the State.

Opium Department.---81. That the experiment of appointing Natives by selection to a proportion of the vacancies in the Department should be discontinued, and that the future recruitment for this department should be subject to the general principles of equality of treatment of all classes of Her Majesty's subjects and of tested preliminary qualifications which have been proposed for the Provincial Service. 82. That the Imperial Service affords the fittest field of selection for filling the appointments of Opium Agents, and that these appointments should be retained in the Schedule of reserved posts attached to the Statute 24 and 25 Vic., Cap. 54.

Pilot Service.---83. That no sufficient reasons exist to justify a recommendation that the State should establish a special school for the instruction of persons born and educated in India who entertain a desire to adopt a sea-faring life as a profession.

Postal Department.---84. That, in order to enable Natives to compete on equal terms with Europeans and Eurasians for appointments which require higher educational qualifications and greater physical energy than are necessary for efficient service in the lower posts, a certain number of appointments carrying salaries of from Rs. 80 to Rs. 100 a month should be filled by competition, the successful candidates being admitted on probation and being trained in Head Offices after which they should be employed as Inspectors, and if found qualified, selected for the grades of Superintendent. 85. That of the seven highest appointments in the Department at present filled by Covenanted Civilians, not less than three should ordinarily be filled by promotion within the Department.

Police Department.---86. That although for many years to come the European element in the higher ranks of the Police should predominate, Natives of India ought not to be entirely excluded from those ranks as is now the case in some Provinces, but that endeavours should be made to introduce a reasonable proportion of Native officers, due regard being always had to the efficiency of the service. 87. That the present system of recruitment for the grade of Assistant District Superintendent in most Provinces is unsatisfactory, as not affording a sufficient guarantee for educational qualifications and habits of industry, and that admission to this grade should be by---(a) limited competition amongst candidates selected in England for such portion of the appointments in each Province as the Government of India may decide to be necessary; (b) limited competition amongst candidates selected in India, such candidates carefully chosen on grounds of good physique, the knowledge of vernacular languages prescribed for the Provincial Service, and of educational qualifications of an English kind; (c) promotion of the grade of Inspectors for exceptional merit and ability into active service. 88. That both of the competitive examinations referred to in the foregoing Recommendation should be conducted in accordance with rules approved by the Government of India. 89. That appointments to Inspectorships should, as a rule, be made from the lower grades of the force, and that in no case should outsiders be appointed to Inspectorships merely as a training ground for the higher offices. 90. That many of the abuses which now characterise the Police force are due to the inadequate remuneration of the lower grades; and that whatever improvement may be made in the conditions of service of the other ranks, full advantage will not result from it so long as the officer in charge of a Police Station, by whatever name he may be called, does not receive remuneration and prospects adequate to induce and enable him to withstand the temptations to which his situation exposes him.

Public Works Department.—91. That the Engineer Establishment of the Public Works Department should consist of an Imperial Branch and of Provincial Branches. 92. That the Imperial Branch should consist of such a number of Royal Engineers as may be required as a reserve for military purposes over and above the officers employed in the Military Works Branch and of Civil Engineers recruited in England. 93. That the strength of the Imperial Branch should not be greater than is necessary for purposes of control and direction and for the execution and repair of works calling for high Engineering skill, and that the recruitment from the Cooper's Hill Royal Engineering College, which appears at present excessive, should be regulated accordingly. 94. That the conditions of service in the Imperial Branch should be fixed with a view to secure the necessary qualifications in England, and should, as far as possible, be uniform for all officers employed in it. 95. That the Provincial Branches should be of a strength adequate for the construction and maintenance in the several Provinces of works not ordinarily calling for high Engineering skill. 96. That the recruitment for the Provincial Branches should be made by the direct appointment to the lowest grades of qualified Engineers from the Indian Engineering Colleges and in exceptional cases by promotion from the Upper Subordinate grades. 97. That there should be at least one college in India thoroughly well equipped for providing a high education for Officers for the Provincial Branches, and that such college should be open to all classes of Her Majesty's subjects. 98. That the conditions of service as to pay, furlough, and pension should be fixed for the Provincial Branches without reference to those of the Imperial Branch. 99. That the number of professional Engineers and Military officers employed in the superior Accounts Branch is excessive and should be reduced. 100. That the mode of appointing outsiders to the Accounts Branch is unsatisfactory; that the recruitment should be to a larger extent from all classes of the community; and that it should be by open competitive examination, the subjects prescribed for the examination being so chosen as not to exclude any class of the community likely to furnish qualified candidates, and by promotion in exceptional cases from the Accountants' grades.

Registration Department.—101. That the appointment of Inspector General of Registration should not be included in the cadre of the Imperial Service for the purpose of recruitment. 102. That while no obstacle should be placed in the way of such Registration officers as may desire to compete for employment in other Departments, those officers should not be exempted from the operation of any rules prescribed to ensure the possession of the special qualifications required in any particular Department.

Salt Department.—103. That the Commissionership of the Northern India Salt Department and the Commissionerships of Salt in the Madras and Bombay Presidencies should be retained in the Schedule attached to the Statute 24 and 25 Vic., Cap. 54. 104. That when recruitment for Superintendships in the Northern India Salt Department is resumed, the orders directing the reduction of the salaries attached to those appointments should be reconsidered. 105. That, sufficient precautions being taken to secure the requisite physical qualifications, the same principles should govern the recruitment for and promotion in this Department as have been recommended for the Provincial Service, and that rules should be framed in the case of the Northern India Salt Department by the Government of India, and in the case of the Departments in Madras and Bombay by the Local Governments, subject to the approval of the Government of India, to give effect to this Recommendation.

Survey Department.—106. That Royal Engineers or other Military officers employed in the Senior Division, with such specialists as may be recruited in England, should be regarded as forming a distinct branch of the service, with pay, furlough and pension rules adjusted to the requirements of a service so recruited; and that the posts now held by the Junior Division should be amalgamated with some posts surrendered by the Senior Division so as to provide sufficiently attractive prospects for a service locally recruited, the pay, furlough, and pension rules applicable to which should be adjusted on the principles already indicated by the Commission in respect of other services recruited in India. 107. That admission to the Junior Division (or to the Local Service if the Recommendation of the Commission is adopted) should not be confined to special classes of Her Majesty's subjects in India, and that it should be regulated by competition among selected candidates, and exceptionally by promotion from the Subordinate Service. 108. That, in view of the fact that the Revenue Survey Departments in the Madras and Bombay Presidencies will be abolished in a few years, no further appointments of probationers should be made to the gazetted posts, and that any deficiency experienced in the strength of the existing agency should be supplied from the Provincial Services, such as the Land Revenue or Public Works Departments.

Telegraph Department.—109. That for the present the recruitment in England on the scale now sanctioned should be maintained, but that the gradual reduction of the staff recruited in England should be kept in view, and that a superior Local Telegraph Service should be recruited in India from classes to be established at one or more of the Indian Engineering Colleges. 110. That the pay of the service locally recruited should not be adjusted with reference to the pay of officers recruited in England, but that the pay and other conditions of the service locally recruited should be determined independently on the same principles as it is proposed to adopt for the Provincial Service.

OPINION OF THE PRESS.

.....this interesting book. We are justified in so terming it, not on account of any romantic adventures that the author has to relate, nor of any very new discoveries in geography or natural history. There is something particular as regards ethnology; and a great deal of human nature in the book, shown to the reader with a simplicity and candour which bear testimony to its truth. Called from the busy haunts of men in the city to dwell for a time in Independent Tipperah as a judicious adviser to its Chief, Doctor Mookerjee relates his adventures during the several journeys to and fro in that capacity, without revealing the secrets of the State, like a good diplomatist. He has adhered strictly to the advice which he offers to his brethren of the Native Press, and has written what he saw and knows, without revealing all, considering what he might properly say and what withhold..... The above seems to be a curious passage to be found in a book of travels, and appears to have no connection with the subject. But it arises from a casual reference to a slaughter house, and a writer who "thundered weekly against the outrage of locating shambles in the immediate vicinity of a Hindoo temple"—where, in fact, no temple could be said to exist. Hence, the Doctor advises his fellow-scribes not to be Pharisees, righteous over-much, but to look and be sure of their facts. In the same spirit, he has written his book. He gives an account of his travels, which seem often to have been voyages, upon the wide-spreading rivers of Eastern Bengal which in the rains become almost inland seas. On these he philosophises on the nature of the country and the people, making careful observation of his facts; and though he sometimes fancies he knows better than his boatmen, and more than suspects that they are getting the better of him, he submits with a grace, that would have done credit to Socrates, and accepts the apparently inevitable in the interests of peace. The Doctor is a close observer of nature, animate and inanimate, with an eye to the picturesque as well as to the sublime and beautiful. And although there is a vein of cynicism running through many of his observations, it is tempered by such evidence of good nature, that even a stranger would receive him to be a laughter-loving rather than a stern philosopher. This is evident in his descriptions of his boatmen and others, which he denounces the lawlessness which has made the poor fishermen suspicious even of honest intentions, because they have so long been the helpless victims of marauders stronger than themselves. Their only defence is flight or deceit, and the latter is their justification as a mode of self-protection. We are shown not only the weakness of the people, but the shortcomings of the administration that leave these things possible..... The author is impartial in his censures..... There is much in the book to which space forbids us to refer. That it is not a prosy one may be gathered from the fact that, for its 300 pages, there are nearly as many index references. Many of the subjects are necessarily but lightly treated, but all sensibly and fairly. And Dr. Mookerjee is such a master of the English language that in the whole book we have scarcely found a phrase that might not have been written by an Englishman "to the manor born." There is nothing in it at which any one could reasonably take offence; and there is much from which both Englishmen and natives may learn greatly-needed lessons.—The Indian Daily News, Nov. 22, 1887.

"TRAVELS IN BENGAL. Such is the title of a most interesting little work published a short time ago. Its author is Babu Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee, the well-known Editor of the Reis and Rayyet, the most original, cleverly-written and interesting journal in India. Babu Sambhu Chunder is one of the veteran Indian writers in English. He is the master of a most happy, racy pleasant style, which you can easily make out from amongst the writings of a hundred different men. In racy humorous writing Babu Sambhu Chunder has no rival among his Indian contemporaries. He won his first laurels, we believe, by his writings in his own periodical, the Mookerjee's Magazine, now long-defunct. In this magazine articles of great learning and excellence appeared, mostly from the pen of Babu Sambhu Chunder. He has written several other booklets. His Causes of the Bengal Famine; Mr. Wilson, Lord Canning and the Bengal Tax; the Cover of an Indian Prince; Her Highness the late Secundra Begum of Mysore; and the Prince in India and to India, are publications which attracted considerable attention. His latest production "Travels in Bengal" is a work of great merit. It is at once a most faithful and interesting picture of natural scenery and life in Bengal, although Mr. Mookerjee does not profess to write a picture of Bengal life and uses his pencil in its portraiture only in passing. The dedication is characteristic. [Extract.]

The "Travels" are travels in East Bengal, travels and voyages between Calcutta and Independent Tepperah. We do not believe many people in this side of India know that there is such an independent State as Tipperah. But nevertheless such a state exists. We will give here a summary of its history in the words of Mr. Mookerjee—He writes:—[Extract.] Mr. Mookerjee was Dewan of Independent Tipperah for some five years in all between 1877 and 1881. The travels are an account of his voyages to and from Tipperah.

Those who have travelled in Bengal, particularly in its Eastern districts, which are the districts described in Mookerjee's book, will bear him out in his statement that Lower Bengal is not stale, flat and unprofitable, that, on the contrary, she is the beautifullest country in the world. She has no high mountains, but she has rivers apparently as vast as the sea, to make her scenery grand and majestic. She has a hundred rivers ever overflowing with water, thousands of transparent lakes, covered with the lily and a hundred beautiful water-flowers, thousands of seas of ever-waving paddy fields, thousands of clusters of bamboo and of great trees dressed in beautiful creepers adorning the river banks, to make her the loveliest country in the world. Even a Bengali needs to see and travel Bengal to adequately know her thousand witching charms. For a foreigner it is well nigh impossible to get even an approximate idea of what they are like from description, however true and faithful. Let us hear what our author has to say on the subject. We read:—[Extract.] A paddy sea is thus inimitably described:—[Extract.]

We will quote a passage of another character:—[Extract.]

It could cull many such gems. But it forbids it. We will, however, quote the passages of another kind. Our traveller, "though old in years, is evidently young in heart, for no one in the romantic age of youth could be more appreciative of female charms than our traveller. In every other page you find our author describing in terms of enthusiasm some rural girl or woman of beauty." [Extract.] In the next page we find our traveller's attention [Extract.]

There is the description, physical and moral, of a Colonel, which we cannot resist the temptation of reproducing, although the article has already exceeded the usual length. [Extract.]

We have now given extracts enough to show that the little book of travels is most delightful reading. It contains graphic descriptions of natural scenery, faithful portraits of men and manners, and happy, good humoured observations on them. There is not an ill-natured or unkind word in the whole book—it overflows in every page with the milk of human kindness. Every observation testifies to the author being a keen observer of men and things, as an example of which we can mention the instructive and interesting chapter on the Native Christians of Portuguese extraction in Tipperah. Again, although the book does not pretend to deal with life in Bengal, the glimpses of that life we find in it are very considerable and pleasant. We will now conclude by recommending the book to all who may wish to spend a few hours amidst happy thoughts and pleasant pictures.—

S. K. C.

—The Tribune, Nov. 26, 1887.

If we have not before noticed Mr. Sambhu C. Mookerjee's Travels in Bengal, which was published some months ago, it is not because the little book is either dull or pointless. It contains, on the contrary, much interesting matter, though some of the incidents are over-weighted with detail in what is facetiously called a "little booklet." The author's view as a rule is, by the way, facetious: he is given even to punning; but he is also sentimental in the highest degree—"a naked Whiteman" has his susceptibilities; a Hindu girl, bathing in a river, throws him into an ecstasy of delight "she had such large languishing reflections on this or that social and subject are not without their moral."

Sambhu C. Mookerjee was formerly minister to the "last of the Nawabs Nazim of Bengal, Behar and Orissa" and afterwards Minister of the Maharaja of Tipperah. He is a man, therefore, of experience, and when he speaks his brethren should listen to him.... Travels in Bengal is a readable book, and it abounds in anecdotes which are often as instructive as amusing, and it is not spoiled by too many political allusions, though, of course, some few have crept in.—The Pioneer, Dec. 1887.

It may be well-known to all of our readers that Babu Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee the veteran editor of the Reis and Rayyet newspaper, has just published a book describing the four voyages that he made between Calcutta and Independent Tipperah when he had to go and to return from the latter place in the capacity of the minister to its prince. The literature yet produced in the English tongue by our own countrymen is very scanty and any sensible addition to it cannot well escape the attention of the public press. Much greater therefore should be the attention claimed on behalf of a book which comes from the pen of so well-known a writer in the field of Indian journalism as Babu Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee. That gentleman's career as a writer fills nearly the last thirty years, and there has hardly been any subject of public importance during that long period which has not occupied his attention. Master of an inimitable racy style, with a vast store of classical allusions ever ready at the call, and possessing an infinite fund of humour, our author often enlivens every thing that he touches, and his peculiar strength lies in description. We therefore welcome the appearance of this book more especially as the subject is one which to make it interesting, requires a lively colouring and a rich, picturesque and imaginative description. There exist several books of travels written by eminent Englishmen, and every one of these differs perhaps, in their conception and plan of execution. Of these none was more widely read in the course of the last few years than Carlyle's reminiscences of an Irish Journey in 1849. That book is made up of extracts from diaries and the worst features of it are the bitter and caustic personal remarks interspersed throughout the book. However that may suit the polished and fashionable taste of England, in our country it would have been singularly out of place and we are glad that Babu Sambhu Chunder has confined himself to the description of those natural sceneries he passed through, and the means of travel in the distant and little-known regions of East Bengal. That the rivers of Bengal, with their circuitous and entangling courses do enshrine in them a deep spirit of poetry and are of sincere interest to the real man of imagination, is proved by the fact that Sir William Hunter, than whom a more accomplished man of letters never passed the best years of his life in Bengal, should have chosen the subject for his very interesting address at Oxford, the other day. The gentle waves, the gentler ripples, the grassy banks, the ever-entwining courses, the pleasant air, the sceneries on both sides make the rivers of Bengal a genuine thing of interest to those whose eyes are perpetually fed by the artificial gloss and dross of civilization and few could have set perhaps the loveliness of our rivers in better light than our accomplished author. His eloquent sentences, marching in regular order one after another, and embodying in their selves, every minute detail, that can lend to a scene its finest artistic effect, seem to place the reader in the very midst of sceneries described, and the man of leisure who would acquaint himself with the state of things in East Bengal, can hardly resort to a better book. The journeys which are described in this volume are certainly uneventful and though they correspond to facts as they furnish no interesting situation, no critical moments, to the seeker of intellectual excitement and thus will no doubt constitute a serious objection to the book on the part of sensational seeking readers. None has however any thing to quarrel with the choice of a subject that any author may choose to write upon and none of the outside public can afford any explanation as to why the author should have preferred one subject to another. We think however there are one or two indications of bad taste. Still we welcome the appearance of this book and trust that it is but the first of a long series of works in writing which our author should spend the matured experience and the literary facility of a well-spent life.—Young Bengal, Feb. 2, 1888.

We owe an apology to Mr. Sambhu C. Mookerjee for the apparent negligence with which we have treated that delightful work of his—Travels in Bengal. Mr. Mookerjee, as almost every one knows, is one of the best English scholars in India; he writes as gracefully as does the most scholarly Englishman, and ample proof of this is afforded in the pages of his book before us, which is an interesting narrative of four journeys,—“two trips to Tipperah and two trips back”—accompanied by historical, geographical, cartographical and many other local notes of the lands passed through. We confess we have been but through the first half of the work, and, as we have proposed to review it in two papers, we think our progress sufficient for present purposes. Our author has not, as far as we have read, met with those thrilling adventures we read of—oft with a certain amount of sneaking disbelief in the average hunter's narratives or traveller's tales; peaceful as the bosom of a still lake were his journeyings in Bengal Proper. He carried no formidable weapons with him, save and except a rusty old gun which, when called into requisition once, refused to go off; and yet withal, few more delightful works of travel in India have we read than the one now under our hands. The charms of true yet eloquent description, the force of observation, the gift of seeing sermons in stones, are all possessed in a great degree by Mr. Mookerjee; and we are pleasantly surprised at the lively and fascinating manner in which he can palm off on the reader the dreariest incident of his life. Mr. Mookerjee will forgive us if we mention that we think him a very gallant old gentleman—with the accent on the second syllable. He has evinced in his little work a weakness for describing the Beauties of Bengal with all the poetic ardours of a Stephon. Did we not know enough of the erudite and good old "Babu" editor, we might be inclined to call this particular weakness of his, in Carlyle's language—"a Byronism of taste." Here is how he speaks of a beautiful damsel he saw disporting in the running waters of the beautiful Megna, at Sonargoan:—[Extract.]

But the above excerpt is not the best thing in the book by far. Although every line in it which we have gone over is a line that we ourselves having written, would not wish to blot out, there are passages in it which surprise us and raise our hearts to a higher level by their eloquence, their purity and wealth of expression. Running through the pages of Travels in Bengal is a vein of quiet humour—that humour which makes us fall in love with writers and tempts us to fly to them for solace in trouble, for a return of serenity in moments of vexation. Mr. Mookerjee has, in his work, added one more to the innumerable anecdotes relative to the fidelity of man's best friend among brutes—the dog. The sentinel duties of a canine phenomenon—Tom by name—are related in glowing terms, but we shall not rob the author of one of his finest plums by transferring it into our columns. This review, as we have already stated, is but the introductory one. In our next, or a little later, we shall take up Mr. Mookerjee's book where we are leaving it off, and make our readers a little more familiar with one of the cleverest native gentlemen of the day and with his interesting book on travels in Baboodom. Mr. Mookerjee, like all his fellow mortals, is human, and he has let us know this in his present work. How, we propose to state only in our second review. Would he however pardon us if we surrender to the temptation of finishing this up with his pretty remarks about Mooning and the Moon. After "the contending gods of the elements" had "left off" one night when our traveler was on the bosom of the Megna, he watched Luna issue from behind the clouds in all her grandeur and radiance. That sight, so delightful to the mind with a leaning towards the aesthetic and poetic, gave vent to the following [Extract.]

Now, the above will prove a grand surprise to the European reader especially, who may perhaps be unkind enough to doubt that it was written by a "Babu" just as people have doubted that Shakespeare was really the author of Shakespeare and Tennyson the author of Tennyson. Mr. Mookerjee and we part here, but when work is done and we sit in our cosy arm-chair at home and watch, as is our wont, the blue smoke curl gracefully away from our pipe, we shall dream with waking eyes of the beautiful Megna and the damsels of Bengal, of the moon and the waters, and we know that we shall again take up the Travels in Bengal and satisfy our wish of getting to the end of such a pleasant little work.—The Malabar and Travancore Spectator, February 4, 1888.

NEWS AND COMMENTS.

ERRATUM.—We owe an apology to the unholy ghost of our first paragraph of last week's "News and Comments," for want of familiarity with his family. Thus, we stumbled on the Bismillah—the patronymic.

We are told that it is another brother that has resorted to the Grimm Law and that the initial has always been P not B. We readily make the correction, though it is no fault of ours if it raises a suggestion of Pshaw! We admit it were cruel to rob a poor fellow of his name, good bad or indifferent, who has scarcely any others of his family possessions to fall back upon.

THE Queen has started for the continent.

THERE is being held at Rouen a typographical exhibition—in celebration of the 400th anniversary of the introduction of printing—from which may be said to date modern civilisation.

A COPY of the Times has made the round of the globe in sixty-nine days. "Its journey was made by the Suez Canal route to Yokohama, and thence to London via the Canadian line and Atlantic connections."

HERR Laßewig of Germany has manufactured paper to resist both fire and water. The recipe is thus given. Mix 25 parts of asbestos fibre with from 25 to 30 parts of aluminum sulphate, moisten the mixture with chloride of zinc and thoroughly wash in water, then treat it with a solution of one part of resin soap in 8 to 10 parts of a solution of pure aluminum sulphate, then manufacture into paper like ordinary pulp. Will this paper keep out the book-worms?

AN Oporto telegram of the 21st brings the sad news that—

"A theatre here has been burned. The place was crowded with people at the time, and it is feared that a good many lives have been lost, and many persons injured."

A later report says that 80 persons have been found dead mostly in the galleries. Many jumped from the windows into the street.

ANOTHER fire is reported from Upper Burmah. We read in the Englishman—"Myingyan has been almost totally destroyed by fire. Over 2,500 houses were burnt, and enormous quantities of valuable stores lost."

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given, any other being unnecessary, and likely to cause confusion.

ACCORDING to a Cuttack telegram received by us during the week,

The 25th ordinary meeting of the Orissa Islam Association was held on the morning of the 18th at the premises of Munshi Sultan Mahmud, zemindar, and amongst other things it was unanimously resolved that an address of farewell be submitted to His Excellency the Earl of Dufferin the Viceroy and Governor-General of India.

THERE has been a change in the Cashmere Durbar. Dewan Luchman Das has been dismissed—with honor or disgrace we are not told how—Raja Amar Sing taking up his duties temporarily.

MR. R. D. MEHTA has been appointed by the local Government to succeed Mr. D. Cruickshank who has ceased to be a Port Commissioner. An unexceptional appointment. So much the worse for him! doubtless thinks the dog in the manger of Calcutta journalism. Look at the barking set up at poor K. M. Chatterjea, one of our most accomplished men, for his single month's elevation to the bench of the Small Cause Court!

MR. T. A. PEARSON officiates as Receiver of the High Court during the absence on leave of Mr. J. C. Macgregor.

THERE was a theft of Rs. 2,000 at the Bellevue Hotel. A dismissed bearer was suspected. He was traced by the Police with Rs. 1,700. The Magistrate has sentenced him to the full term of 2 years.

THE Allahabad Standing Committee of arrangements for holding the next Congress at the capital of Upper India, have appointed a compact Executive Committee consisting of the Hon'ble Pandit Ajudhya Nath as President, Raja Ram Pal Singh, as Honorary Secretary, Sayyad Abdul Raouf, Barrister-at-Law, Munshi Madhava Parshad, Vakil, and Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya, Editor Hindustan, as Joint-Secretaries, and Lala Ram Charan Das, Junior Vice-Chairman of the Municipal Board and Special Magistrate, as Treasurer.

THIS executive committee lately sent a deputation, consisting of the Hon'ble Pundit Ajudhyanath, Rajah Ram Pal Sing, Mr. Atkins, Mr. Crowley, Lala Ram Charan, Mr. Fairley, Mr. Mahamood Rauf, and Babu Charu Chander Mittra, to wait upon Mr. Commissioner Lawrence with a view to secure Khasru Bag for the next meeting of the National Congress. Acting in concert with the popular Lieutenant-Governor, the Commissioner has complied with the application. With the Khasru Bagh for the place of rendezvous of the great gathering of Delegates, the Congress starts with a great advantage for their next session. Fakirabad—as the capital of the N. W. P. is contemptuously called—abounds not in house-accommodation, and it were next to impracticable to shelter with decency and comfort the large number of visitors expected. But the acquisition of the Khasru Bagh will enable the Committee to meet their requirements. In the next Congress, the delegates will be located in one place and accommodated in tents. The country ought to be grateful to Sir Auckland Colvin for his liberal treatment of the movement.

SIR HORACE RUMBOLD is to be paid 3 lacs from the Hyderabad Treasury for an extinct claim. £5,000 to be remitted immediately and the balance by equal annual instalments. Hurrah for Sir Horace! There was a Commission on this business. The report should see the light.

SPEAKING of the last Fancy Fair at Bombay, a lady correspondent writes to a contemporary that "the Queen sent the Duchess of Connaught her own photographs signed in her own handwriting, and for each of these the natives gave fifty rupees."

THE following important publication is announced:—

"The Secretary of State for India has finally decided that the allowances for the equipment and voyage of a Governor-General of India, resident in Europe at the time of his appointment, are fixed at £3,500.

A newly appointed Governor-General proceeding to India from Europe to enter upon his office may be accompanied by three combatant military officers for his personal staff, the expenses of whose passage will be defrayed by Government according to the rules in force in the Military Department as to military officers proceeding on duty.

For an ex-Governor-General returning to Europe, on resignation, a steamer belonging to the Indian Marine Service will (if consistent with the requirements of the public service) be gratuitously provided to convey him and his family suite to Suez; but the homeward voyage of the ship thus provided shall not be continued beyond Suez. The ex-Governor-General will bear the cost of entertainment and messing incurred while on board, in respect of himself and his party, according to the rules in force relating to the conveyance of passengers in Indian Marine troopships.

No grant from Indian revenues will be made to any ex-Governor-General for his homeward journey from Suez.

An ex-Governor-General returning to Europe may be accompanied by two officers of his personal staff, for whom free passages to Europe will be allowed according to the rules in the Military Department made for free return passages to India, if they start on their return voyage within two months from the date of quitting India.

The allowances for equipment and voyage of the Governors of Madras and Bombay, the Commander-in-Chief of the Forces in India, of Madras and of Bombay resident in Europe at the time of appointment respectively are fixed as follows:—

The Governor of Madras	£1,000
The Governor of Bombay	" 1,000
The Comdr.-in-Chief of the Forces in India	" 500
The Commander-in-Chief, Madras	" 500
The Commander-in-Chief, Bombay	" 500

A Commander-in-Chief of the Forces in India proceeding from Europe to assume his command may be accompanied by three combatant military officers for his personal staff, and newly appointed Governors in Madras and Bombay, and Commanders-in-Chief of Madras and Bombay, similarly proceeding from Europe to take up their duties, may respectively be accompanied by two combatant military officers for their personal staff; the passages of these officers being provided at the expense of Government according to the rules in force in the Military Department as to military officers proceeding to India on duty: but with these exceptions, Government will make no arrangements for and will defray none of the expense connected with the passage or conveyance of any of the officers mentioned in the preceding paragraph or of their families to or from India.

The allowances for the equipment and voyage of Members of the Council of the Governor-General of India, and of Bishops of Calcutta, of Madras, and of Bombay, if resident in Europe at the time of appointment, respectively, are fixed as follows:—

Members of Council of Governor-General...	£300
The Bishop of Calcutta	" 300
The Bishop of Madras	" 300
The Bishop of Bombay	" 300

An officer of any of the Indian Services temporarily residing in Europe, or a military officer transferred from one superior command in India to another during temporary residence out of India shall not be deemed to be resident in Europe at the time of appointment within the meaning of the above rule."

THE Shah of Persia has deferred his third visit to Europe in order to be able to take in the International Exhibition at Paris which comes off next year.

MAHARAJA Sivaji Rao Holkar Bahadoor has by no means confined himself to astrology. He has lately given his attention to—say, conubiology, having just taken to himself a fair Maharaj's young lady of fourteen for a partner in life. We hope he will write a letter in both worlds for his choice, and that his people will be the happier for his domestic peace and happiness.

A petition is lying before us, of Haridas Bhaduri, late an Overseer, P. W. D., Bengal, Brahminee Byturni Division, addressed to the Viceroy in Council. Its disposal will probably devolve on the Secretary to the Government of India in the P. W. D. Recommended by the highest medical adviser of the Government of Bengal, viz., the Surgeon-General, for a transfer from the Irrigation to the Buildings and Roads Branch of the Department, Haridas failed to procure even a patient hearing of his application for transfer. His very life was in jeopardy. Yet the inexorable Secretariat order was out, commanding him, on pain of forfeiting his appointment, to join his Division in Orissa. After several communications between himself and the Secretariat, which led to no favorable result, Haridas prepared to join his appointment in Orissa, thinking that further refusal on his part might be regarded as evidence only of contumacy, and hoping that if after joining his Division he pressed his application for transfer, the Government might be disposed to listen to it. About this time, however, private reasons interfered with his plans, the force of which may be easily estimated, if not by others, at least by Lord Dufferin, whose announcement in Council the other day regarding the termination of his Viceroyalty should not certainly be regarded as a joke.

It strikes us that the Public Service Commission, about which so much was made by a portion of our countrymen, was a mistake. Before seeking to open new appointments for the children of the soil, measures ought to have been adopted for protecting the appointments already held by them. The sturdy paper Hope, in one of its recent issues, gave the story of a native clerk, of seventeen years' service, belonging to the office of the Comptroller of Military Accounts, having been dismissed for visiting the editor of the Indian Mirror. Of course, a charge was concocted of "incompetence and indifferent character," whatever the last may mean, although poor Doyal Chand Banerjee (that is the clerk's name) had in seventeen years been fined only once in an office where fines are the order of the day, and although having originally entered on a small pay had latterly been drawn out double that amount.

In fact, the man almost deserves this retribution for his seventeen years of unbroken prudence and circumspection and his unparalleled success in avoiding temptations and eluding the worse devils of the Government Departments. For ourselves, we are inclined to regard him not exactly as the Greek who blackballed Aristides regarded him, but with a degree of horror mixed with contempt, if such an amalgam can be conceived. It is a wonder how such a perfection of an office Baboo—quite a distinct genus from the Baboo Political—could ever go to—the "other place"—the h———of native journalism. The Lords of the P. W. D. ought in mercy to preserve this poor fellow—at least as a curiosity of a man actually returned from the grim place whence no unfortunate ever escapes.

ONE Venkatasawmy Naidu is reported to have died at Bangalore at the age of 107. No other particulars are given except that at the siege of Bangalore, the deceased was residing there and was 18 years of age, and that he was an old servant of Colonel Clarke, Secretary to Sir Mark Cubbon and father of the present Commissioner of Coorg.

NOTES AND LEADERETTES.

MR. BUSHBY—Surveyor to the Port Commission—has disgorged the Rs. 1,000 paid him by Messrs. Macneill & Co. for extra attention paid to the repairs of the lost Sir John Lawrence, and has pocketed the censure of the Bengal Government. The Port Commissioners have paid back the sum to the agents of the vessel, as directed.

AN Honorary Magistrate in Saugor, Central Provinces, is in trouble. A petition went up to the Chief Commissioner accusing Rao Lachman Ramesh, aking bribes. The Magistrate was called upon to explain, but his explanation not satisfying, Mr. Mackenzie promptly suspended the Magistrate, at the same time advising him to prosecute the petitioners. The fact, who alleged that he had paid a bribe of Rs. 1,500, is, by being tried.

CHINA is a conservative country. The Celestials do not adopt any development of modern civilization for which they have to depend on outer-barbarians. The telegraph was not introduced until the Chinese themselves had mastered the science and learnt the art and could manufacture the lines on the spot. That also explains the late introduction of the railway. Their aversion from foreign goods, however, did not manifest itself in the case of kerosine. Its cheapness perhaps overcame all opposition, and it was adopted. They have now awakened to its danger. A joint memorial to the Throne has been presented by the Governor of Kwangtung, in which province Canton lies, and the Viceroy over him. They condemn the article for its dangerously inflammable character, citing many instances, amongst others, the burning of a steamer and destruction of life and property, and pray that the importation of the oil be prohibited or a special tariff imposed. They might as well point out the evil effects of petroleum on human health. The proposed additional duty on the oil in Calcutta is all welcome.

A STABLE-KEEPER at Allahabad, H. Wilkinson, not having paid any income tax, was called upon to pay up the arrears. The stable-keeper claimed exemption saying his annual income did not exceed Rs. 500. The Collector summoned him and his books. Wilkinson was sworn before he was questioned by the Collector. The answers not agreeing with the entries in the books which shewed an income of over Rs. 500, Wilkinson has been called upon to answer a charge of perjury. A Barrister and a pleader have been engaged for the defence.

A prosecution of this kind is an unusual step—an extremity of severity which ought not to be lightly restored to—and we hope no vindictive feeling is at bottom in the present case. At any rate, we have grave doubts—from the nature of things—of this zealous Collector bringing his prosecution to a triumphant issue. We should not be surprised to find that this unfortunate stable-keeper's book-keeping was at fault, or that the Collector did not understand it. The Collectors are not strong in accounts. They leave these matters to their underlings, and these again are interested more in conciliating their chiefs than in doing justice. We know how accounts are examined in Bengal when appeals are made against assessments.

A PORTION of the native press has of late making such an exhibition of morals and manners that we shall for some time to come need all the respectability of our ranks to maintain the credit of the whole body. Meanwhile, those who might be ready to make political capital of the freaks of some of our members may legitimately be reminded of the conduct of those Anglo-Indians on the Indian Press who are found washing their dirty linen on the highway. Whatever the shortcomings of the native press, those connected with it are not at all rowdily disposed. Muscular journalism is still the monopoly of the ruling race. One of the last editors of the Madras Athenaeum was continually in hot water—if not also in a more ardent liquid—with his people and frequently in the Courts. At Bangalore, the mutual squabbles of journalists have been notorious. Just now, the Anglo-Indian press of Burma has drawn all eyes on it. The following from a recent Maulmain Advertiser looks like a picture of manners in the Border Territories of the United States:—

"We must ask our readers to excuse the shortcomings of this issue. Yesterday morning at 8-30 as we descended from our conveyance to enter the Press, we were met by a Mr. Henry Bayly of Her Majesty's Customs, who informed us that he was there on behalf of his brother, Mr. John Douglas Bayly, the Chief Clerk of the Judge's Court, Receiver, and Official Assignee, to deny us admittance, as his brother had taken possession. To our inquiries as to the reason no answer was returned. We refused to acknowledge Mr. Henry Bayly's right to bar our way in, and we entered the door of the Press, leaving Mr. Henry Bayly outside. However, he followed inside and tried to prevent our going upstairs, which we resented. Then his brother John Douglas Bayly entered on the premises with a posse of Court peons, among whom we recognized Abdul Gunny and Mootoosawmy. We also remember a Burman whose name we do not know. All these men set on us. Mr. Henry Bayly began to assault. Mr. John Douglas Bayly after hitting us a blow began to dance about and order our expulsion, all the while vociferating—'We will see if you will write another article like Saturday's.' But the combined efforts of the Bayly brothers and the Court peons were unable to eject us. The Police then came on the scene, after putting two men forcibly in, as Mr. John Douglas Bayly, Chief Clerk of the Court, in familiar language said, possession, the Bayly brothers with the Court peons withdrew. Mr. Moyle, barrister-at-law, with his usual readiness to serve a client, came over in answer to an urgent appeal, and after our worthy Magistrate, Colonel Furlong, took his seat and had disposed of a case or two, our petitions, which will be found elsewhere, were presented to him. Summons for assault against the brothers Bayly will be issued, and the two men put in possession have been removed."

THE glorious uncertainty of English law—

That codeless mass of single precedents—has lately been illustrated by a remarkable litigation. One of the peculiarities of that law is the principle of damage. It is a brilliant conception and a great advance on the wild justice of the old Jews with their "an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth" and so on, which continued to govern the criminal code of Christian Britain down to our own times almost. Unhappily, the principle has not been very accurately defined, or why should there be so much difficulty in its application?

A tailor of Melbourne, named Coultas, was driving his wife home in his buggy. In crossing a railway in their path, they were nearly run over by a railway train. This accident was caused by the carelessness of the gate-keeper in opening the gate. When his buggy was actually on the line Coultas discovered to his horror the train in motion before him. He is a cool-headed man—a gem of the European breed—and, instead of allowing his senses to be overpowered or crying to his gods, he strove his best under the dreadful situation and succeeded in getting just out of death's way by a hair's breadth. To keep altogether clear of harm's way, was not possible under the circumstances. In one moment the torture of a generation was crowded for him and his. His nerves must have been dreadfully shaken. Poor Mrs. Coultas's condition may be better imagined than described. She could not be the same woman that she was before the accident—for accident it was though there was not actual impact. Under advice, the Coultases sued the Railway and got damages from a jury of their fellow-citizens, the husband £342, and the wife £400. The Railway Company appealed against the award, but the highest Court in the Colony affirmed it. A private defendant might have been deterred from pursuing the matter further. The Company, having a long purse and no soul to feel either piety or remorse or the pang of disappointment, carried the appeal to England. There the Privy Council has upturned the whole business, decreeing the appeal with costs in both countries, from commencement of action. As the London Daily News observes with pathetic wit, the poor Coultases "may be nearly ruined as a penalty for being nearly killed." According to the Judicial Committee, although impact was not necessary to constitute damage, the injury sustained must be a more direct and necessary consequence of negligence than could be traced in the lady's fright. This ground is the most unkindest cut of all. These grave and reverend seigniors of the law actually snubbed the poor lady for having had her nerves shattered at such a trumpety situation. The harshness of the law is proverbial, but in these humane times such an example of cynicism is, we hope, rare in the highest Courts of the British Empire.

To us the case suggests another reflection.

They go to law, unto the whole hog, who can afford it. Nevertheless, such is the disadvantage of political subjection—the natives of India have to put up with the taunt of being a peculiar people, singular in their addiction to the luxury. And yet, for one out of innumerable examples, here is a simple, not to say trumpety, case of damage between men of the sublime Saxon race, which has been fought to the knife in Courts of both the Northern and Southern Hemispheres, which, after occupying the Judges of the Antipodes, was carried all the way across seas and Continents over to Great Britain, and has there just been decided. Nor do the plaintiffs belong to the much-abused class of professional litigants. They are neither grasping landlords nor refractory tenants, any more than they are pettifoggers or champertists. They are absolute amateurs. For anything that we know to the contrary, or anything that appears on the record, they never stood an action at a County Court nor entered a Police Court. Between them, they constitute scarcely a unit of humanity; for he is a tailor and she his wife. And yet they ventilated their grievance all through their Colony and followed it to the distant mother-country with a pertinacity a Bengali might envy. We hope between this single tailor of Melbourne and his worthy spouse, the plaintiffs do not represent the Victorians, as the three tailors of Tooley Street claimed to represent the people of England.

LAST week we saw how Herodotus was in Christian times repeated and, we may add outHeroded, in Ireland with her Amazons. Still that was a matter of several centuries back. What shall be said of the enlightened Britons of yesterday, when one of their own race can make out, with the necessary documentary proofs, such a case against them as another correspondent of the Spectator, who gives his name, (and a respectable name it is,) makes out, as follows?

"During our struggle in America in 1763 with the Indian Border tribes who were laying waste our settlements with fire and sword, Sir Jeffrey Amherst, the Commander-in-Chief, hard pushed by an enemy whose strength he had not at first realised, writes in a postscript to Colonel Bouquet, who was commanding on the frontier, as follows:—

"Could it not be contrived to send the small-pox among these disaffected tribes of Indians! We must on this occasion use every stratagem in our power to reduce them.—(Signed), J. A."

To this Bouquet replied, also in a postscript, on July 13th, 1763:—

"I will try to inoculate the—with some blankets that may fall in their hands, and take care not to get the disease myself. As it is a pity to expose good men against them, I wish we could make use of the Spanish method, to hunt them with English dogs, supported by rangers and some light horse, who would, I think, effectually extirpate or remove that vermin."

In answer to this, Amherst wrote:—

"You will do well to try and inoculate the Indians by means of blankets, as well as to try every other method that can serve to extirpate this execrable race. I should be very glad if your scheme for hunting them down by dogs could take effect; but England is at too great a distance to think of that at present.—(Signed), J. A."

The originals of this correspondence are in the British Museum among the Bouquet Papers, No. 21,634; but copies of the letters, with remarks and a note thereupon, may be found at pp. 39 and 40, Vol. II. of 'The Conspiracy of Pontiac and the Indian War,' by Francis Parkman, ed. 1885."

And this was British war in the 18th century! And British historians affect to be horrified at the degradation to which Spain and Portugal stooped in their lust for conquest! Of course, there are no bounds to the contempt of all Europeans for the poor Indians of both East and West. We lately had an opportunity of contrasting the honor of the Mussulmans of Algeria with that of Christian France. The Hindu laws of war reaches the chivalry of ideal perfection, and they were no dead letter, being a part of religion itself.

It is stated that Mr. T. D. Sullivan devoted a considerable amount of his time during his recent confinement in Tullamore Gaol to writing verse. His manuscripts, consisting chiefly of parodies and squibs and other original pieces, were announced for publication on the 9thth of February, in a booklet, of some sixty pages, under the name of Pnest's Poems. The butt of Mr. Sullivan's ridicule and denunciation is, of course the unspeakable Chief Secretary, Mr. Balfour. The book is looked forward to with eager interest in Nationalist circles, but whatever concern the friends of the minister might have felt at its "advent," was incautiously dissipated by the specimens which the Irish Home Rule and English Gladstonian newspapers supplied with advance sheet laid before the public. Mr. Sullivan's Muse will not demolish the Ministry. There is nothing like taking the British Bull of a Chief Secretary by the horns, and the antics performed on them will scarcely be felt by their owner. Verse-making is an old resource of unfortunates under confinement. Mr. Sullivan was plentifully supplied with stationery. Pope has told us of one who, locked from ink and paper, scrawls

With desperate charcoal round his darkened walls.

It is true the same poet has sung, and sung with pathetic truth,

Most men are cradled into poetry by wrong,

They learn in suffering what they teach in song.

Shakespeare himself would probably have been lost to the human race but for the Zooloom of a local Zemindar and the rigor of the game laws. As a poor lad, his misfortune in connection with Sir Thomas Lucy's deer lashed him into the production of the lampoon which must have first revealed to him his capacity for literature.

In this century, Byron is a fine example. It was the scornful insolence of "blundering Brougham" that first put him on his mettle, and wrung from him as it were a respectable satire on English Bards and Scotch Reviewers. He felt it was not up to the mark, however, but he had been too deeply injured—in his tenderest part—having been proclaimed a dunce, because he was a young lord—and he persevered, and did not leave till he had given adequate and most convincing refutation and shamed the whole race of critics in a succession of brilliant works in a new and almost startling vein of poetry. Here, too, it was his personal grievance against British society that, refined his coarse voluptuous nature, trained in a rather prosaic school of literature, into poetical protest and gave point to his rather country language and sublimated his rhetoric.

The actual prison-house has had its poetry. Early in modern English literature—in the middle of the 17th century—Richard Lovelace, a true Cavalier in every sense, thrown into unmerited confinement for being the bearer of his country's message to the King, was able to sing—

Stone walls do not a prison make,

Nor iron bars a cage;

Minds innocent and quiet take

That for an hermitage:

If I have freedom in my love

And in my soul am free,

Angels alone, that soar above,

Enjoy such liberty.

Daniel Defoe, a matter-of-fact publicist, who would, in ordinary course, have been ashamed of the dissipation of spinning rhymes, was stung by the degrading chastisement to which he was subjected to the production of his "Ode to the Pillory." In our day, a poor working man, with a passionate ardour for improvement of self and the world, had, under the most stupendous difficulties, taught himself languages and all the learning of professors and devoted himself to the politics of the poor. His views were Radical, of course, but not more so than those of the Liberal party of the present day. In fact, nearly two-thirds of the People's Charter put forward by his party have been already won and are part of the law of the land and constitution of the nation. Yet, half a century ago, it was a crime to hold the tenets of that platform. The respectable—who are always the prudent—shrank from the appearance of sympathy with the Chartists, as these reformers were called, and men in high places did not scruple to hunt these unfortunates down as wild beasts. Many were those who under this cruel persecution turned their backs on their principles and even betrayed their own friends. Thomas Cooper, however, remained staunch. It was not long before he earned his crown of martyrdom. Under a cruel administration of justice, in connection with which the good name of Denman is compromised, he was unrighteously consigned to a felon's den. There he utilised his enforced leisure by writing a long and remarkable poem of many books and cantos. It is a series of historical scenes and comments on the characters concerned, without the unities of a single fable. But it shows varied learning and abounds in eloquence and contains many striking pages. Irish Fenianism and Home Rule certainly produced nothing near the "Purgatory of Suicides." The present crisis in Ireland has filled the gaols with men of education—the pick of Irish society, literary men in particular. But it has been singularly barren in literature. Parnellism has not yet given its oration or its poem to be remembered. The mad enterprise of 1802 was ennobled by the romance of Emmett's love and Emmett's eloquence. One stanza of Cooper outweighs all the parodies of T. D. Sullivan. The poetry of the Irish struggle of the day probably remains to be contributed by the pen of Wilfrid Blunt.

As usual, the Indian Mirror misled the public, unwittingly of course, by its alarming interpretation of a passage in the last speech of the Agent to the Governor-General in Central India. That passage does not refer to the Indore State. We learnt the truth too late for our last impression. It would have been extraordinary even for the absurd and horrid thing that the Government of India is in our contemporary's diseased imagination, if, immediately after the Maharaja's return from his loyal voyage all the way to England to lend eclat to Her Majesty's Jubilee, Holkar was rewarded with his virtual deposition. As a matter of fact, there has never been any proposition of the kind from the "unspeakable" Griffin, nor is there any record in the Foreign Office of such idea being ever entertained in any quarter.

Of course, naughty as Sir Lepel Griffin has ever been, and much as he would like at this moment to mystify and confound us of the Bengal Press, he could scarcely, in a public speech, in his official capacity, deal in hoaxes. He must mean what he says, and some poor beggar of an Indian Chief is doubtless doomed. Who is he? There are so many chiefships in Central India that guessing is out of the question, unless a journal like to be made a—Mirror of. We have heard from a well-informed source that the doomed state is Dewas. But which Dewas? For there are two branches of the family.

Here our informant fails us. We think we can make a pretty sure guess. As the head of the Junior Branch is a fine young man in the good books of Government, it must be the Chief of the Senior family whom Sir Lepel will soon proceed to shear of his powers and privileges. In fact, this latter Chief has been in trouble for some time. The Agency had repeatedly reported him, and there was a proposition to limit his powers. It would seem that Government had latterly made up its mind. We hope the Chief was at last roused to his danger by Sir Lepel's speech, and that he has given satisfactory pledges for the future.

We are glad to hear that the High Priest of Deoghur lately brought Baboo Hurro Nath Roy's Midwifery Vade-Mecum, which we reviewed at length in February, to the notice of the Association for supplying medical aid to the women of India, and that Major Cooper, the zealous first Honorary Secretary of the Society, promptly referred the matter to the Medical Board. It is believed that the Board has acted like a board—a screen that is. It has, without facing the question in the liberal spirit that its relation to human suffering demands, simply forwarded an old opinion of the Text-Book Committee which had voted against this valuable work on the ground of its sanctioning the Homœopathic treatment. But the therapeutic part of the Vade-mecum is but an inconsiderable part of it, and certainly the Homœopathic bias of the treatise does not make its general science the less scientific, nor the vast experience of other kinds, which is treasured up in it, the less useful. The book does not eschew the Established Church in medicine. Perhaps, it may be introduced into schools with a proviso to pass over the Homœopathic treatment.

CHOLERA is raging in Cashmere. How can the Viceroy be going there?

THE disease is at our door too, not only in the Suburb of Bhowanipore but also in some of the native parts of the town, such as Coomertoolee, &c.

THIS afternoon the Viceroy took in Uttarpura on his way to Barrackpore (where he goes for the last time) visiting his colleague in the legislature, Raja Peary Mohun and the remarkable old man his father. There was a gathering of European and native friends on the occasion. An unfortunate accident marred the pleasure. A boat capsized, and Dr. Salzer, the eminent Homœopathic Physician, fell into the river. He was, however, promptly pulled up out of the water in a state of unconsciousness. The Maharaja of Vizianagram, like a true knight that he is, took an active and noble part in the rescue.

NOW that Sir Rivers Thompson's and the Ramees' nominee in the management of the Digaputtee Estate, in Rajshaye, has been forced to resign, we hope the present Lieutenant-Governor will be in no haste to fill up the appointment at random. A man of character who has really had experience of zemindary management and surely such men must be known to the Board—ought to be appointed. No intrigue or favoritism ought to be allowed.

THE Viceroy is expected at the municipal meeting of Wednesday next. The chief business will be the adoption of the budget for the year 1888-99 and the fixing of the rates. We trust Baboo Surendra Nath Banerjee will for the nonce emancipate himself from the influences of his stupa, and prepare something good and worthy of his reputation and his best power. No mudra, mind!

The Municipal Budget Committee have recommended a House rate of 9 per cent. There was a proposition for 8½, but the other was carried by the second or casting vote of the Chairman.

THAT great Military authority the Indian Mirror notwithstanding, Lingtu has fallen. It was no tough work. The Viceroy thus announced in Friday's Council the success of British arms in Upper Sikkim:—

"Before we commence the proceedings of to-day it may, perhaps, be interesting to the Council to know that her Majesty's troops have taken possession of Fort Lingtu, Upper Sikkim, without opposition. On the 19th they came upon a small stockade erected by the Tibetans at which some small opposition was encountered, but with their usual gallantry our troops rushed at it, and the enemy fled with scarcely any resistance. The effect of this success seems completely to have disorganised them, and, as I have already mentioned, they have abandoned their position. I am in great hopes that this slight and facile vindication of our territorial rights will give us free access to the road through Sikkim which had been taken possession of by the enemy, and will close this trifling dispute which has unfortunately arisen between us and the Tibetans."

WE have no space for the proceedings of the Dufferin memorial. One speech, however, that of the Maharaja of Vizianagram, is at once brief enough for accommodation in our columns and interesting enough for preservation. We record it the more gladly that it could not be delivered, so that even those who were present missed it. The whole of it is characteristic for matter as well as manner. The knightly speaker concludes with a challenge to the Mirror. We are indebted to His Highness for a correct text:—

"Your Highness and Gentlemen,—It gives me great pleasure at being in the capital of this vast Empire, to join in doing honor, in the highest degree possible to us, to His Excellency the Earl of Dufferin, Viceroy of India, and to give some tangible proof of our appreciation of his glorious rule for the last four years or so. The word 'glorious' is advisedly used by me, for I think no other term so aptly illustrates the many advantages the Empire at large has derived from His Excellency's Viceroyalty, which will signalise the period as the brightest epoch in the life of this nascent consolidated Empire of British Hindustan. His spirited frontier policy, while securing the friendly co-operation of our Northern neighbours on one hand, on the other presents this great Empire in an unbroken front to our enemies, which is a higher and more insurmountable, barrier than our mountain ranges themselves on our Northern Frontier. Never was more spontaneous unity shown either by the Princes or by the people of India, in making common cause with the ruling power in preventing any attempt at making inroads into our Empire by enemies. This was all done with the least expense, within the shortest period possible consistent with the great advantages achieved. Then, again, the eradication of despotism in Burmah for ever in future should have won a golden statue from us, or from all those that breathe after civilization, and at least the title of Marquis or the Duke of Mandalay from the English Sovereign would not be too great a reward for such services. For I think Count Bismarck was made Prince for no greater acquisition gained by him for Germany than that which the Duke of Mandalay—I mean our present Viceroy—has gained in the interests of civilisation in general, and that of the British Empire in particular. For it is known to every one that the definition of politics and morals is one and the same—the greatest good of the greatest number. To the internal improvements effected by His Excellency, who can raise a dissenting voice? The two Commissions viz., the Finance Commission and the Public Service Commission, which His Excellency has constituted, must be admitted by all as being big with economical and other essential improvements of the administration. Above all, the Countess of Dufferin's medical aid to the women of India alone bears a fair comparison with any of the best deeds bequeathed by the very best in the long list of our most renowned Viceroys. Neither my humble means, nor my opportunities, allow me to say more of His Excellency's glorious rule. My only regret, and I think that of those of my countrymen is, that His Excellency should leave the field of his administrative triumph in this country so soon. As to the incoherent wailings of a small section of the community, I can only say that my harvest of gratification at the success that has crowned all His Excellency's praiseworthy endeavours for India, would not have been complete without this spectacle of a gnat of a scarecrow. I feel the aptness of the Persian saying shabparagar wisley astib nakkhadhad Raonak e bidar e astib nakhud. "Though the bat may refuse to fly in the light, that does not diminish the splendour of the luminary." When a misguided journal represents this august and most respectable body of representative native noblemen and gentlemen, who have requested your Highness to preside over them, as prompted by motives of personal interest, or some other unpraiseworthy motives, I wonder whether it is prepared to admit logically that the obverse is absence of reward, and produces abusive language which, in its abused and privileged freedom of speech, sets aside all feelings of decorum. If such a writer really mean this, I should be the first, if it were in my power, to give away my newly-obtained K. C. I. E. to him to save him from the desperate deplorings of his despondency. I believe he is only trying to amuse the public whom nothing short of a categorical and logical denial of what I have stated above will make me think that he is really in earnest.

That is, speaking moderately, at least as well-argued and as well-expressed as the best of our contemporary's "leaders."

REIS & RAYYET.

SATURDAY, MARCH 24, 1888.

THE DUFFERIN DEMONSTRATION.

THIS has been the Viceroy's week. It commenced with a garden party at Government House, on Monday afternoon to all who have the entrée of the viceregal palace, given by Lady Dufferin. As their Excellencies are, after the middle of next week—Thursday morning—leaving Calcutta for aye, and as every day the thermometer is slowly but surely rising, it was understood to be the last out-door party—perhaps the last of the general invitations—given by the present heads of the Viceregal Court. Be that it was, there were other public engagements of a high description on the same date. Nevertheless, the extensive plain to the south-east of the Southern façade of the house itself was filled with a lively throng of Europeans and natives representing every section and profession. As usual, Lord Dufferin and his wife were attentive and courteous to all. The Grand Old Man of a Native A. D. C.—Gopal Singh—brought up everybody for introduction to her ladyship who shook each and every by the hand.

Now came the people's turn for the return due to the retiring heads of Government and society. On Thursday, commenced the demonstration in honor of their Excellencies. It may be regarded as partly a political and partly a social demonstration—political chiefly so far as his Lordship was concerned and wholly social in respect of her Ladyship.

It would have been better had the two things not been almost synchronous. But that is casier wished than accomplished. Considering the warmth of the weather, considering the vast distances of the country and the still imperfect means of locomotion, and, last not least, considering the absorbing occupations of men at this season when we are threatened to be overtaken every day by the scorching Indian simoom, it would have been too much to expect of flesh and blood to gather from all parts of the Bengal Provinces to attend at two several meetings in these sultry afternoons and two deputations for the presentation of two separate addresses, and the party given to their recipients. For, a strict delimitation of the frontiers—a scrupulous demarcation of the boundaries between the political and the philanthropic and the social, would have required that sort of arrangement and have involved a considerable sacrifice of time and resources of all kinds. With all their zeal for their Excellencies, the practical good sense of the public revolted at the idea of paying so much for a whistle—a pedantic symmetry. Lord and Lady Dufferin themselves could scarcely afford the time for giving their separate audiences and then attend their Reception into the bargain. There was, in fact, a difficulty to begin with. There is a peculiarity in the present case which did not appertain to that of any other heads of the Viceregal Court. In previous administrations, the man was everything—the woman nothing. Here, closely entwined in the bonds of connubial affection, was a harmonious equal partnership of public beneficence. If my Lord is good—my Lady is better. Comparisons, always delicate, are specially odious in respect of benevolent work and workers. We are far from depreciating the ladies of the households of previous Governors-General. They have doubtless all or nearly all of them been gracious and kind in their spheres and in their respective ways. Even Warren Hastings' inamorata, the Baroness Imhoff, who was transferred from one man to another like a head of cattle for so much cash down, possessed a human heart, and there are traditions in our society of her great friendliness to her native servants. Lady Loudon, Lady William Bentinck, the Hon'ble Misses Eden, and Lady Canning, interested themselves in the organization of charity, founding or forwarding institutions. Nevertheless, philanthropy occupied but a small portion of their attention, and, besides, there were whole periods of absolute indifference and neglect. We have now among us a lady who has distanced the best of them and who, for the first time within these twenty seven years, has, by the lustre of woman's sympathy for humanity in general, doubled the halo of triumph of a Viceroyalty. There is scarcely a single charitable institution in the country which has appealed to her in vain, which she did not, in some way or another, help, while the organisation of the Association for Medical aid to the women of India is a colossal undertaking, which by itself might make the highest reputation for any philanthropist. Hence the necessity of a formal regular treatment of her claims, as well as that of her illustrious husband's. It would not have done to have dismissed such a benefactor to India as Lady Dufferin with a perfunctory hole and corner compliment. A great public demonstration was required by the dignity of each case. But as time and breath had to be economised, the two movements were consolidated into one. Or, shall we say, a great forked demonstration embracing both their Excellencies was determined upon. First a meeting of the non-official community was to be held at which addresses to their Excellencies respectively and memorials would be voted, and next evening a party given at which Lord and Lady would be received and the addresses be presented to them.

Accordingly, the movement for honoring Lord and Lady Dufferin, which had been brewing since the Requisition to the Sheriff was in circulation for signatures, burst forth in a great meeting on Thursday. It was a sunshiny, sultry day and, as the hour fixed was 4 o'clock in the afternoon, it was under the direct rays of the great luminary that people left their homes or places of business—to say nothing of the grilling, all day, of those who travelled down to Calcutta from the country. The gathering, unprecedented as it was within this generation, acquires a still greater significance from these circumstances. Nor was there that fictitious element of schoolboys introduced from a very early hour, which has, of late years, discredited the meetings of our native agitators and stump orators. It was a serious business undertaken by practical men and pursued in a workmanlike manner. No opportunity was given to the spoiled children of Calcutta and the Suburbs to march from an early hour and take shelter from the sun within the Hall and rest and refresh themselves before, at the beck of their senseless schoolmasters, they might be called upon to vociferate cheers and clap themselves out of the skins of their palms. There was nothing underhand in this. It was announced some days before that the door would be opened only half an hour before the appointed time, and so it was. As was anticipated, a goodly number of schoolboys, headed by one or two school teachers, were in attendance from an early hour, but they were not allowed to enter and occupy all the seats as they do at other meetings leaving the adult and respectable part of the community—even the very men who had invited the public—to shift for themselves as best they might, by standing in the punkaless aisles, or to leave the business of the day to its fate and go home. Even to this juvenile mobocracy all due consideration, consistent with the claims of the business of the day and those of the comfort of the adult attendance, was shown. There was no rudeness towards them—there was no absolute prohibition against them—only half an hour was allowed to the above-aged public to enter and find their places, and then, about or soon after the commencement of the business, the non-aged were allowed to go in.

In twenty minutes, the long space between the colonnades was filled. A quarter more and the vast Hall was full to overflowing from end to end. Not only the middle of the hall but the long and roomy sides were packed in the most economical though not the most comfortable way. We are not good hands at estimating numbers and shall not venture on any beyond telling that there were several thousand. For there were quite as many men as the Hall could hold. Nay, more than it actually could hold. For, men were continually going out, driven by the heat and suffocation, while their room was immediately filled by new-comers. Thus the meeting was not only great in numbers but choice in its personnel. To begin with, it was a meeting of men—in legal as well as other senses—and not of infants. With the exception of a part of the boys mentioned before and a few younger pupils of the Meddresse who had got in under cover of their seniors, as also a few poor honest folk introduced by some overzealous men, the attendance was at once adult and respectable—composed of men of sufficient majority and of some sense of responsibility. It was a motley crew, however, in the best sense. The vast attendance was formed of various elements. The multitudinous throng was formed of all communities and of all classes. All the honest professions into which society is divided, had supplied their contingents. All the races too were fully represented. The Town Hall had become a hall of all nations and nationalities to be found in this Continent of an Empire. As a consequence, there is scarcely a people on the earth which had not furnished at least a sample. It was a joint demonstration of natives and domiciled and resident foreigners. Of course, the native element predominated, but Europeans were numerous too. There were Hindus and Mahomedans of every tribe and sect, Bengalis, Orissans, Beharis, Klings, Telooongs, Tamils, Carnats, Malabaris, Maharattas, Gujratis, Sikhs and other Punjabis, Parsees, Memons, Jains, Cashmerees, Lepchas, Goorkhas, Bhotas, Afghans, Persians, Turks, Arabs, Syrians, Jews, Mugs, Burmese, and even Chinese and Malays, Somalis, Abyssinians and Africans. With so many Orientals, the deportment of the attendance was naturally rather grave, but this was made up by the liveliness of the scenic effect from the variety of colour in the sea of faces and in the different costumes. The Europeans' behaviour was charming. Although they showed the way and undertook the trouble and responsibility of the arrangements, they were content to allow their Asiatic brethren full dues and even precedence wherever practicable.

It was a lucky accident that the High Sheriff of the Metropolis for the year happens to be a distinguished and accomplished Bengali gentleman, gifted with rare powers of eloquence. The Sheriff is the official privileged to call public meetings, and the fact of Dr. Mohendralal Sircar being the Sheriff no doubt imparted an interest to the occasion. Dr. Sircar did not make any oratorical effort, but still in opening the proceedings, with the reading of the Requisition of the Maharajas, Rajas, and gentlemen, European and native, headed by the Nawab of Moorshedabad, and his compliance therewith, he expressed his admiration of the character and abilities and antecedents of our Viceroy and touched on the philanthropy of His Excellency's consort. At the instance of the Nawab of Moorshedabad and the Maharaja of Doomraon, the chair was given to the Maharaja of Durbhanga. The first Resolution was now moved by Mr. L. P. Pugh, late a member of the British House of Commons and now one of the leaders of the Calcutta bar, for presenting the retiring Viceroy a parting Address, briefly reviewing the official career of Lord Dufferin. Mr. Pugh was seconded by Maharaja Narendra Krishna and supported by Nawab Abdool Lutef Bahadour and Mr. M. P. Gasper of the bar. The second Resolution voting a statue was moved by the Hon'ble Raja Peary Mohun Mookerjee seconded by Syud Amcer Ali Saheb and supported by Messrs. R. D. Mehta and Jaggannath Khannah. The next proposition was for an Address (which was read) to Lady Dufferin and for a portrait in the Hall in recognition of her public services, moved by the Hon'ble R. Steel, the mercantile member of the Legislative Council of India, and seconded by Master Hallett—no broth of a boy though, being the Master of the Trades—in other words the Chowdhri, or shall we say, Doyen of the Cockneys of Calcutta? They were followed on the same side by Shahzada Furrokh Shah, as the mouthpiece of the Princes of the House of Hyder Ali of Mysore. Then came a formidable catalogue of Committee-wallahs—far more tedious than Homer's catalogue of the Greek Fleet—to execute the behests of the meeting, with carte blanche to do and undo for the purpose of carrying out the objects. We are never going to inflict this long trailing list, the Alpha whereof is Sir Steuart Bayley, and the Omega, Mr. H. M. Rustomjee. The proposer and seconder were Messrs. J. G. Apar and Manockjee Rustomjee, respectively, followed in support by Mr. R. Allen, barrister. Mr. J. E. D. Ezra, the Jew par excellence—in the best senses—seconded by Prince Jehan Kudr, the head of the Oudh Family, proposed the vote of thanks to the Chair. All these motions were carried unanimously, we may say by general acclaim.

Oriental audiences are not demonstrative, and there was no wire-pulling at this meeting or even the slightest anxiety manifested by the promoters for effect. There was spirit in the assembly, and evident zeal depicted in many faces. The speeches were listened to with interest, and cheers were given even for indifferent smartness, until the heat of an almost April afternoon in that close atmosphere drove many to seek not comfort only, but very safety in the open without. And then the latter speakers completed the "stampede." This is a valuable quality of oratory in the Tropics, and speakers like Mr. Rowe and Raja Siva Prasad, both of the Education Department, might be utilised as patent ventilators. Seriously, these gentlemen's eloquence proved a godsend, for unless the room had been cleared to some extent, the gas illumination which followed would have been the death of the more delicate of the ladies and gentlemen present.

The truth is simple. "Speech is silvern, but silence is golden." Amen! So, oratory is, like the Rupees, going down, in the markets of the world, and everywhere losing favor. In India, it is among the lost arts, since Surendra Nath Banerjee was, by a stern Government, driven to the stump. This great and strong meeting was certainly not strong in the speaking. There was no end of speakers on the cast, though, and a number of volunteers besides, not bargained for, who ought to have been conjured to desist. The Maharaja of Vizianagram showed a rare wisdom and moderation in making over the rather striking little speech which he had got by heart and in his pocket, to the reporters.

Mr. Pugh has no advantage of voice, but he spoke with the weight of an ex-M. P. He made a good point at start, referring to Lord Dufferin's popularity among all parties. It must, said he, be an exceptionally able and sound man who could in England command the confidence of both sides of the House. Mr. Gasper spoke as an Armenian of Lord Dufferin's services as British representative in Turkey, and, like Mr. Pugh, dwelt on the success of the Viceroy's Imperial policy on both frontiers. For the rest, the speeches were an echo of the Addresses. For the first time, Nawab Abdool Lutef and Raja Peary Mohan raised their voices to speaking height, and the speech of the former was to the point, in choice language recommending the Address. And for once he did not inflict on us the Mahomedan legend. Usually in India speakers are permitted to deliver some generalities without regard to the particular motions. Thus poor Maharaja Narendra Krishna again produced his everlasting platitudes about India as the brightest jewel in the diadem of England, &c., &c., &c. Perhaps, the most notable speech was Mr. Mehta's, well-put, well-got up, and, though read from M.S., pronounced with force and effect.

There was visible the nervous trepidation of one who despaired of commanding attention at the fag end. Indeed, if he had not hurried through his speech, he would have been denied a hearing, and he showed great adroitness in securing it. Towards the end, he made one or two slips, but he each time was on his legs again. He chalked out an original line of treatment of his subject. The deficiencies in the oratory were amply made up in the able Address, the production, we believe, of Mr. S. E. J. Clarke, a well-known writer on the Bengal press. It is not only well-worded, but well-reasoned, and, above all, it possesses that moderation which draws general sympathy.

The next evening, the Town Hall was tastefully fitted up for a Conversazione for the viceregal reception. We would fain dwell on the delightful scene, but space forbids. Between a guard of honor of the Calcutta Volunteers—including artillery and guns and all, in fact, except horses—their Excellencies were led up, all the way from the flight of steps before the Maidan, till they were seated on the dais, the band playing.

At the conclusion of the march, the monumental figure of the Lieutenant-Governor might be discerned from the most distant corner of the hall. For, now standing up, Sir Steuart Bayley read the Address to the Viceroy, to which His Excellency gave an elaborate and brilliant reply containing a vindication of his administration. The reply was interrupted by frequent cheers which, on its close, rose to deafening and long continued—

Clap, clap, all together, clap, clap away,

For this is the way they exercise to have a little play, when the British are supremely pleased.

Then came the turn of the worthy wife. Sir Alexander Wilson read the Address voted to her. In her reply, Her Excellency rose to the dignity, calm self-possession, and well-expressed fluency of the true orator. This brought the formal demonstration to a close, and with it virtually the Viceroy's Calcutta career.

As he began so Lord Dufferin ended—as a perfect gentleman—going round the place and offering his hand to all whom he met or met with.

Although cards were issued and the admissions to the party were select, the Town Hall was, on Friday evening, almost as densely filled as in the afternoon of Thursday. There was a distinct difference in the obvious preponderance at the Conversazione of the official element and in the agreeable preponderance of the fair sex. Yes, and the fair sex in very sooth and not of courtesy. There was scarcely a brunette. There was but a drop of the Eurasian element, either male or female, in the un-uniformed part of the attendance, though there were Volunteers of all shades, from brown to jet black.

The success of the demonstration is patent—its importance cannot be mistaken. Judged by the test stake in the Empire, there probably never was such another demonstration. There were almost sovereign princes and great territorial Dukes and Marquesses in the movement. All the European commercial and landed and professional interests were represented. All the Armenian and Jewish and Parsee families and houses of business—all the European trades. Messrs. Gubboy and Ezra between them own half Calcutta, besides being large creditors of the Public Debt. And what proof of earnestness can be more reliable than that of the Rajas, Maharajas and Nawab, who came down on purpose to lend their presence?

LORD DUFFERIN.

Sir,—Some of the Native papers, famous for notoriety-hunting, are trying to create an impression that the opposition that is being organised by the Indian Association, against the movement set on foot to do honor to the retiring Viceroy, has the sympathy of the Natives generally. The attempt is a very sinister one, and reflects credit of the meanest order to its authors. The Natives, a large, if not the entire, number of them, and specially those having reason and intelligence enough, have no sympathy whatever with the oppositionists, and those who say the contrary, speak but deliberate falsehood. Why, what earthly reason can there be for them to take up this hostile attitude? Lord Dufferin may not have done them positive good, but there can be no question that he has not done the slightest harm to them. That is more than can be said of many of our rulers. Why, then, should there be movements against him? All that can be urged against him, is that he has failed to please every body. But that is no fault, to be sure. We could do only what is just and proper. He can certainly not listen to idle talk, or make concessions to unjust claims and demands. Can he then with any sense of reason and fair-play be held responsible for the heart-burning and displeasure, that are now being manifested in some quarters? And need I say that they are entirely wrong who think that the course adopted by the Indian Association, has the approval and sympathy of any reasonable sensible mind?

But the matter does not end here. Though firmly and decidedly opposed to the opposition, people must be prevailed upon to join it. And the arduous and onerous task has been zealously taken up by the so-called public-spirited and patriotic gentleman, Baboo, I beg his pardon, Mr. Surendra Nath Bannerjee, formerly of Her Majesty's Bengal Civil Service! This worthy champion of his country's cause, in discharge of the duties he has thus voluntarily and with becoming grace allowed to devolve upon himself, has sacrificed his own, so much so that he has given up sleep and meals almost. He may now be seen at the door of every native gentleman, exhorting the members of the house to join with him, and thus accomplish something grand that will immortalise their names! I do not know how far he has succeeded in his efforts, but he has simply driven himself into a position that no kind-hearted man can see without pitying. From this, Mr. Editor, know the value and importance of native movements, the mode of their organisations and developments.

By the opposition they mean to offer, they will, among other things, show how extremely mean-minded they are. For it is quite clear that their unhallowed zeal is simply an outcome of their disappointment at the non-fulfilment of their extravagant expectations. If, what they hoped for had been achieved, they would have undoubtedly by this time lifted the Viceroy up to Heaven, but the case being otherwise, they have now thought fit to send him down to perdition! thus showing the world what a mercenary lot they are, and how easily they can be gained over by simple bribes! I believe they know pretty well, or ought to know that their chances of success are very small. If they count some intelligent and capable men on their side, those who have purposed to honor the retiring Viceroy have such on theirs too, including both Natives and Europeans. Here, from the very beginning, they are thrown at a disadvantage. Not the least of their difficulties lies in the fact of their being out of sympathy of many of their own countrymen. Thus divided amongst themselves, will it not be the height of foolishness on their part to hope for success?

And need I remind them that they can't well compete with Englishmen. Just for a moment call to mind the energy, zeal and pluck the latter exhibited in the Ilbert Bill controversy. In a very short time, and in spite of the paucity of their numbers, and without a large class of wealthy men, they easily and in a short time raised money to the amount of a hundred thousand rupees! But what becomes generally of our Bengali efforts? A Fund, known as the "National Fund" was started by the same patriotic Mr. Surendra Nath Bannerjee on coming out of jail (on the expiry of his term of imprisonment) for libelling a Judge of His Majesty's High Court some years ago, but to his disappointment and his admirers' eternal shame though there is no want of affluence among them it has reached but a few thousands only! But what is more strange, no account of the Fund is given, even if asked for.

To the Editor.

KISSORY NATH MITRA.

REVIEW.

Travels and Voyages between Calcutta and Independent Tipperah. By Sambhu C. Mookerjee, formerly Minister to His Highness the late Nawab Faridooon Jah Bahadoor (the last of the Nawabs Nazim of Bengal, Behar and Orissa), latterly Minister of His Highness Maharaja Beer Chunder Dev Burmon Manikya Bahadoor, of Independent Tipperah. Calcutta: Reis and Rayyet Office. 1887.

It is many years since I first met, and some years since I last met, Dr. Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee, editor of the Reis and Rayyet (Prince and Peasant), and an author of high repute among the kindly, as well as acute and intellectual, people of Bengal. One of the real misfortunes of India was, and still is, Lord Macaulay's picture of the Bengalee. The picture, true perhaps as regards Nuncomar and many Bengalees, is not accurate as a representation of the people generally, taking them as an Englishman may find them if he looks fairly. If they had been unfaithful, the sad story of the Mutiny had been vastly sadder; and, apart from the Mutiny, many Englishmen could give individual instances of Bengalee faithfulness almost unique in history, taking all the circumstances of our relation to India into account. The Bengalee is generally eager for knowledge of all kinds, and is often both courageous in the expression of his opinions, and gifted to a remarkable degree with the power to express those opinions with force and precision. Mr. Fawcett once told me that an unprepared speech made, on his behalf, during an election, by a young Hindoo, surpassed, in force as well as eloquence, any unprepared speech he ever had heard made by any member of the House of Commons, if four or five members of the House were excepted.

Among these Bengalees there is a small body of men—small for that large province—who are, ironically or otherwise termed "Young Bengal." Some of them are no longer young, but grave and aged; some have, in the course of years, been highly distinguished for their public services and their scientific and other attainments. Some have at times been misrepresented, and their language misinterpreted, so that on its return to them it has amazed none more than themselves. Nothing of this has been done by the really great administrators of India. That it has been done, however, cannot be denied.

In the forefront of this little band is the author of this book of travels, Baboo Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee—a writer of high repute, as I have said, and also an administrator, as the reader will see from the little-page to this book. A keener, yet a kindlier satirist, one might seek for and not find. His use of the English language has astonished many an educated Englishman; and the quality of his reading is shown by his marvellous power of quotation; not merely from authors like Shakespeare, and Milton, and Macaulay, and men eminent in science, but from out-of-the-way old ballads, and little-known old pamphlets, in the application of which he leaves one wondering—first, how he obtained the productions at all, and secondly, how, having obtained them, he learned to apply them so appositely to the subjects which he intends them to illustrate.

Passing from the author to his book, we shall, perhaps, first of all be attracted to the work of the administrator. He comes upon a milkman's village, on which he finds fastened the grip of a Court favourite. He unloosens the grip, and re-settles the village, in the double interest of Prince and Peasant. And all the time he sees everything. The poor people bathing on the rivers' banks, have his genial and kindly, if also at times, what a Scotchman would call, his "pawky" notice. A "fair maid of Sonargoan" attracts his attention by the gracefulness with which she carries a vessel of water from the river; and, though the fair maid and he are divided by race and faith (she is Mussulman), she has his full meed of praise. Indeed, it must be admitted—and he will not be offended with me for saying so—that he never meets with a fair face, without at least giving evidence of the fact that he has eyes to see and a heart to comprehend.

Of his wide and generous sympathies, much might be said, and still leave much more to say. He meets a missionary on the river, and evidently is inclined, in writing his notes, to pass a joke on the subject. He nips it, however, in the bud, and contents himself with saying, "So new is preaching here, that the simple people said the padre had been singing in the street." He meets Catholic and Protestant missionaries on shipboard, and chuckles over their disputes, while he astonishes them by his command of the English language, and even by his knowledge of the Bible—a knowledge, I may add, which is evident in many of his writings.

A parrot falls overboard, and is drowned in its cage, so his great distress, which is not however paraded. He says:

"I was . . . more than ever confirmed in my opinion against confining animals. If all this sounds weak, there is no help for it: it is God's appointment that we should love His creatures that are lovable. We cannot escape from our hearts. For my part I never invite pets: it is too great a responsibility."

These are not the words of a Christian, but of a Hindoo.

Again, he has a faithful ugly dog, whose name is Tom, and whose glory it once was to bark, with a noble independence, at some very dignified Sahibs. Our author is compelled to leave Tom behind; and here is his farewell:

"Poor Tom, the noble pariah dog, is—I wish to Heaven I could say—gone! he was only going, too slowly perhaps for him, but surely. He was suffering dreadfully from fatal sores all over, specially in the head. He bore it up like a hero that he was. By pure power of will he kept himself from running mad. The best of us would be furious under less than his complaint. I may here say that I have seen better brutes than men. The dogs are indeed the noblest creatures of God. The three noblest beings within my knowledge were three perfect canine gentlemen—one a Newfoundland, another of some large European breed, and the third a Bengalee pariah, my poor Tom."

I think this is a very fine passage, and one that will draw the author very close to the great heart of humanity, wherever the words are read. Could anything be finer than the testimony to the two foreign "gentlemen," ending with the "Bengalee pariah, my poor Tom"? Not the pariah merely, but the pariah dog. The passage is worthy of the author, and of the great mercifulness of the land that bore him.

Whoever reads this book must be prepared further to find bold and manly language. The author is no flatterer of John Bull, though he gives John his due, and admits that India owes him a great debt. Here is one passage relating to foreign fruits :

"It is only since our country has been thrown open to foreign, above all, European enterprise, that our orchards and flower-gardens and kitchen-gardens have been vastly improved, that we have made the acquaintance of new and desirable eatables and drinkables, and acquired a taste for new comforts and luxuries, as well as the means for satisfying them. Undue pretensions must be curbed. It is necessary to keep the best men and races straight, and I have never been slow to prick when required—the objects of the attention enjoying the thing and it having, by the way, a wholesome effect on the neighbours and bystanders of all camps. But the insane jealousy of the White man I can never sympathise with. It is neither patriotic nor candid. It is simply ignorant and puerile. A moment's inward glance at the source of our most energising ideas, the slightest enquiry into the derivation of our physical enjoyments—of what we eat or drink, or wear, or sleep upon, or write with, what houses we live in, what furniture we use—ought to be sufficient to disabuse every honest Indian of the unfortunate prejudice. The stranger has given a substantial return. He has at any rate given you the golden Champa plantain : no Dead Sea apple, but with rich pulp within. It is your fault if you neglect it. Thus, in East Bengal, where his influence has been less felt, our brethren are without it. Here, then, is distinct room for improvement. The man that introduces in his district the exotic fruits and vegetables with which foreigners have enriched our land, will benefit at once himself and his country."

Among the sketches of country—word-pictures—the reader will find some exceedingly pretty, and all the more valuable in that they are taken from a standground purely Indian ; not English. Where an English artist's mind would be filled with European ideas, the mind of this gifted Eastern artist is filled with a class of ideas totally different, yet equally instructive, and certainly not less subtle and far-reaching.

On the eve of one of his journeys, our author was placed in a dilemma of a kind not unknown to travellers in India, but not on that account the less stupid. He wished to go by a particular boat, and took time by the forelock for that purpose. The fare was at first stated at 90 rupees, to pay which he offered "a new crisp, fresh British Indian" note for 100 rupees. "It was," he adds, "fresh from the Currency Office, and had been received only the day before from another Government department." The rest of the story is thus told :

"They'd none of it, change or no change. In vain my people explained and entreated the clerks. The Government scrip was no currency on the Government railway. In vain my friends appealed to the Lord of the Terminus. My friends might be ever so respectable—and they included barristers, Presidency Magistrates and editors—but, for any assistance that I got from them in that dilemma, they proved the veriest scum of earth. The Railway King was inexorable ; I must bring silver, and that of the Calcutta mint. British dress—the sterling majesty of sovereigns—would have been spurned by His Imperial Majesty of Scaldah. It was a pretty predicament for a traveller to be in, with a whole lot of camp-followers and baggage of rather expeditionary proportions. There was not much time left, it having been nearly all consumed in argument and expostulation, and entreaty at different business centres at the station. Certainly there was no more time to go home for coined bullion, and little prospect, at that evening hour, of changing the note at the neighbouring money-scrivener's. I had no other alternative to betaRe to than a leisurely retreat. . . . Practically it meant the loss of a week. If I missed that evening's chance, I must wait another seven days to be able to avail myself of the convenience of the larger steamer from Goalundo. . . . In this moment of despair my good genius turned up on the scene in the shape of a friendly official—a Justice of the Peace and a Magistrate—no honorary figure-head, but a regular stipendiary reality—and what not besides. At the advent of the great man there was a sudden change in my affairs. His very name acted as a charm on the rude railway establishment—his presence was a power of beneficence. Before he was fairly in the station—as soon as he was in sight, and my masters understood from my men that he was coming to see me off—my fortunes revived. Suddenly there came a relaxation in the hard and fast rule of the little men dressed in brief authority. The marinet was in a moment metamorphosed into the courtier. My note was recalled after having been peremptorily rejected. The Paper Currency, that had before been at such discount, again fetched sixteen annas to the rupee. They not only accepted my note as legal tender, but, when it was found that the railway demand upon me was full one hundred rupees, they seemed sorry for the loss of opportunity to humour me with change in any form I might like."

The humour of the little sketch is worth something. I can fancy the author laughing even in his dismay ; for he can laugh well at others, and equally well at himself. I shall only venture on one more passage ; and I give it as showing the spirit of the man who dares to call his newspaper Prince and Peasant. He desired to return to his home in Bengal, and to bid adieu, for a time at last, to Independent Tipperah, where he had been located "some two years." He received the Maharajah's permission to return home ; but still he could not get away.

"His Highness himself, in his easy, indifferent way, withheld the final word. Perhaps it was rational instinct, rather than indifference. I was detained on this or that trumpery plea ; but so long as I remained at the capital, there was always business ; a more or less important sort to attend to. I call at the Rajbari to tender my parting blessing (as son of Brahma sprung from the divine mouth). I take leave of the sons, but the father is not to be thus 'done.' His Highness knows that my barge from Dacca has not yet arrived. If the barge is in sight, it is not yet at the landing. If the vessel is at anchor in port, the cargo is yet on shore. Thus from day to day, finally from morn to noon, from noon to dewy eve, and again the following morning, from an amiable inability to make up our mind—a generous indisposition to part ! Far from unpleasant is this dilly-dally, where there is no urgency, no peremptory call to promptitude. British employes know not this 'unbought grace of life.' They will probably not appreciate it. They have not the happiness of serving men, but are mere parts of a machine. We serve flesh and blood. The position of officials in native States has its disadvantages ; many enough, to be sure ; but it is not without ample compensations, and this is one of them. The longest night however, will become day, and I was allowed to say my effectual 'Good-bye.'"

There is, I think, a sound lesson in this passage ; the lesson of the immense value of courtesy and urbanity in the relations of rulers and ruled. There is a great deal in that sentence, "We serve flesh and blood." The best administrator in India is not always the ablest, the man whose plans are the wisest as plans ; but the man who, with plans or without them, gives confidence to the people, and confidence not merely in his justice, but also in his considerateness and forbearance. A clever man once said that the art of success in India is the art of giving good dinners. It may be so ; but the peril is great—the peril of debt ; and in any case the art has its limits, and its natural collapse. Even dinners and champagne pall in the end. But there is one art that never fails—the art of true courtesy ; of that courtesy which, being natural, is not affected by any whim or caprice, either of the person who possesses it, or of any one with whom he has relations.

In bidding farewell to this little book, I once more recall, as I easily and very vividly can, the author's kindly face and gentle voice, as known to me many years ago. I see him, as I see Baboo Kristo Das Pal, Dr. Mahendra Lal Sircar, and some others, including a much-abused editor of the Amrita Bazar Patrika ; and I feel and say, with all earnestness and sincerity, that among these are men whom the Government of India would be wise in recognising and winning entirely to its side. They are men on whom no really generous word—true as well as generous—ever is thrown away. I have compared them at times with men of kindred occupations at home, and I think that they are as a rule by far the truer gentlemen in good manners, and often in very much more than mere manners. May the great God, whose sacred Name they use as that of the Father of all, guide them to a nobler destiny than any they yet have known, and with them, and by them, bless their native land !

OPINION OF THE PRESS.

We owe an apology to Mr. Sambu C. Mookerjee for the apparent negligence with which we have treated that delightful work of his—Travels in Bengal. Mr. Mookerjee, as almost every one knows, is one of the best English scholars in India; he writes as gracefully as does the most scholarly Englishman, and ample proof of this is afforded in the pages of his book before us, which is an interesting narrative of four journeys,—“two trips to Tipperah and two trips back”—accompanied by historical, geographical, cartographical and many other—ical notes of the lands passed through. We confess we have been but through the first half of the work, and, as we have proposed to review it in two papers, we think our progress sufficient for present purposes. Our author has not, as far as we have read, met with those thrilling adventures we read of—oft with a certain amount of sneaking disbelief—in the average hunter's narratives or traveller's tales; peaceful as the bosom of a still lake were his journeyings in Bengal Proper. He carried no formidable weapons with him, save and except a rusty old gun which, when called into requisition once, refused to go off; and yet withal, few more delightful works of travel in India have we read than the one now under our hands. The charms of true yet eloquent description, the force of observation, the gift of seeing sermons in stones, are all possessed in a great degree by Mr. Mookerjee; and we are pleasantly surprised at the lively and fascinating manner in which he can palm off on the reader the dreariest incident of his trips. Mr. Mookerjee will forgive us if we mention that we think him a very gallant old gentleman—with the accent on the second syllable. He has evinced in his little work a weakness for describing the Beauties of Bengal with all the poetic arduous of a Strephon. Did we not know enough of the erudite and good old “Babu” editor, we might be inclined to call this particular weakness of his, in Carlyle's language—“a Byronism of taste.” Here is how he speaks of a beautiful damsel he saw disporting in the running waters of the beautiful Megna, at Sonargoan:—

[Extract.]

But the above excerpt is not the best thing in the book by far. Although every line in it which we have gone over, is a line that we ourselves having written, would not wish to blot out, there are passages in it which surprise us and raise our hearts to a higher level by their eloquence, their beauty and wealth of expression. Running through the pages of Travels in Bengal is a vein of quiet humour—that humour which makes us fall in love with the writers and tempts us to fly to the Wednesday and in trouble, for a return of serenity in moments of vexation. Mr. Mookerjee has, in his work, added one more to the innumerable anecdotes relative to the fidelity of man's best friend among brutes—the dog. The sentinel duties of a canine phenomenon—Tom by name—are related in glowing terms, but we shall not rob the author of one of his finest plums by transferring it into our columns. This review, as we have already stated, is but the introductory one. In our next, or a little later, we shall take up Mr. Mookerjee's book where we are leaving it off, and make our readers a little more familiar with one of the cleverest native gentlemen of the day and with his interesting book on travels in Baboodom. Mr. Mookerjee, like all his fellow mortals, is human, and he has let us know this in his present work. How, we propose to state only in our second review. Would he however pardon us if we surrender to the temptation of finishing this up with his pretty remarks about Mooning and the Moon. After “the contending gods of the elements” had “left off” one night when our traveler was on the bosom of the Megna, he watched Luna issue from behind the clouds in all her grandeur and radiance. That sight, so delightful to the mind with a leaning towards the aesthetic and poetic, gave vent to the following:—
[Extract.]

Now, the above will prove a grand surprise to the European readers especially, who may perhaps be unkind enough to doubt that it was written by a “Babu” just as people have doubted that Shakespere was really the author of Shakespeare and Tennyson the author of Tennyson. Mr. Mookerjee and we part here, but when work is done and we sit in our cosy arm-chair at home and watch, as is our wont, the blue smoke curl gracefully away from our pipe, we shall dream with waking eyes of the beautiful Megna and the damsels of Bengal, of the moon and the waters, and we know that we shall again take up the Travels in Bengal and satisfy our wish of getting to the end of such a pleasant little work.—The Malabar and Travancore Spectator, February 4, 1888.

INFALLIBLE SPECIFIC FOR LEUCORRHOEA.

A week's use of this medicine not only cures Leucorrhœa—the characteristic white, green and bloody discharge—but also removes the concomitant intense menstrual pains, and all the various complaints and symptoms incidental to menstrual difficulties and green sickness, and prepares the system for conception.

Price: for a week's consumption, Rs. 2, packing and postage 4 annas.

There are capital medicines besides—for piles, all the 20 kinds of flux—such as spermatorrhœa, diabetes, &c.—diarrhœa, rheumatism, puerperal complaints, cataract of the eye, nacra, asthma, &c.

[Certificate.]

"I have known Babu Rajendra Nath Ghoshal Kubiraj for upwards of 15 years, and I can bear ample testimony to the wonderful efficacy of his medicine in the treatment of diseases of the womb. While Assistant Surgeon of Monghyr and subsequently, I have known him to cure the most obstinate cases of uterine Leucorrhœa and other uterine derangements, organic and functional. I can safely call his medicine the Specific for Leucorrhœa and painful menstruation. Ladies who have been subject to these diseases for years and were barren have been cured and borne children.

No. 317

NEWS AND COMMENTS.

LORD DUFFERIN has left the world of Calcutta to the heat of the sun of the season and the fierce light of the everlasting Indian Mirror,

The light that never was on sea or land,
but by no means

The consecration, and the poet's dream!
unless it be the Parsee Poetaster's.

It is rather a light that makes its inherent darkness visible.

AS faithful chroniclers of contemporary men and manners, incidents and humours, unto astronomical phenomena, it is our office to note the notable days in the Calendar and warn the public of the coming events that already cast their shadows before. To-day is the end at once of the week and the month. To-morrow the Indian Mirror will come out in all its glory—of cap, feathers, and all.

E'en Sunday shine to-morrow to it.
And to-morrow is specially its own. Hip—Hip—Hip! P'shaw! P'shaw! P'shaw!

THE Viceroy started on Thursday, for the summer retreat of the Government of India. He does not go direct, but visits Rewah, Lucknow, Murree, and Srinagar, reaching Simla on the 10th May.

No! That is not all the programme. The lynx of the Calcutta Press dogs the footstep of Lord Dufferin and has discovered something closely resembling a mare's nest in the viceregal itinerancy, or at least strongly smells a rat somewhere. It will not be a through journey even to Allahabad, but there will be a suspicious halt at Gidhore Station, "for," as the Indian Mirror characteristically puts it, "the purpose of meeting the Maharaja of Gidhore"—in plain English, we suppose, to allow that Chief—a nobleman of large possessions—to pay his parting respects to the Viceroy. But there is a deeper sore in the lacerated heart. Our contemporary hears that the Maharaja has been recommended for a K. C. I. E. ship. Ay! there's the rub!—There's the defect that makes calamity of so long life, shattering the tranquillity and patience of our Mahatma of the Manger! Instantly the fit of pique on our contemporary, and then the delirious catechising begins: "Why so? what for? And well may our contemporary be aggrieved when "It is said the Viceroy takes a special interest in him"—the Maharaja. Doesn't that look like that lucky fellow of Gidhore already bearing the decoration on his manly breast and pricking the eye of long-eared Envy with the fine points of its brilliants, while the Mahatma is left in the lurch "unhouse'd, disappointed, unanel'd."

It is a pity that our contemporary should be so much at the mercy of its allies and spies. It is always being ill served, not to say hoaxed. It somehow never gets the full information on any subject or occasion, even when a Confidential Government Clerk or a European who ought to know is the informant. What wonder that in this instance it has heard of the Viceroy's special interest in his Maharajaship of Gidhore but has not been told of the grounds of the extraordinary phenomenon? Let not our contemporary despair. It has shown rare instinct for gottenness and it has only to pursue the track. Nothing like perseverance! It may yet make a discovery eclipsing all its former triumphs—a great equine egg (to use a Bengalicism which will drive the point more home) before which its find of the mare's nest of the Viceroy's Secret Despatch to the Secretary of State for gagging the Bengali Press and suppressing liberty of thought and expression in general, will pale into insignificance.

THE Dufferin Demonstration over, we hope the city will now turn its attention to the Municipal Bill. The Council meets next Wednesday.

To meet the Budget expenses of the next year commencing tomorrow, the Municipal Commissioners, at their meeting of Wednesday, without previous intimation as required by law, increased the House rate of the expiring quarter by $\frac{1}{2}$ and fixed it at $8\frac{1}{2}$ for the next year. Of the other rates for the next year, the water rate has been increased by $\frac{1}{4}$ to $5\frac{1}{4}$, the lighting rate remains the same at 2, and the police rate reduced by $\frac{1}{4}$ to $2\frac{1}{4}$.

IT was announced that Lord Dufferin would visit the Commissioners in meeting with a visit, and they met in large numbers on Wednesday and conducted themselves, specially in the presence of the Viceroy, as decent practical men of business, and left the best impression on the visitor. Before leaving them, after half an hour's stay, the Viceroy wrote out the following note for the Chairman:—

"When the meeting is over, will you kindly express on my behalf the great pleasure I have derived from having had an opportunity of witnessing their proceedings. To see so many persons of position and intelligence, representing as they do both the European and the Native element, devoting their time and talents to the improvement of the town of Calcutta, is very satisfactory; I must also add that I have been much struck by the orderly, practical, and dignified manner in which the business of the meeting has been conducted. My best sympathies and good wishes will always accompany the labours of the Municipal Council, and the welfare of those whose affairs they administer."

At the instance of the Hon'ble Kallynath Mitter, the meeting recorded a vote of thanks to Lord Dufferin for the honor done to the meeting by the Viceregal presence. Before leaving the Hall Lord Dufferin in company of Mr. Turnbull inspected the oil-paintings that adorn the landing. The editor of the Indian Mirror who is a Commissioner was not present. But his spirit—"double," in Theosophic parlance—was there, doubtless. Accordingly he followed up the incident with one of his peculiar statements, reducing the viceregal grace as much as possible by saying that His Excellency "stayed for about five minutes."

MR. TURNBULL made over charge of his office yesterday. He retires from the Municipality after a service of 30 years. For the zeal with which he served the Municipality, the Commissioners have not thrown him over in his grey hairs. The city has also done him honor. And last, not least, the Englishman has given him the rare distinction of a fine "leader" all to the popular Town Secretary.

THE Financial Statement for 1888-89 appeared on the 26th March, the following being the official summary:—

The Financial Statement for 1888-89 is published in the form of a Minute by Mr. Westland. It first briefly refers to the causes which obliged the Government, in January last, to seek an improvement of revenue of nearly Rs. 2,000,000, and to the financial discussions which then took place in the Council.

It announces the result of the accounts of 1886-87 to be a surplus of Rs. 178,427, after charging off Rs. 325,626 on account of Special Defence works. The differences from the Revised Estimates were explained to Parliament on September 9th last, and they had already been, for the most part, published in India in April.

The Revised Estimates for 1887-88 show a deficit of Rs. 2,448,000, without counting Special Defences expenditure amounting to Rs. 569,000. This result is worse than Budget by Rs. 2,464,000. Of this amount, Rs. 1,059,000 arise out of the charge for anticipated interest which was explained by Sir J. Gorst to arise out of the conversion of 4 per cent. Sterling Stock. Rs. 830,000 are caused by excess of Army charges in Upper Burma, and Rs. 710,000 by fall of exchange to about 16'9 pence. The fall of opium revenue is made up for by improvements in other principal Revenue heads, and the loss under Railways by savings in expenditure and by better receipts under various heads. It is explained that the Revised Estimates are based upon the actual transactions of eleven months and a moderate estimate for the month of March. But the transactions of the month of March are on such a large scale, that they afford room for very considerable variations, which cannot be completely known till about April 20th.

The Budget, made up at the same rate of exchange, namely, 16'9 pence, shows almost the same result as was anticipated in the Estimate of the financial position presented to the Council on January 27th, namely, a surplus of Rs. 423,000. The Revenues, as shown in the Estimates, show one year's advance over the standard then based on the Estimates of 1887-88; but this advance is absorbed by the continued additions to Army expenditure arising out of the augmentation of the forces. Rs. 824,000, is provided for extra Military expenditure on account of Burma.

Against the surplus of Rs. 423,000 is to be taken the expenditure on Special Defences, which are this year to be pushed on with great vigour, and will involve expenditure of Rs. 1,121,000, half of which is in England; so that, including these charges, there is a deficit of Rs. 698,000.

Mr. Westland goes on to review in some detail the state of the Revenue and Expenditure under each of the main heads, giving an account, among other things, of the progress of Land Revenue, the administration of Excise Revenue, the first year's operations of the Income Tax, the condition of Railway Finance, and the burden of debt.

His summing up is as follows:—

"Our finance is a strange blending of elements which we can regard with a feeling of certainty and confidence, and of large outlying uncertainties over which we have no control. If we look at those heads of Revenue and Expenditure which depend upon our own administration, we have every reason to be satisfied. Land Revenue, Salt, Stamps, Excise, Customs,—all of these are elastic and progressive. Post Office, Telegraph, and Forest, all of which may be regarded as quasi-commercial Departments, are more remunerative every year. Civil and Public Works expenditure are well under control. Railways afford a certain and an advancing income, and the only difficulty connected, from a financial point of view, with the account of their revenues, is the vastness of the transactions, which is such that five per cent. increase or decrease in their earnings may make a difference of a million, each way, in our accounts.

"These are the elements of satisfaction and of comparative certainty. On the other side, we have 8½ millions of our revenue, —namely, the Opium Revenue—liable to be adversely affected, and at the present moment adversely affected, by the policy of China, and the increasing competition of other nations to supply the Chinese demand. We are obliged, by our military position, to take a share in the policy of armament which, willingly or unwillingly, the great European nations have been driven to adopt. And finally, and more directly affecting us, is the uncertainty of silver. The fall in its value seems to be temporarily arrested, but no one can say for how long we shall have a respite from the progressive increase of our burdens which this fall has hitherto imposed upon us. The chances of famine too, are to be regarded, though it is certain that, through the extension of Railways, a new famine will be combated with very much smaller outlay of money than any former one.

"The question of Indian Finance is, therefore, the question whether, in the face of all these uncertainties, our margin is sufficiently large. The security of our present financial position depends upon our estimate of how far we may consider that, though these special burdens cost us net Rs. 3,174,300 in the particular year 1888-89, it is sufficient, on an average of years, to provide only Rs. 2,476,000 for them. The present scale of expenditure in Upper Burma and on Special Defences is practically certain of early reduction; but although it is possible that Famine charges and Exchange may add to our expenditure as much as we are in other directions relieved of, we have adopted a high standard in measuring our financial obligations, and can point with some confidence to the recuperative power shown by our revenues, and to the fact that their natural increase, much more than any special measures of taxation, has hitherto enabled us to meet the ever-growing burdens which recent years have forced upon us."

The state of Provincial Finance is then reviewed and summed up as follows:—

"There is therefore none of the Provincial Governments which has not revenue enough for its present scale of expenditure, or rather, which has incurred any permanent obligations as to expenditure, which are beyond the scale of its revenue. Moreover, all the principal ones have balances which they are seeking the means of profitably expending. Their position is in curious contrast with that of the Imperial Government. But though the Imperial Government may for the time give the Provincial Governments in their possession of assured revenues and high balances, it should be borne in mind that these ample revenues have been created by the provincial system, and would not have existed but for the assignment to the Provincial Governments of their share in the improvement of them."

Some details are then given as to the progress in the construction of Railways, both by the Government directly and by the Indian Midland, the Bengal-Nagpur, and the Southern Maharatta Companies. Altogether more than eight millions sterling will be spent in England and India on Railway Capital Account during 1888-89.

It is announced, with the usual reserve, that the Secretary of State proposes to raise fourteen millions sterling by Council Bills, and that the Government in India will raise a rupee loan of three crores, of which half a crore is required for the Calcutta and Bombay Dock-works.

IN further development of local self-government in Bengal, Mr. Colman Macaulay has addressed the following communication to the Commissioners of the several Divisions. The letter is numbered 1004-1011, dated Calcutta, the 24th March 1888:—

"Sir,—The experience of the working of the provisions of the Bengal Municipal Act, so far as they relate to the constitution of Municipal Committees, has pressed upon the consideration of the Lieutenant-Governor the question whether the present system under which a proportionate number of the Commissioners is nominated by Government, can be generally continued. The system is intended to secure a desirable object:—(1) to provide for the presence on the Board of men of administrative and professional knowledge and experience who might not obtain or seek admission to it by election; (2) to provide for the protection of special interests or of the interests of unrepresented minorities. In practice, however, it has been found to have two inconveniences. In the first place the minor Municipalities are practically homogeneous in population, and there are in them no minorities to be protected. Here it has become the fashion to regard the nominations of Government as a means, not of reducing the balance against minorities, but of securing the safety, or the triumph, of parties or of persons. The nominations are looked upon as a sort of second election by which failures at the hustings may be retrieved, or men who have shrunk from seeking the popular verdict on their conduct, or their claims, may receive appointment at the hands of Government. The result is that Government and the local officers are besieged with applications on behalf of this person or that, and reasons are dictated, and a line of conduct generally laid down, by representatives of the different factions. In the second place, in outlying Municipalities, the local officers have in most cases no real knowledge to guide them in making their selections, and such information as they can obtain is only a sort of reflection of public opinion as already expressed by the electors' votes. It is clearly destructive of the best interests of local self-government that the pernicious practice of seeking to enlist the action of Government in aid of personal or party interests should be encouraged.

2. On the other hand, in Municipalities where various religions are found in the population, it is generally the case that the members of a minority, if it is not wholly insignificant, inhabit particular wards, and that their combined votes can secure their representation. The power of redressing any want of representation is, therefore, one to which the Lieutenant-Governor attaches much weight, and the question of the necessity of such protection must be carefully weighed in considering in what Municipalities the power of nomination can be abandoned.

3. Speaking generally, Sir Stewart Bayley considers that if it can be secured that there shall be on every Board one or two representatives of Government who would stand aloof from parties, while helping to protect the interests of minorities, and would give practical and professional advice when these are required, the present system of nomination might in many places be done away with altogether. With this safeguard, he believes that a measure which would place upon the people of the towns the responsibility of electing their own commissioners would be a wise and prudent step in the direction of developing self-government. He would provide that in each Municipality, except in cases where it is not considered desirable to effect a change in the existing system, there should be two ex-officio members—

(1) The Civil Surgeon of the district.
(2) A magisterial officer to be appointed for the time being by the Magistrate of the district.

The remainder of the commissioners would be elected. This would, of course, not do away with the provision under which Government nominates in default of election.

4. The changes proposed in this letter would involve the amendment of the existing law, and his Honor desires therefore that they may be carefully considered with reference to the circumstances of each Municipality in your division. Sir Steuart Bayley's view would generally be in favour of the surrender of the power of nomination where its retention is not essential to the attainment of the objects above referred to.

5. I am to ask that your reply may be submitted not later than 1st May."

THE Eastern Herald of Mhow reports that, on the night of the 22nd instant, two European soldiers of the Cantonment went to Gangla Kheri, a village in Holkar territory, and entered, with loaded guns, the house of a villager, it is presumed, with no good intentions. The villagers gave the alarm and reported the matter to the Durbar Police. The Havildar in charge of the Police station with other men arrived on the spot, and, in attempting to arrest them the soldiers fired on one Police Sepoy and a Nakadar of the Forest Department in the service of the Holkar Durbar, and then ran away. The matter was reported to the Durbar Wakil at Mhow who sent the wounded men to the Inspector of Police, and the men are now in hospital in a precarious state. The perpetrators of this outrage have not as yet been discovered, although active steps were at once taken by the Military and the police. The search continues.

NOTES AND LEADERETTES.

UPPER Burma ceases to be a field service from the 1st of April. It had long ceased to be separately shewn in the Budget, and the Commander-in-Chief had won his Bhatta.

THE new official year introduces a general convenience in this Presidency. The postal money order, hitherto restricted to particular parts and payments, will be received in satisfaction of all kinds of public demands, whether as land revenue, Zemindary dak, road and public works cesses, or others.

BEFORE bidding good bye, the Viceroy had been visiting the city—institutions, bustis and burning ghats. All Tuesday morning, the 27th March, was occupied with penetrating to the backslums of Black Town, no small sacrifice of comfort and no small risk to health. It was imposed mission of thoroughly knowing the country and undelighting the life of the people over whom he had been sent to rule and whom he was now leaving rather suddenly. He was chaperoned by Sir H. Harrison and Mr. H. S. Cotton, and the municipal officers.

KHETTER NATH MITTER, a medical man of this city, was, on the 26th, found shot with his second son in his own house. The father has since died. The eldest son has confessed the deed. The reason given is that the father refused to find security for an employment and that the brother stood in the way. That is no sufficient explanation for the parricide. The father must have offended the son in other ways.

THE proprietor of the Projabandhu has succeeded in his appeal to the Pondicherry Court. He was sentenced at Chandernagore to six months' imprisonment for swindling—by withholding payment of the lottery prize of Rs. 1,600. The superior court of four judges were divided in opinion and the Court, after reserving judgment for a week, decided that the recipient of the prize had, by delay and acceptance of part payment, allowed the transaction to assume a civil form.

Along with others of our contemporaries, we have received a telegram from Pondicherry, regarding this case, with a special call upon us to apologise for our original treatment of it. We are not to be so easily turned. We are glad at the result, though. The man has already suffered enough.

MR. A. PHILLIPS, Standing Counsel, goes on finlough for one year. Mr. L. P. Pugh officiates. The all-knowing Mirror is sure to trace the officiating appointment to the part Mr. Pugh took in the late demonstration. The Calcutta bar, even with the return of some of the grand seniors, can scarcely afford to lose, though only temporarily, so learned a lawyer and so fearless an advocate. It was Mr. Phillips who snubbed a quandom Judge by referring him to the pages of Punch.

WE learn from the Mhow paper that

"Kumar Chatra Singhji, Heir Apparent of Rajpipla in the Rewa Kantha, is making an extended tour through Upper India. He reaches Delhi on the 1st April, and, after a short stay there, visits Cawnpore, Agra, Allahabad, Lucknow, and Benares. He then goes up-country as far as Lahore, paying a flying visit to Simla en route, and returns homewards, via Delhi, about the 1st May."

That tour will be a good education to the Kumar Saheb. And home travel of the kind is without the evils of foreign travel to our princes. Even for unprincipled native Indians a residence in Europe is not without its risks, as too many families know to their cost. It is a grave responsibility for guardians to send their boys abroad.

LIFE in Central India must be a jogtrot pace indeed, when, under date the 21st March, the Barwani Correspondent of the Eastern Herald reports the visit of the Political Agent of Bhopawar on the 22nd February. The Political Agent was received, under a salute of 11 guns, by the Dewan and other State officials. The Maharana who had been absent at Boria, hastened back to the capital on the 25th. The Political Agent came out of the city to receive His Highness—an honor never before done him. On the 29th February the Maharana received the Political Agent in state, when the latter returned His Highness's visit. Heart-burning was caused by the omission to summon many of the state officials usually admitted on such occasions. The Political Agent came to enquire into the complaints of maladministration of the Raj. The Madwara mosque case is still pending, the Mahomedans complaining of injustice at the hands of the Hindu officials headed by the Hindu Dewan. The present Dewan is not giving satisfaction apparently. Great credit is given to the former Dewan, Khan Bahadoor Mahammad Najaf Khan, who raised the state to the highest pitch of prosperity, though we should suspect he was too much a creature of the British Government and too little a servant of the Raja and the Raj. We believe he was more anxious to make things pleasant for Europeans than to maintain the rights of the state and do justice to the people. These "loyal and faithful servants of the Government of India" never make the best ministers, though, of course, being familiar with British routine, they may give some shape to the state machinery and a decent administration.

THE Punjab—an Ethnic and Theological Frontier—has a soil highly favorable to the growth of Heresy and Heresiarchs. The stern monotheism of Islam has there been split into how many sects! The simpler monotheism of Guru Nanak itself has been broken into different shapes between Muzbees and Akalees. In our own day, Ram Singh the carpenter preached a new form and founded a new sect, which has, we believe, been consolidated by the martyrdom of many of its members. The late Vedic Revivalist Dayanund Saraswati, though he began his mission among the Banias of Katther, found at last his congenial field in the unsophisticated enthusiasm of the Land of the Five Rivers. And now we hear of the rise of another Prophet in the person of S. N. Agnihotri. He had hitherto been a zealous Brahmo missionary, but the example of so many enterprising doctors, schismatics and saints and the character of the people have not been lost upon him, and he has started separate business on his own account. Probably, the scandalous dissensions which, since the death of the lamented Keshub Chunder Sen, have taken place among the members of the New Dispensation to which he belonged, have not been without their influence on him. At any rate, he has renounced the Bramo Samaj and set up a creed of his own called "Deva Dharma." He has announced his prophetic mission as derived direct from Heaven at Lahore, and already counts followers who believe him to be greater than Jesus or Sankar or Buddha or Chaitannya.

THE untimely death of Mr. Jamsetjee Nusserwanjee Petit has removed one of Bombay's most amiable and promising citizens, as it deprives the Parsee Rothschilds of one of the dearest members of their family. He had done nothing striking, perhaps, for he was no showy or fussy man. But he had done good work in a modest noiseless way for the culture as well as general advancement of his own community. Above all, he led an exemplary life, pure and wholesome, and has left a fragrant memory of sweetness and light. He was, in fine, that rare character—a gentleman of the sterling sort.

Look who that is most virtuous alway ;
Privy and apert, and most intendeth aye
To do the gentle deedés that he can,
And take him for the greatest gentleman.
Christ will we claim of him our gentleness,
Not of our elders for their old richness ;
For though they give us all their heritage,
For which we claim to be of high paráge,
Yet may they not bequeathen, for no thing,
To none of us their virtuous living.

In every relation of life, whether as a son or a nephew, a brother or a friend, a subject of the state or a member of society, a Parsee or a man, he aspired after a high standard. The loss of such a man is at once a private and a public calamity.

And it has been worthily commemorated. Charity, thy name is Parsee! And the Parsees have out-Parsee'd themselves on the present occasion. And the munificent Petits of Bombay have more than ever covered themselves with a lasting halo. In memory of their near and dear one, and for the glory of the All-good Ormuzd, the father gives 3½ lacs for a Parsee orphanage and Rs. 80,000 for a sanatorium at Bandora. The other members make up the total amount of Rs. 10,00,000. There is not another community in the world that can show such a record. Here is a nation of Peabodys.

SIR STEUART BAYLEY presided at the last distribution of prizes at the Ripon College owned by Baboo Surendranath Banerjee. A student of the City College writes to the Dainik, "that in pursuance of an advertisement in the Bengalee, I went to the Ripon College to witness the ceremony on Saturday the 24th March at 3-30 P.M., the public having been invited. I found some gentlemen (about four in number) returning, being refused admittance by a teacher of that College Ram Chundra Palit. It is useless to say, I fared no better. The hour fixed for the meeting was 4-30. When I was there, many persons had not assembled. Arrived at the gate, I was asked whether I was a student of the College. On my replying in the negative, I was sternly refused admittance. I consequently came back. Has the advertiser learnt this lesson from the recent meeting at the Town Hall or was the advertisement meant to notify that the College would be consecrated by the dust of the feet of the great. The advertisement ought to have specified the gentlemen to be admitted." The Dainik remarks—Baboo Surendra is the hero of "our boys," then why this rigid order for their exclusion?

MR. DOSABHOY FRAMJEE, C. S. I., City Magistrate, Bombay, has retired from active service. He is one of the men of light and leading in Western India—one of the small band of indefatigable public men and publicists to whom the progress of the country is, in no small measure, owing. For he was a public man long before he was a public servant in the ordinary sense of a stipendiary employe. He commenced as a journalist, and his career recalls the early history of the Press and native connection therewith. Like the Hindoo Collegians of an earlier date at Calcutta, the Elphinstonians at Bombay gave a great impetus to journalism and, in fact, all forms of educational activity. While Mr. Sorabji Shapoorjee Bengalee was conducting the Bombay Sumachar, the late Nowrojee Furdoonjee and Mr. Dadabhoj Nowrojee started and edited the Jam e Jamshad and the Rast Goflar, respectively.

Mr. Framjee has crowned his early career as an anonymous publicist, by the publication in propria persona, in the full maturity of his powers, of a standard work in two rich volumes of beautiful letter-press and illustrations, on the History of the Parsees. It is appropriately dedicated, by permission, to the Prince of Wales. It is rare for a native of India to write so good a book, and rarer still for him to receive such countenance and patronage. It is fashionable among the high and mighty, in India at any rate, to snub the aspiring Indian who publishes.

Mr. Framjee had before enriched his vernacular Guzrati literature, with an account of his travels in Europe.

LADY DUFFERIN will be remembered in India for the movement that bears her name in aid of the suffering womankind in India. A greater relief has just been secured them by Lord Dufferin. The Act to amend the law relating to Imprisonment for Debt to be henceforth known as Act VI of 1888, in the form recommended by the Select Committee and published in our issue of the 3rd March last, was passed by the Imperial Legislative Council on Friday the 23rd inst., and became law from next day. Whatever differences of opinion might still subsist on the general policy of this enactment, one important provision must be welcome to all well constituted minds—certainly to all who are earnest in the cause of refinement of feeling and manners. There may yet be old-fashioned people who cling to the creditor's privilege of confining his debtor, as to one of the foundations of society, but there is not an Indian who will not bless Lord Dufferin for restoring woman her old liberty—freedom from jail for debt.

Raja Pearymohun Mookerjee moved to exempt rent suits under Act VIII of 1885 from the operation of this law. There was much opposition to his motion, and it was not carried.

ON such subjects it is useful to consult the most advanced opinion in America. It is the nearest approach to listening to the voice of posterity. It gives one confidence in one's efforts at emancipation from the influence of tradition and authority—from our grosser self and lower surroundings. Nor is there any risk in the operation. If the United States-men are go-ahead, they are eminently practical—sound at core, for, after all, British in race and Teutons in origin, most of them.

We have before given our readers an opportunity of seeing in a poem by one of the most popular Transatlantic singers, how the practice of sending a man to jail for mere debt—without dishonesty—is viewed by liberal minds on the Western Hemisphere. We greet the present occasion with a passage from a speech of Daniel Webster, the great American orator:—

"We talk much, and talk warmly, of political liberty; and well we may, for it is among the chief of public blessings. But who can enjoy political liberty if he is deprived permanently of personal liberty, and the exercise of his own industry, and his own faculties? To those unfortunate individuals, doomed to the everlasting bondage of debt, what is it that we have free institutions of government? What is it that we have public and popular assemblies? Nay, to them, what is even this Constitution itself, in its actual operation, and as we now administer it, what is its aspect to them but an aspect of stern, implacable severity?—an aspect of refusal, denial, and frowning rebuke?—nay, more than that, an aspect not only of austerity and rebuke even, but, as they must think it, of plain injustice also; since it will not relieve them, nor suffer others to give them relief. What love can they feel toward the Constitution of their country, which has taken the power of striking off their bonds from their own paternal state governments, and yet, inexorable to all the cries of justice and of mercy, holds it, unexercised, in its own fast and unrelenting clench? They find themselves bondsmen, because we will not execute the commands of the Constitution—bondsmen to debts they cannot pay, and which all know they cannot pay, and which take away the power of supporting themselves. Other slaves have masters, charged with the duty of support and protection; but their masters neither clothe, nor feed, nor shelter—they only bind.

Sir, let us gratify the whole country, for once, with the joyous clang of chains,—joyous because heard falling from the limbs of men. The wisest among those whom I address can desire nothing more beneficial than this measure, or more universally desired; and he who is youngest may not expect to live long enough to see a better opportunity of causing new pleasures and a happiness long untasted to spring up in the hearts of the poor and the humble. How many husbands and fathers are looking with hopes which they cannot suppress, and yet hardly dare to cherish, for the result of this debate! How many wives and mothers will pass sleepless and feverish nights, until they know whether they and their families shall be raised from poverty, despondency, and despair, and restored again to the circles of industrious, independent, and happy life!"

That is as true in doctrine as in fact, and withal finely expressed. To those who may still harbour a sneaking preference for the old order, we commend the above sentiment of an eminent practising lawyer and practical statesman—who was so little given to illusions or maudlin sentiment that he irritated beyond appeasement the Anti-Slavery party by his conservatism!

We heartily congratulate Lord Dufferin on this as one of his most unexceptionable measures, which will shed lustre on his Viceroyalty for all time. He must of course be content to share his laurels with Mr. Scoble, to whom the country and the world at large owe grateful thanks for having, in the face of much and eminent opposition, pursued the Bill through the Council to final success. The Act is a considerable step in civilisation, the world over.

FROM of old the Scribes and Pharisees are a formidable lot, but when they are strengthened by the alliance of a duct of limbs of the law, Heaven help the honest peace-loving folk!

So it is not Bad but Pad—Padshaw, in fact. Be it so. We have not the slightest objection. What's in a name?—specially to a Theosophic neophyte and Chela to the Baboo Blavatsky of Bengal—Mahatma No Render. The rose would smell as sweet were it by any other name called. Just as a dunghill would stink even though it were christened a grove of sandal-wood. After all, to the true moralist, one name is as good as another, to point a moral or poke fun. The name is comparatively indifferent—it is the man that supplies materials for jest or earnest. Now our Paddy of a Kadimi or Old Persian is in a pet, he is an inexhaustible source of instruction and amusement. To begin with, he is one more illustration of the truth—

They never pardon who have done the wrong.

Ungrateful Paddy (like another snob who has found himself in charge of a press—who will get his due by and bye) coolly, causelessly, without provocation, blackguarded his seniors and superiors in every respect. But the Golden Rule—taught alike by Confucius and Christ and all the Eastern Prophets and sages—seems no part of the creed of NeoTheosophy. It is certainly far from the practice of this neophyte. Directly he receives a preliminary dose of fundamental treatment for his impertinent outrage, the man makes wry faces, and cries for pain to his neighbours and friends and would flee for protection to king and gods. Thus, in return for his foul and malicious libel on our JUST, wanting leisure to attend to him properly, we said what an exhibition this drift-wood of a Parsee in Calcutta was making of himself in trying to live upon his wits, fawning on another, and barking at whosoever is pointed out for the object of his peculiar attentions. Ever since, the animal has had no peace. He has not only been barking at us himself but has set his lawyer to bark at us. We hardly notice the thing. Still finding that we had made a little mistake about Consonants, we readily corrected it. But the enemy is not to be appeased, and we have been treated to another cry with redoubled energy. We fear it is a hopeless case. We can but try our best.

PADDY is in the fortunate position of Sir Syud Ahmed, who used to boast of being of the Emperors. Paddy in fact is a Padshah. The utmost sin that can be laid at our door is that we presumed to think him a Padshah without visible possessions. He will none of it.

Strange that such difference there should be "Twixt Tweedledum and Tweedledee!

AFTER the public engagements of last week, we were too pressed for time to be able to read the "proofs" of several matters which, standing in type for a long time, were utilised in our last issue. We see that in our leaderette on Mr. Sullivan's Tullamore verse, we have attributed the second poetical quotation too, which is from Shelley, to Pope. If we have given any reader the impression that the Hymn to the Pillory was Defoe's only effort in verse, we hasten to remove it. That indefatigable writer composed several thousand lines of an equal number of feet, in occasional pieces, chiefly satirical, which could not, by the kindest courtesy, be termed poetry, and of which about half a dozen lines only are remembered by the most zealous literary "hunter," besides a distich or so of the "Pillory" business.

To-day we see that in another page which has already been printed off, a passage has been retained in a letter which, out of delicacy, we intended to omit, but, in forgetfulness, did not. In the first column of this impression, in the 3rd item of "News and Comments," line 5, add an s to footstep.

THE Mahatma of the Mirror has avowed his Abkari preferences. They evidently do not lie in the high and dry direction, but rather in that of liquid fire and distilled damnation. He is not partial to Opium, but, it is to be feared, he is not quite impartial in his antagonism to all articles of Excise. His boon companions are an open secret. What with his Portuguese and Persic Nandi and Bhingis, he can stand Doasta and Rum. So long as the world contains Cole-ridges and Dequinceys and other Celestials, Opium will survive the malice of the Sens and the senseless. Nay, so long as flesh is heir to unnumbered ills and there are doctors to come to the rescue, the divine drugs which are among a gracious God's choicest gifts to man, will never be in danger of neglect.

REIS & RAYYET.

SATURDAY, MARCH 31, 1888.

THE FUTURE OF THE OUDH FAMILY.

THE Majesty of Oudh has been buried, and awaits only a decent monument. His survivors' fate still hangs in the balance of suspense. There seems to be a hitch somewhere, or else the decision would by this have been announced. We come to offer a word to help in the solution. We think we discern where the difficulty lies. If Government approach the subject in a workmanlike spirit, it will be a question of law or custom which will confront them. Primogeniture is so strongly associated amongst Europeans with the hereditary devolution of political power or status, and the form of primogeniture generally prevailing in Hindu clans in India so closely resembles the normal form of European primogeniture, that we deem it expedient at this juncture, to draw the attention of the responsible authorities to the essential differences which exist in that behalf in Mahomedan states. The occasion is opportune, inasmuch as it is necessary to arrive at the true conception of rights of primogeniture amongst Mahomedans, before the Government can make a just final settlement of the affairs of the Oudh family. By the normal form of primogeniture, as prevailing alike in Europe and amongst the Hindus in India, line is preferred to everything else. "The form of primogeniture," says Sir Henry Maine, "which has spread over Western Europe has also been perpetuated amongst the Hindus, and there is every reason to believe that it is the normal form. Under it, not only the eldest son, but the eldest line is always preferred." (Ancient Law p. 239). An opposite rule prevails in private as well as Royal property under the Mahomedan Law. There no line of representation is recognised. When one out of several heirs expectant dies before the propositus, the issue of the deceased never stand in his place. The remoter descendants become, in the expressive language of the Law of Islam, mahjub-ul-wirs or excluded from inheritance. The history of the Oudh family itself furnishes several instances of this rule. Thus, on the death of King Nusseeruddin Haidar, his third uncle, Muhammad Ali Shah succeeded to the throne, notwithstanding the existence of the sons of the last king's predeceased second uncle, Nawab Shams-uddaula. Then again on the death of His Majesty Muhammad Ali Shah, he was succeeded by his second son Amjid Ali Shah, in preference to the former's grandson Mumtazuddaula by a predeceased elder son Asgar Ali. In his Journey through the Kingdom of Oude, Sleeman, after citing the above instances, remarks:—"The same rule guides the succession among the Delhi sovereigns. This exclusion extends to all kinds of property, as well as to sovereignty." (Vol. II. p. 137).

In the mass of fugitive writings which invaded the correspondence columns of the metropolitan newspapers shortly after the demise of the last king of Oudh, we remember to have seen some claims put forward in favor of the surviving sons of the late Wali Ahed or Heir Apparent, Prince Mirza Muhammad Hamid Ali Bahadur. Upon the principle enunciated above, the children of Prince Hamid Ali have no legal claim whatever upon the property and dignity of their grandfather, His Majesty the late Wajid Ali Shah. Had the annexation never taken place, none of them could have claimed the throne as representing the deceased Heir-apparent. Of course, they would not have been allowed to starve in the native kingdom, and our Government may be quite justified in fixing or continuing a subsistence allowance for them, but it is quite clear that they have not by law the same claims for support as the legal heirs of His Majesty, nor can we find any reasons derived from personal qualifications, public services or the acts and declarations of His Majesty, which might justify a departure from the ordinary rules of the Mahomedan Law in their case.

Coming now to the question of the claims of His Majesty's surviving sons, a great deal of misapprehension seems to exist as to primogenitural rights in Islam. A Mahomedan Prince, the first-born of his Royal Father, has not the same inalienable and indefeasible right which appertain to the eldest son in a European or Hindu royal house. By the custom of the Turkish Empire, the eldest member of the entire Royal House has the preferential right of succession to the throne. By this rule, it is obvious that, in the generality of cases, the Sultan's brothers would have preference over his sons, who would, in the natural course of events, be younger in age than their uncles, and Sir Henry Maine, in his Ancient Law, makes a shrewd guess that the policy of the Sultans, in ordering the wholesale massacre of their younger brothers, "may have been perpetrated quite as much in the interest of their children as for the sake of making away with dangerous competitors for the throne." Judged by this rule, which is also in force in Egypt, no son has any definite rank in the succession, and, in the particular case of His Majesty Wajid Ali Shah, all the surviving sons would be excluded by uncles older in age living at Lucknow and even by His Majesty's nephew in Calcutta, who is older in age than all the surviving sons of His Majesty.

Looking closer home, we find Sir Henry Maine, in his Early Law and Custom, brings to notice the apparent want of any fixed rule of succession in Afghanistan, as evidenced by actual cases of succession as well as by claims thereto. Shere Ali, he points out, was not the eldest son of Amir Dost Muhammad Khan, nor was Yakub Khan the eldest son of Amir Shere Ali. Abdurrahman Khan, the present Amir, is no son of Shere Ali at all, but the son of an elder, yet not of the eldest, brother. Ayub Khan, who had almost succeeded in establishing himself as Amir, is only a younger brother of Yakub Khan, the latter being still alive, and having a son Musa Khan living who had been recognised as the heir-apparent in the reign of Yakub Khan. The conclusion at which the learned author arrives is this—that any descendant of Dost Mahommed Khan could aspire, by the process of natural selection, to the throne of the kingdom founded by him. Later on, he states that one of the devices for lessening the chances of civil war at each succession, would be for each sovereign in his own life-time to appoint a successor, which course, he thinks, on the whole to be prevalent in Afghanistan. In his Ancient Law, will be found the following passage which bears with still greater relevancy upon the question under consideration:—"Some of the Indian Mahomedan Sovereigns, without pretending to any distinct testamentary power, claim the right of nominating the son who is to succeed." (p 243).

Now, it is well-known that, after the demise of Prince Hamid Ali, His Majesty Wajid Ali Shah did not bestow the title of Wali Ahed on any other son. None of the present sons can, therefore, claim under any appointment from him. The duties which in Oriental Royal Houses fall to the share of the heir-apparent, were awarded by His Majesty to Prince Klush Bakht, who was not then the eldest surviving son. The appointment, if any, was, therefore, against the law of primogeniture. It is true that a certain dignity and status was voluntarily recognised and enforced by the Government for Prince Faridun Kadr Herzubbur Ali Bahadur, better known as the Chota General, but His Majesty always protested against the course, and the real story is well-known to the initiated.

It is, we believe, a settled policy with the Political Department of Government to scatter such ex-Royal families by degrees and gradually blend them with the general mass of the population. This process of attenuation and dispersion has been effected to a great extent with the Mysore Family, and indications are not wanting that in some respects the same policy is to be pursued as regards the Oudh Family.

On grounds, therefore, of justice and expediency alike, it is not desirable that any distinction should be made in status or allowances between the surviving sons of His Majesty. To do so, would be inflicting an injustice on the remaining sons, for no useful purpose whatsoever. On the contrary, the making of any such distinction would be offering a direct incentive to the future assumption of that sort of ex-Royal dignity which, we are sure, the Government are anxious to avoid, and to the mimicry of a puppet court for another life. Large as is the number of His Majesty's surviving sons, he never evinced any great regard for them, nor is there much to choose in the entire collection in point of intrinsic qualifications or public respect.

This is a delicate subject, one, above all, on which it is next to impossible to avoid sentiment. We ourselves, indeed, long cherished the dream of a Reis—a smaller Wajid Ali Shah—a pensioned royalty under a head growing small by degrees and beautifully less, but we have alas! been constrained to give it up. If Government still feel disposed to prolong a political or quasi-sovereign House of Oudh with princely dignity and privileges without princely power, it seems ungracious to oppose. Yet history cannot be recalled by force, and statesmanship must submit to facts. The times are not favorable to the creation of nominal royalty or the multiplication of anything like independent jurisdictions within the heart of the Empire—against the commonwealth. And the facts of the particular case do not impose on the Government of India such an experiment.

THE HOLKAR FAMILY DISPUTE.

WE are glad to notice that the Indore Durbar's differences with the Dowager Maharani, in regard to the khasgi Estates, are in course of settlement. The interest on the deposit has been paid. The sum claimed was about a lac and three quarters. Deducting the pay of the Maharaja as Dewan or Intendant of the Estate and other dues, the claim has been reduced to a little over a lac. The actual sum paid down to the Dowagers is Rs. 10,6000. As a natural consequence of the family feud, however, they have been encouraged to set up all sorts of claims. The chief of these is a demand put forward, in the name of His Highness the Dowager Bhagirathi, for the round sum of a lac of Rupees, alleged to have been expended by her on the funeral of the late Maharaja Tuckaji Rao Holkar. Some of the local papers, which have taken up with zeal the Ranis' grievance, are calling upon the Maharaja to pay his mother the sum without further delay, on pain, we suppose, of reporting His Highness to the Political Agency and the Foreign Office and holding him up to the scorn of the world—of hasty newspaper readers. It is somewhat strange, we are already told, that the State has not yet refunded the money to Her Highness. Why should it? What is there strange about it? Did the Dowager go to all that expense? If she did, she had no business to do so. Was her son—the heir to the throne—absent from the scene? Was there an interregnum? Were the Indore Government dead or asleep? Was there nobody to attend to the proper disposal of the remains of the late Ruler and to pay for the burning and other ceremonies, that the obvious duty and necessary cost thereof should have devolved upon the poor widow overwhelmed with grief as she must be at her bereavement? The late Maharaja was famous for his cumulative habits. Had there been a general loot going on while His Highness was on his death-bed, that there was no money forthcoming for decent incineration of his body? The present claim involves an insult to the present Reis as if he was present to succeed to the father's sovereignty and states and effects, but not ready to do the last honors to his father's lifeless person. What then could be the excuse for his bereaved mother to undertake functions which belong to him much more than to her—which indeed it was her privilege to have a son to perform? Under the circumstances, it was a piece of officiousness to step between the living and the dead Prince.

If the sum claimed is for any extra expenditure incurred by herself, in addition to that incurred by the present Holkar and his State, in the funeral rites and pageant and gifts, that was her private concern. She has no claim upon the State or her son to be repaid. If her son make her a gift on the account, he may do so without reproach, perhaps with grace. That is entirely a private matter. The State has nothing to do with it, nor the Holkar as Ruler. He might properly snub her—with filial familiarity—for her pains, above all, for making a public grievance of a personal question, not to say a sacred matter. The funeral rites are a religious obligation, incumbent not only on the son but also on the widow. If she performed and paid for them, she only did what was proper, but has no claim to a refund. Her performance indeed degenerates to an impropriety directly she makes a claim or even harbours an expectation or a wish to that effect.

RESPONSIBILITY OF STATEMENT.

IT is rare in the Indian Press to see any question of English literary history raised, and rarer still to see any original contribution in that department. It was, therefore, with no ordinary interest that we observed Mr. Arthur L. Jennings in the Indian Daily News lately set the Indian public right in regard to the authorship of the "Pauper's Drive." So late as the beginning of 1884, the piece with the oft-quoted refrain

Rattle his bones over the stones

He's only a pauper whom nobody owns!

was ascribed in England to the elder Hood. Men like Mr. Burnand who ought to have known made the mistake. At last in February of that year, the same error being repeated in the Evening Standard, usually so well informed in matters literary, Mr. H. Howard Hodges addressed the editor a letter correcting him and relating how the mistake originated. So far back as 1841, Mr. Thomas Noel—cousin to Lord Byron—published a little volume Rhymes and Roundels, in which occurs "The Pauper's Drive." Several years since, the vocalist Henry Russell, in the course of professional tour, sang this piece before many provincial audiences. He announced the poem as the composition of Tom Hood. When Mr. Russell came to Berkshire, where both Mr. Hodges and Mr. Noel resided, he was corrected by Mr. Hodges and also introduced to the poet. The same evening, in the presence of Mr. Hodges and Mr. Noel, Mr. Russell, at his "entertainment," publicly confessed his mistake and doubtless ever after ascribed the poem to its true author. All to no purpose, as the event proved. For, there has been no end to Mr. Hodges's trouble in his generous mission of protecting the modest worth of his literary friend. In 1868, he had to correct the editor of Punch, who, however, had the grace to send him a note thanking him. Such is the vitality of error, however, that sixteen years after, the Standard again attributes the "Pauper's Drive" to old Tom.

A special cause of the tenacity of life of the mistake, is to be found in the very amiability of Mr. Russell who started it. Had he contented himself with retracting his original statement, and, apologising for it, simply said that Mr. Thomas Noel, and not Thomas Hood, was the author of the "Pauper's Drive," he would have saved his character and done all the reparation in his power. Instead of it, he generously went beyond, and in the same breath paid a compliment to the poet by way of explaining his own mistake. He said "the poem was worthy of Hood." That was treading on dangerous ground. The sentence gives the original misstatement its true character of a simple error of fact and rescues it from the category of literary blunders, while it constitutes a tribute to Mr. Noel's genius. Nevertheless, it contained matter for the lease of life to the error and was the source of all the subsequent ado to Mr. Noel's friends. As delivered from the platform, in connection with other words and the surrounding circumstances, it was all right. But the sentence by itself is certainly equivocal. What wonder that, torn from its context, it should be taken to mean that the poem was no unworthy composition of the elder Hood's, the Poet of the "Poems of Wit and Humour," instead of that in the "Pauper's Ride" its author (Noel) had produced a piece equal in merit to the poetry of Hood!

The incident has a more than a merely literary bearing. It has a moral for all men. On literary men and newspaper writers in especial, it is a call to be more than ever careful in their statements. It enforces the lesson of many a trial for defamation. It shows how difficult—how nearly impracticable—it is to correct error—to remove a misimpression once caused. The most ample amende honorable may fail of its effect. Obviously, no correction is sure of reaching all who have imbibed the original mistake. To begin with, how to ascertain all those who were affected by the mistake? Then, if the correction even reaches their hands or the eye or ear, it may still fall short of reaching the minds of some of them. Without any fault of their own, the remainder are consigned to error, without hope of redemption. When the error is in respect of the laws of Nature or of important matters of science or learning, there is less danger, because the questions are continually ventilated and brought to general notice: there is a machinery as it were for doing the needful in experts and students devoted to the task. Not so in matters of minor interest, and, above all, in statements affecting persons. In this sphere, full rectification is next to impossible. Here, in proportion to the easiness of wronging, is the difficulty of righting. You throw out a hint in a miscellaneous company, a hint that might compromise a reputation. You find you were wrong or misinformed. How are you to undo the mischief caused? You cannot bring the same company together. Supposing you ascertain the names of those who formed the party, and go about addressing them individually—a vain supposition—your false suggestion has by that spread beyond their circle and is altogether out of reach and beyond possibility of recall. How much greater, therefore, is the responsibility of written and published error! As a matter of fact, and of frequent observation, a correction does not reach all those for whom it is intended. A stray bit of printed paper picked up in the street or torn from an old trunk, may cause a false impression through life from the subsequent withdrawal of the statement not having met the particular eye. Such far-reaching instrument is print! Indeed, it is simply because it serves the most useful and the highest purpose of man and human society, that such a dangerous engine is permitted. But it behoves us to remember the grave risks to individuals and communities from its abuse. Indeed, respectable and honest drivers sometimes find their faculties paralysed from a sense of responsibility and the difficulty of deciding between different paths and conflicting interests.

THE LIEUTENANT-GOVERNOR IN CHOTA NAGPUR.

THE Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, accompanied by his Private Secretary and the Commissioner of the Chota Nagpur Division, reached Purulia in the afternoon of the 12th instant. Preparations had been made by the citizens, according to their humble means, to give His Honor a fitting reception. Triumphant arches had been erected with mottoes of welcome on the road by which Sir Steuart Bayley was expected to arrive, and it had been arranged that the principal officials, the municipal commissioners and the Maharaja of Pachete should meet the Governor on the precincts of the town. Owing, however, to a miscalculation and rapid locomotion, the party arrived a little earlier than expected, for which they could hardly be blamed as they had not fixed any particular time for their arrival, nor received notice that they were expected at any specific moment. In times when the hill-going proclivities of Viceroy and Local Governors have so violently exercised the public mind, and at a juncture when every Departmental Head is impressed with the physiological necessity of migrating bag and baggage to the higher altitudes of delightful sanitarium, in order to avoid the heat of the plains, it was a sight to see the Head of the Local Government driving all day long in an open carriage from Ranchi to Purulia, a distance of nearly 80 miles.

On the morning of the 13th, Sir Steuart, with the usual accompaniments, visited the jail, the municipal market, the charitable dispensary and the muster of the Ghatwali police. The cutcherry buildings have since long proved inadequate for present requirements, and projects for the extension of the said building have been under consideration and report for several years. The Lt.-Governor personally inspected the place and it is to be hoped that the public and their servants will soon have sufficient accommodation provided for the transaction of public business. Afterwards Sir Steuart drove to the Circuit House and there received the municipal address which was read by the Vice-Chairman, Babu Gunganund Mookerji. The Lt.-Governor in reply thanked the Commissioners for the kind reception they had arranged for him. Referring to the growing prosperity of the town, and the impetus likely to be given thereto by the opening of the Bengal Nagpur Railway, His Honor predicted a greater future for the town owing to the projected Benares-Cuttack Railway which he had every hopes of seeing begun before he laid down the reins of office. With reference to the difficulty of communications in the District, he intimated that he had already taken note of that want in this Division generally, and made a very liberal provision therefor in the Provincial Budget. The Governor was naturally very guarded in his expression of views about the Coolie question. The question, he said, was under consideration of his Government in communication with the Chief Commissioner of Assam. He could not foretell what his final decision would be in the matter, and he could not at present promise any legislative action. Besides, the present Emigration Act was one of the India Council, and much would depend upon the views entertained upon that subject by the Government of India. For our own part, we can say that the Municipal Commissioners discharged a sacred duty in drawing attention to the grievances of their poorer native fellow-subjects in connection with inland emigration. The hardships are substantial and real, and the whole mischief arises from the binding nature of labor-contracts. If the laborers were free to give up their service whenever they were disinclined to work, in the same way as other domestic servants or agricultural laborers, most of the malpractices of the system as regards recruitment and the subsequent treatment of coolies, would die a natural death.

Adverting to the request of the Municipal Commissioners for the gift of the remnant corpus of the Famine Orphan Fund, His Honor said that the matter was entirely new to him and he would pass orders in the matter after consulting the Commissioner. We trust that in disposing of this Fund, the authorities will not lose sight of the claims of the normal orphans of the District for support. There is nothing to be said against the desirability of improving the Sahib bandh of Purulia, but, at the same time, the orphans of the whole district have in equity a stronger claim to the Fund in question than the inhabitants of the head-quarters. It is true that the Famine orphans, for whose special benefit the Fund was created, have now no longer any need for provision, but a small number of orphans are thrown upon the hands of the public authorities every year. The present provision for them seems to be either adoption into respectable households as domestic servants, or, failing that, being made over to the missionaries body and soul. The State thus is an active party to the proselytization of the helpless creatures whom it is bound to protect, and from the interest of this very Fund a small grant per capita is made for the maintenance of the said orphans by the missionaries. The procedure has no defence in the face of the declared policy of Queen and Parliament for strict religious neutrality, and if it be said that no visible means of providing for the orphans are available, they might easily be sent to the unsectarian Sir Charles Aitchison Orphanage and Boarding Institution, Benares, where orphans of all castes and creeds are freely welcome. The interest of the Famine Orphan Fund would be amply sufficient to provide for the maintenance and education of all the normal orphans of the District.

JAMÁLPORE.

SIR,—For the last three or four days violent easterly winds are blowing here, very unwholesome to men affected with rheumatism and to those who are of delicate constitution. We hear of diseases of various kinds, mostly of this season, to have broken out.

It is to be hoped that the present Chairman of the Jamalpore Municipality will interest himself in removing the wants from which the natives at large suffer. The roads of the native quarters, especially of Noyagong, are in the worst state possible. We prefer a kutcha road to a pukka one left unrepaired for the last ten or eleven years. One unaccustomed to the latter is sure to stumble at every step at night.

Race antagonism is gradually taking root, it is to be feared, in the minds of the European staff of the station here. Natives, whatever their position, who have occasion to come in contact with the station master either as a passenger or as an applicant for a platform pass, as the rumour runs, are not allowed to come peacefully either by the station master himself or by his European satellites. They would try to insult these men by words or gestures. I hear that a representation against the present station master, headed by Boniad Mundal, Zemindar Commissioner of the local Municipality and Honorary Magistrate, has been made to the Traffic Manager, E. I. Railway, complaining of the maltreatment which the natives suffer at the hands of the station master and his staff. Mr. Baker was a whit less than the present station master—and it would not be hyperbole to say that the natives have been thrown from the frying pan to the fire. I hope that as Mr. Carter, Traffic Manager, is known to me and all among the natives here to be of pious character and a man of worth and loved by all for his impartiality, he will do proper justice to the case, and save the poor natives from insults.

TRUTH.

THE SANTIPORE MUNICIPALITY.

At a very fully attended meeting of the Little Peddlingtonians a pitched battle was lost and won. It was a fight between an uncle and a nephew, a giant and a pigmy—a struggle between what were termed by the late Lord Palmerston as a clean party and a dirty party, a party zealous for improvements and whose motto is “to act that each to-morrow may find us farther than to-day”—and the party that has been trying, in season and out of season, to see important schemes, calculated to confer great benefit on a large community, postponed or marred or laid aside from ignorance, or apathy, or indifference. The adullamite uncle, who has, of late, as much as apostrophised Evil, “Be thou my good! was for forming ‘the Cabal,’ while his opponents, gathering themselves under the leadership of three of the ablest spirits in the clean party, viz., “the uncrowned king” (Babu Muthur M. Mukerjee), “the school boy” (Babu Sarat Chunder Roy) and “the school master” (Babu R. D. Khan, B. L., Headmaster, local E. school) were for forming “All-the-talents administration.” Babu Hari Das Roy and his ‘tail’ made a supreme effort to send the obnoxious nephew and the clean party about their business. They invoked Heaven and Earth—Hell too shall I say?—incited the people and appealed to the Government—they stormed—they raved—they threatened—to gain their end. They cared not for rights if only he—the Evil one—I mean Babu Sarat Chandra—was bundled out of the way. All to no purpose. All Hate’s Labor Lost. How are the mighty—I had almost said naughty—fallen in the midst of the battle! How keen was the contest and how persistent the struggle will be evident from the fact that at the meeting of the corporation for the election of the Vice, there was a ‘tie’ in the votes, the question being settled by the Chairman giving his casting vote not to the uncle but to the nephew Sarat Chandra, “by way of reward for his valuable services.” Thus the nephew twice killed the uncle for is it not a double death, to drown in ken of shore? Thus the gentle stream that flows past our town has narrowly escaped being set on fire! Puffed up with pride at his recent success at the poll—success, which, they say, has told upon his brains—Babu Hari Das attempted the impossible—stood as a candidate for the Vice-chair.

Ambition hath one heel nail’d in hell

Though she stretches her fingers to touch the heavens.

And if the uncle has met with such shabby treatment at the hands of the nephew and his party has been dished, as it deserved to be, he has his own over-towering ambition to thank for it. The audacity of impertinence of the unnatural nephew cannot, of course, be too strongly condemned. It is an outrage even to think of breaking a lance with an uncle; to beard him in a public meeting is an atrocious crime; to put him to death is almost a parricide; but to crucify him (for it is nothing less than crucifixion, seeing that Sarat Babu carried out his diabolical plot in concert with a few sturdy citizens whom Babu Hari Das looks down upon as tagrag and bobtail) what shall I call it! The following points in connection with the election of the Vice-Chairman deserve prominent mention:—1. That the Mahomedans to whose want of support is to be attributed Babu Sarat Chandra’s defeat at the hustings have made a complete amende honorable by calling upon their representatives to vote him to the vicechair. 2. That even so paltry a thing as the vicechairship could make the zemindars fall out. 3. That the Plebeians have got the better of the Particians. 4. That truth is mighty and it prevails.

Now a word or two to the parochial Paul Prys who like the nodes of the moon, whose only business is to darken the luminaries, have been blackening the character of Baboo Sarat Chandra both here and in the Press. During the invasion of Lanka by the illustrious Rama, his mighty adversary Ravana is said to have observed, that he could stand the invectives and opposition of gods and men, but not the grins and grimaces of the tailed hordes of Kishkinda. Some such feeling may well fill the mind of Mr. Roy at the foul attack of his unscrupulous traducers who, like the man who ostracised Aristides cannot bear to hear a good and worthy man universally praised. But possessing as Baboo Sarat Chandra does a rare fund of patience and a peculiar dogged indifference, and knowing as he does that censure is the tax a man pays to the public for being eminent and that the villain’s censure is extorted praise, he laughs off the insinuations of his slanderers, insinuations which are as false as they are mean and contemptible. To say that he was nowhere at the Poll because he was unpopular is to tell a lie pure and simple. The Mahomedans voted for his rival candidate not that they love Sarat Baboo less but that they love their co-religionists more. If Sarat Baboo has indeed got into hot water with his constituents, how is it then that the very Mahomedans have now installed him in the Vice-Chair? But is the success at the poll a crucial test of a man’s popularity? If the vox populi is the vox dei is it not sometime the vox diaboli? Granting for the sake of argument that Mr. Roy is somewhat unpopular, what does it signify? Does not the Bible say that if all men praise thee, thou art truly unfortunate? To say that an administrator is to a certain extent unpopular with a portion of those over whom he exercises authority, what is it but to say, that he does not flatter the prejudices of the people, that he regards his own conscience as his sole tribunal, that he cares no more for that phantom “opinion” than he fears meeting a ghost if he cross the churchyard at dark, that he has convictions of his own which he dares reduce to practice in spite of the clamours of the multitude, that he is not a timeserver and trimmer, and that he sets greater store by the welfare of the people than the interests of classes and factions?

One word about Babu Muthur Muhun Mukerjee who has done more for Santipur than all the Vice-Chairmen put together and who feels for his native town as no other man does, and I am done. By the sacrifice of his repose, his pleasures to ours, and, above all, by his preference in all cases of our interests to his own—the “uncrowned king” occupies no humble niche in the temple of every people’s heart. The Vice-Chairmanship was indeed over due to him. Grateful Santipur did thrust upon him the highest honor in its gift, but Muthur Muhun, with a magnanimity that reminds me of Cincinnatus who as soon as he had conquered the enemy threw up the Dictatorship and resumed his agricultural pursuits, has chosen to be the Vice-Chairman-maker rather than himself be the Vice-Chairman and has declined the honor in favor of his nephew Sarat Chandra.

PARTING KICK TO THE VILLAGE CURS.

LORD DUFFERIN’S OPPONENTS.

SIR,—Whatever they would say to the contrary, the meeting of Thursday last at the Town Hall, in honor of Lord Dufferin, was a perfect success, and clearly illustrated the truth of what I wrote in my previous note, viz., that the majority of the Natives, and specially the reasonable and intelligent among them, had no sympathy whatever with those opposed to doing His Excellency honor. That this they had not, was sufficiently shown by their presence there. As I read in the papers, the number of Natives was far greater than Europeans, the bete noir of the Indian Mirror (?) by whom, as he would say, the meeting was got up! Thus I was perfectly right in saying that the Natives generally had no sympathy with the opposition-party. I will have to show now that the reasonable and intelligent portion of them, was also of the same mind. To do this, I will have to invite attention to the list of those that were present there, in which, among others, the following names will be seen:—Sir Jotindro Mohun Tagore, K.C.S.I., Raja Peary Mohun Mookerjee, C.S.I., Raja Durga Charan Law, C.I.E., Dr. Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee, Rai Kunja Lall Banerjee, Rai Joyprokas Lall, Rai Jogodanundo Mookerjee, Rai Kanaye Lall Dey, and others. Now, besides being a big and influential Zemindar, Sir Jotindro Mohun Tagore was for several years, a Law member of the Supreme Legislative Council, whence emanate the Rules and Regulations by which India is governed. Raja Peary Mohun is also a big Zemindar, and a member of the Viceroy’s Legislative Council. Raja Durga Churn Law is also a Zemindar, and a merchant too, and was a member of the Governor-General’s Council. Dr. Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee was for some time past minister of the late Nawab Faridoon Jah Bahadoor, the last of the Nawabs of Bengal, Behar, and Orissa, and was also minister to the Tipperah State. He is indeed one of the few sound politicians, at whose feet many of our so-called enlightened patriots may well learn what politics is. He is also a gifted writer, and the supreme elegance and beauty with which he uses the English language, is a wonder to many English gentlemen, having scholarly tastes and attainments. In fact, he is a genius of whom the literary world may be well proud. Rai Kunja Lall Banerjee was one of the ablest Judges that ever sat on the bench of the Calcutta Small Cause Court. Rai Joyprokash Lall is a colleague of His Honor the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal. Rai Jogodanundo Mookerjee is a distinguished Government pleader. And Rai Kanaye Lall Dey is an eminent physician. Can any one venture to question the reason and intelligence of these men, without simply making a fool of himself? Need I adduce further evidence to substantiate my statement that the reasonable and intelligent Natives had no sympathy with the opposition?

But the meeting proved more than what I wrote. It proved also that Their Highnesses and Nawabs had no sympathy with the opposition, there being present several of them there, many of whom took its active part, thus establishing clearly that, except a disappointed and narrow-minded few, the whole Indians, both Reis and Rayyet, the intelligent and the ignorant, have thorough confidence in, and heartily approve of, the policy of His Excellency Lord Dufferin’s administration.

In connection with this, I can’t too strongly censure the unworthy and unbecoming conduct of some of the objectors to the Town Hall meeting. I have already referred to the meanness of Surendra Nath Banerjee, their ringleader, for his “house to house canvassing.” I now understand that failing in their enthusiasm to make counter-demonstration, these veteran demagogues sent a contingent of their puny myrmidons to thwart the objects of the meeting. But the gallant soldiers of the local constabulary were too strong for them. Receiving their just due, they had to come back beating their breast and tearing their hair in the way.

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS & OINTMENT

THE PILLS
Purify the Blood, correct all Disorders of the LIVER, STOMACH, KIDNEYS AND BOWELS,
They invigorate and restore to health Debilitated Constitutions, and are invaluable in all Complaints incidental to Females of all ages.
For children and the aged they are priceless.

THE OINTMENT
Is an infallible remedy for Bad Legs, Bad Breasts, Old Wounds, Sores and Ulcers. It is famous for Gout and Rheumatism. For disorders of the Chest it has no equal.
For Sore Throats, Bronchitis, Coughs, Colds, Glandular Swellings and all Skin Diseases, it has no rival; and for contracted and stiff joints it acts like a charm.
Manufactured only at Professor HOLLOWAY'S Establishment
OXFORD STREET (late 533, Oxford St.) LONDON.

Holloway's Pills and Ointment.—The attention of all sufferers is drawn to these well-known remedies, for they possess conspicuous advantages as a safe and reliable aid in all those emergencies to which travellers, emigrants and sailors are so especially liable.
They have been largely patronized by way-farers by land and sea, and, in fact, by all classes of the community, to their very great advantage. The Pills are beyond all doubt one of the most effective remedies ever discovered for cases of obstinate constipation, confirmed indigestion and colic, complaints which are engendered by exposure and irregular feeding.
The Ointment will be found of the very greatest service in cases of piles, abscesses, erysipelas and all kinds of local ulcerations.

OPINION OF THE PRESS.

It is many years since I first met, and some years since I last met, Dr. Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee, editor of the Reis and Rayyet (Prince and Peasant), and an author of high repute among the kindly, as well as acute and intellectual, people of Bengal. One of the real misfortunes of India was, and still is, Lord Macaulay's picture of the Bengalee. The picture, true perhaps as regards Nuncomar and many Bengalees, is not accurate, as a representation of the people generally, taking them as an Englishman may find them if he looks fairly. If they had been unfaithful, the sad story of the Mutiny had been vastly sadder; and, apart from the Mutiny, many Englishmen could give individual instances of Bengalee faithfulness almost unique in history, taking all the circumstances of our relation to India into account. The Bengalee is generally eager for knowledge of all kinds, and is often both courageous in the expression of his opinions, and gifted to a remarkable degree with the power to express those opinions with force and precision. Mr. Fawcett once told me that an unprepared speech made, on his behalf, during an election, by a young Hindoo, surpassed, in force as well as eloquence, any unprepared speech he ever had heard made by any member of the House of Commons, if four or five members of the House were excepted.

Among these Bengalees there is a small body of men—small for that large province—who are, ironically or otherwise termed "Young Bengal." Some of them are no longer young, but grave and aged; some have, in the course of years, been highly distinguished for their public services and their scientific and other attainments. Some have at times been misrepresented, and their language misinterpreted, so that on its return to them it has amazed none more than themselves. Nothing of this has been done by the really great administrators of India. That it has been done, however, cannot be denied.

In the forefront of this little band is the author of this book of travels, Baboo Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee—a writer of high repute, as I have said, also an administrator, as the reader will see from the title-page to this book. A keener, yet a kindlier satirist, one might seek for and not find. His use of the English language has astonished many an educated Englishman; and the quality of his reading is shown by his marvellous power of quotation; not merely from authors like Shakespeare, and Milton, and Macaulay, and men eminent in science, but from out-of-the-way old ballads, and little-known old pamphlets, in the application of which he leaves one wondering—first, how he obtained the quotations at all, and secondly, how, having obtained them, he learned to apply them so appositely to the subjects which he intends them to illustrate.

Passing from the author to his book, we shall, perhaps, first of all be attracted to the work of the administrator. He comes upon a milkman's village, on which he finds fastened the grip of a Court favourite. He unloosens the grip, and re-settles the village, in the double interest of Prince and Peasant. And all the time he sees everything. The poor people bathing on the rivers' banks, have his genial and kindly, if also at times, what a Scotchman would call, his "pawky" notice. A "fair maid of Sonargoan" attracts his attention by the gracefulness with which she carries a vessel of water from the river; and, though the fair maid and he are divided by race and faith (she is Mussulman), she has his full meed of praise. Indeed, it must be admitted—and he will not be offended with me for saying so—that he never meets with a fair face, without at least giving evidence of the fact that he has eyes to see and a heart to comprehend.

Of his wide and generous sympathies, much might be said, and still leave much more to say. He meets a missionary on the river, and evidently is inclined, in writing his notes, to pass a joke on the subject. He nips it, however, in the bud, and contents himself with saying, "So new is preaching here, that the simple people said the padre had been singing in the street." He meets Catholic and Protestant missionaries on shipboard, and chuckles over their disputes, while he astonishes them by his command of the English language, and even by his knowledge of the Bible—a knowledge, I may add, which is evident in many of his writings.

A parrot falls overboard, and is drowned in its cage, to his great distress, which is not however paraded. He says: [Extract.]

These are not the words of a Christian, but of a Hindoo.

Again, he has a faithful ugly dog, whose name is Tom, and whose glory it once was to bark, with a noble independence, at some very dignified Sahibs. Our author is compelled to leave Tom behind; and here is his farewell: [Extract.]

I think this is a very fine passage, and one that will draw the author very close to the great heart of humanity, wherever the words are read. Could anything be finer than the testimony to the two foreign "gentlemen," ending with the "Bengalee pariah, my poor Tom"? Not the pariah merely, but the pariah dog. The passage is worthy of the author, and of the great mercifulness of the land that bore him.

Whoever reads this book must be prepared further to find bold and manly language. The author is no flatterer of John Bull, though he gives John his due, and admits that India owes him a great debt. Here is one passage relating to foreign fruits: [Extract.]

Among the sketches of country—word-pictures—the reader will find some exceedingly pretty, and all the more valuable in that they are taken from a standpoint purely Indian; not English. Where an English artist's mind would be filled with European ideas, the mind of this gifted Eastern artist is filled with a class of ideas totally different, yet equally instructive and certainly not less subtle and far-reaching.

On the eve of one of his journeys, our author was placed in a dilemma of a kind not unknown to travellers in India, but not on that account the less stupid. He wished to go by a particular boat, and took time by the forelock for that purpose. The fare was at first stated as 90 rupees, to pay which he offered "a new crisp, fresh British India" note for 100 rupees. "It was," he adds, "fresh from the Currency Office, and had been received only the day before from another Government department." The rest of the story is thus told: [Extract.]

The humour of the little sketch is worth something. I can fancy the author laughing even in his dismay; for he can laugh well at others, and equally well at himself. I shall only venture on one more passage; and I give it as showing the spirit of the man who dares to call his newspaper Prince and Peasant. He desired to return to his home in Bengal, and to bid adieu, for a time at last, to Independent Tipperah, where he had been located "some two years." He received the Maharajah's permission to return home; but still he could not get away. [Extract.]

There is, I think, a sound lesson in this passage; the lesson of the immense value of courtesy and urbanity in the relations of rulers and ruled. There is a great deal in that sentence, "We serve flesh and blood." The best administrator in India is not always the ablest, the man whose plans are the wisest as plans; but the man who, with plans or without them, gives confidence to the people, and confidence not merely in his justice, but also in his considerateness and forbearance. A clever man once said that the art of success in India is the art of giving good dinners. It may be so; but the peril is great—the peril of debt; and in any case the art has its limits, and its natural collapse. Even dinners and champagne pall in the end. But there is one art that never fails—the art of true courtesy; of that courtesy which, being natural, is not affected by any whim or caprice, either of the person who possesses it, or of any one with whom he has relations.

In bidding farewell to this little book, I once more recall, as I easily and very vividly can, the author's kindly face and gentle voice, as known to me many years ago. I see him, as I see Baboo Kristo Das Pal, Dr. Mahendra Lal Sircar, and some others, including a much-abused editor of the Amrita Bazar Patrika; and I feel and say, with all earnestness and sincerity, that among these are men whom the Government of India would be wise in recognising; and winning entirely to its side. They are men on whom no really generous word—true as well as generous—ever is thrown away. I have compared them at times with men of kindred occupations at home, and I think that they are as a rule by far the truer gentlemen in good manners, and often in very much more than mere manners. May the great God, whose sacred Name they use as that of the Father of all, guide them to a nobler destiny than any they yet have known, and with them, and by them, bless their native land!

INFALLIBLE SPECIFIC FOR LEUCORRHOEA.

A week's use of this medicine not only cures Leucorrhœa—the characteristic white, green and bloody discharge—but also removes the concomitant intense menstrual pains, and all the various complaints and symptoms incidental to menstrual difficulties and green sickness, and prepares the system for conception. Price: for a week's consumption, Rs. 2, packing and postage 4 annas.

There are capital medicines besides—for piles, all the 20 kinds of flux—such as spermatorrhœa, diabetes, &c.—diarrhœa, rheumatism, puerperal complaints, cataract of the eye, nagra, asthma, &c.

[Certificate.]

"I have known Babu Rajendra Nath Ghoshal kubiraj for upwards of 15 years, and I can bear ample testimony to the wonderful efficacy of his medicine in the treatment of diseases of the womb. While Assistant Surgeon of Monghyr and subsequently, I have known him to cure the most obstinate cases of uterine Leucorrhœa and other uterine derangements, organic and functional. I can safely call his medicine the Specific for Leucorrhœa and painful menstruation. Ladies who have been subject to these diseases for years and were barren have been cured and borne children.

NEWS AND COMMENTS.

ANOTHER feather to the cap of Baboodom! "For his original contributions to Mathematics," Baboo Ashutosh Mookerjee, already M.A., F.R.A.S., and F.R.S.E., has been accepted a Foreign Member of the Société Mathématique de France.

MR. GEORGE IRVING having gone home, the vacant seat in the local legislative council has been filled by Mr. H. Pratt of Messrs. Osler & Co. In his new sphere we hope the Hon'ble Mr. Pratt will develop a tenderness for the people of this country.

SIR DONALD MACKENZIE WALLACE was taken ill with choleric symptoms in the Viceregal Special, and he was taken to the civil Hospital at Allahabad. We are glad he has recovered and joined the Viceregal suite.

It is said that an attempt was lately made by Fenian pirates to capture the Prince of Wales, while but in a pinnace off the coast of San Remo. The timely appearance of a gunboat on the scene saved our future King from kidnapping. Can all this be true? Or, is it of a piece with the myths dear to the ignorant classes of Europe, such as that an old school-master had been long personating the Emperor William?

NEBRASKA has the distinction of possessing a lady of the long robe, who, not content with the honours of professional advocacy, has achieved the additional and important distinction of a law-maker. She is the author of the law in Nebraska State giving mothers joint guardianship with fathers over children. That law obtains only in four of the States—Kansas, Iowa, New Jersey, and Nebraska. She also drafted the Bill which became law in the Nebraska Chamber, providing an Industrial Home for Fallen Women. It may be readily inferred that Mrs. Ada M. Bittenhender (for such is her name) is of an actively philanthropic turn. Just now, she is on a visit to Washington in the cause of the Women's Christian Temperance Union.

It is said that quinine is an antidote to the habit of opium eating or smoking. Mr. J. Fergusson of the Ceylon Observer presses the point for public notice. Mr. A. R. Colquhoun had previously remarked that the Chinese considered quinine a cure for opium poison, and that they preferred this to any other known antidote.

His friends and admirers gave, on the 17th March, an evening party to Moroba Kesrinath, Personal Assistant to the Accountant-General, Bombay. And why? Because he has received the title of Rao Bahadour as a personal distinction. That seems a queer Indian Mirrorish reason, akin to the famous effort of ratiocination by which our contemporary arrived at the conclusion that Lord Dufferin was the prime cause of Sir Syud Ahmed Khan's Lucknow speech. But surely the practical Bombay mind might be expected to be above such refinements of irrationality. It is no reason at all that because the Sovereign has given a title, the friends of the recipient should follow up with an entertainment to him. The process ought to be the other way. The friends of the favoured man might more naturally expect to be entertained by him than he expect to be feasted by them. For instance, his bottle-holders may well feel disappointed at not receiving a treat from him whenever Sir Mirror can be persuaded, by any Governor-General, to accept the knighthood which he is said to have refused at the soiled hands of Lord Dufferin, who sent a deputation to the Mirror office to press the offer. They order the matter differently in the Western Presidency.

A CURIOUS litigation had been agitating native society in Madura in the first weeks of March. There had been a difference, ending in the usual war of words, between two members of the Naidu clan. One of them, a hero of the second grade Pleader bar, Lutchmi Naidu by name, had the pluck to kick the other, who, besides being a Naidu, is quite a magnate of Madura, being a Municipal Councillor and a member of the Committee of the great religious endowments for which Madura is famous. In the hurry and excitement of conflict, the limb of the law did not even free his attacking foot from its leather surrounding or appendage. Striking with live nether extremities might be fair warfare, but touching a good Hindu sharing in the affairs of town conservancy and temple management, with dead leather of even a sacred bull, was simply intolerable. So our great Meeatchi Naidu lodged a complaint. Not to be outdone, Lutchmi Naidu too filed a cross-complaint. But at the hearing, neither Naidu appears, and "society" is disappointed of many piquant disclosures.

THE Ceylon Patriot, the oldest and sole secular English newspaper in Jaffna, established in 1862 by Mr. C. W. Catheravalu Pillai, the present Police Magistrate of Kaits, has, we see, been leased out by the proprietor Mr. S. Johnpulle, to Mr. James H. Martin of Jaffna. We notice an improvement in the quality of the paper served.

PROFESSOR FLOWER at the Anthropological Institute described two skeletons of full grown Akkas, male and female, lately obtained from the Monbuthe country, Central Africa, by Emin Pasha, neither of them exceeded 1,219 metres or 4 feet, while a living female of whom the Pasha has sent careful measurements, is only 1,164 metres or 3f. 10in. The average of the race may not be so low as that, yet there seems little ground for doubting that the Akkas are the smallest people known.

THE self-elected martyrs in the Irish cause did not find the prison by any means a pleasant place. But they elected for hardships they might have avoided. Such, at least, is the case of Mr. William O'Brien, M. P., lately discharged from Tullamore. The Irish Secretary Mr. Balfour, having insinuated that Mr. O'Brien was shamming weak health in order to escape the goal discipline, the latter refused to partake of any indulgences in the matter of diet, even though suggested by the prison doctor.

In India, our political martyrs wax fat in prison, and come out to gather Rint with both hands. One of them, in this way, raised the wind charmingly under the name of a public Fund. But the public have not heard much of its destination or uses. It was a fine private Fun. The public were only treated to a Farce.

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given, any other being unnecessary, and likely to cause confusion.

RAJA G. N. GUJPUTTEE ROW, who had been five months at Madras for the benefit of his Ranees' health, has left for his native district of Vizigapatam. During his stay at Madras, he is said to have spent Rs. 10,000 in charity to the poor and other charitable purposes. The Ranees also has subscribed an equal sum for the Victoria Hospital for Caste and Gosha women.

THE Hon'ble Kazi Shahabuddin, late of Baroda, has paid to the Bombay Government the princely sum of Rs. 60,000, in aid of Mahomedan education. The sum has been split into portions and distributed to the several districts of the Presidency, and Committees appointed to consider the best means for their disposal.

DURING last month, forty seven thousand five hundred and twenty three persons visited the Indian Museum. There were natives—34,926 males and 11,844 females and Europeans—624 males and 129 females, the daily average for the 21 days the Museum was open, being 2,263.

THE Pearl Fishery in Mannar is in full swing. It will probably extend to the middle of this month. The amount realised by sale of oysters up to the 12th March, was Rs. 3,87,018. At the close of the operations, the Government will probably make six lacs. A writer from Mannar in the Ceylon Patriot brings out in this connection prominently the name of Mr. Twynam, "the Nestor of the Civil Service." It would seem that the news had gone abroad that the oysters had disappeared. That meant ruin to many and starvation to more. Everybody was thrown into despondency. Mr. Twynam alone maintained his head and spirits. He went to work with his accustomed zeal, knowledge and ability, summoning the whole fishing staff and went in search of the dwellers in the deep, and succeeded in getting at them and dissipating the scare. Well may the writer call for the thanks of the public and reward from Government for Mr. Twynam.

ON the last day of last year, the Zemindar of Shivaganga filed a suit for some five lacs against a famous Nattu Kottei Chetty named Rama Sami. From the time of the present Zemindar's father, Ramasami had been appointed to collect all outstandings on the estate and employ the collections to uses mentioned in his power. The present Zemindar, who had continued the power, now complains that the Agent had exceeded his powers and collected sums which he had no right to collect and misappropriated them. The Chetty, in his written statement, denies all this. The preliminary issues were settled in the middle of last month.

THE Jamnagar State offers a reward of Rs. 10,000 for the apprehension of the outlaw Charun Raide.

THE Primrose League counts about 700,000 active members, one half being female workers.

WE observe with pain that the illustrious Naer, Mr. Kunjen Menon, Sub-Judge of Tellicherry, who lately got the title of Rai Bahadour for his judicial services in Malabar and in Travancore, where he for sometime acted as a Judge of the High Court, lies under a charge of corruption. A charge of bribery is being prosecuted against him by Mr. Nelson, barrister, late of the Civil Service, on the part of, apparently, respectable accusers.

THERE has been another change in the French Ministry. The Radicals in the Chambers surprised the Premier by a motion for revision of the Charter. The House voted urgency—against the opposition of M. Tirard. He consequently resigned. With the co-operation of M. M. Freycinet and Goblet, M. Floquet formed the Cabinet with the following cast:—

Mr. Floquet ... President of the Council and Minister of the Interior.
M. Goblet ... Minister for Foreign Affairs.
M. de Freycinet Minister for War.
M. Peytral ... Minister for Finance.
M. Legrand ... Minister for Commerce.

M. Meline, a Moderate Republican, has since been elected to succeed M. Floquet as President of the Chamber. M. Clemenceau, the leader of the Advanced Left, secured an equal number of votes. The republican steps in by right of seniority.

A BILL for connecting Paris with the sea is in circulation, signed by 47 Deputies. It contemplates a canal one and a half times the breadth of the Suez Canal, the depth ranging from 6'20 metres. The cost is estimated at 118,000,000*f*.

THE Panama Canal shareholders, about a thousand of them, recently met in Paris. M. Ferdinand de Lesseps read a report which took forty minutes to go through. It was unanimously adopted. Only one shareholder asked for a hearing. There was also a resolution for a loan of 340,000,000*f*. This, coupled with previous powers for raising 260,000,000*f*, will make a total of 600,000,000*f*, plus a sum not exceeding 120,000,000*f* for the purchase of French Rentes to guarantee repayment and premiums. The sum necessary for completing the Canal is estimated at 654,000,000*f*—namely, 254,000,000*f* for excavation, 325,000,000*f* for locks and masonry, 15,000,000*f* for reservoirs supplying the upper reaches of the Canal, 50,000,000*f* for materials, and 210,000,000*f* for general expenses and interest on shares and bonds. The loan of 600,000*f* and the balance in hand of 110,000,000*f* will meet this expenditure and leave a margin of 56,000,000*f*.

THE Madras newsletter of the Mahratta refers to the 151st Anniversary of the birth of Tom Paine having been celebrated in America on the 29th January. The writer says, "very few in India know who Thomas Paine was."

MR. Henry Curwen, the editor of the Times of India, was to go home on the 1st of this month for a few months. In his hands the leading journal of Bombay had, it is to be feared, distinctly deteriorated in sympathy for the children of the soil. But since the burial of the Ilbert Bill controversy, the paper had picked up to some extent. For the rest, the paper has maintained its reputation for ability, information, and honour.

IN the Cornwallis-street tragedy, the death of Khetter Mohun Mitter, the Coroner's Jury unanimously came to the conclusion that the deceased died from the effects of a gun-shot wound, the shot being fired by his eldest son Nilmadhub. The revolver found was traced to the son who had purchased it four or five days previously from Walter, Locke & Co. There is, besides, his own confession of guilt. Nilmadhub has been put on his trial before the Northern Division Magistrate. Mr. Hume prosecutes and Mr. Garth and Mr. Cranenburgh watch on behalf of the defence.

THE Bengal Legislative Council met last Wednesday. The Calcutta Municipal Bill made very little progress, and the Hon'ble Mr. Macaulay obtained leave to introduce a Bill to amend the Mofussil Municipalities law, Act III of 1884. The object is to exclude State lands and buildings from municipal jurisdiction and inspection. The immediate occasion was the refusal of the Superintendent of the Gunpowder Factory, Ichapore, to allow the Municipal Commissioners to enter and inspect the Factory which they are empowered by the present law to do. The municipality insisting on their right, Government stepped in and prevented them. The Council meet again this day when the Calcutta Bill will be taken up.

AN English Magistrate at Lahore, during a trial held by him, unceremoniously kicked a native tradesman while he was being examined on oath. The Magistrate is said to be a young man not devoid of good points. The more's the pity!

A SCARCELY less reprehensible habit of our officials is that of Magistrates having friendly correspondence with parties charged with offences before them. Mr. Assistant Superintendent Fullerton of the Nowgong Police in Assam is a particularly epistolary officer. This trait of his came out in the case of assault brought sometime ago against him by a peon. It appears again in the case of a schoolboy lately instituted against him. On receiving his summons, the Assistant god of the Police wrote to the offending—because summoning—Magistrate:—

"Deputy Commissioner,

Nowgong.

As to-day I have received a summons to attend your Court in a cause, said to be assault at a fire, I beg to ask, if I am not allowed to use force to compel persons standing by, to help in putting out a fire.

Please answer this sharp as I wish it to go with your reply to the Inspector-General of Police who will ask the Chief Commissioner to-day.

Nowgong, } (Sd.) F. A. Fullerton.
17th February 1888.

To that peremptory demand the poor Magistrate, as in duty bound to lords of the all-powerful Constabulary, meekly bowed and attempted the following explanation :

"The facts as set forth in the petition are not that you used force to persons to make them help in putting out a fire. You are at liberty to see petition and complainant's statement.

(Sd.) G. E. McLeod."

My Lord of the District Superintendence was not to be so easily pacified. He was, indeed, thrown into a rage by the evidence of contumacy of the Civil Service. He wrote back sharp :—

"Please answer my question. Had you made any enquiry things might be different.

(Sd.) F. A. Fullerton.
17th February 1888."

That proved the last straw for the camel of a meek magistracy. Mr. McLeod could only say—

"I decline further correspondence. File with case.
(Sd.) G. E. McLeod."

So much for our boasted administration !

THE last instalment of Mr. Kinglake's History of the Crimean War is rich in original information as the previous volumes. It contains incidents never before made public, such as the one told in the following extract from a weekly review :—

"Of all the incidents, certainly the one which will most attract all readers is the wonderful story of Captain Oldershaw's defence of the 'No. VII. Battery,' in which, of the forty-seven men actually retained in the fight, forty-four were killed or wounded. In addition, however, to the three thus left, eighteen others had been sent out of the battery, during the course of the fight, with wounded men. A rumour that Captain Oldershaw was to be employed the following night in the same battery having reached these twenty men, they sent by the corporal on duty a message to Captain Oldershaw,—"The men who fought with you yesterday, Sir, wish to fight again with you.' Higher honour certainly could scarcely have been paid to a soldier ; but, strangely enough, thanks chiefly to the absolute reticence and modesty of Captain Oldershaw, the facts were never known to Lord Raglan, to the army at large, or to the public at home."

Here was a hero indeed, content to do his duty in obscurity.

THE Hindu students of the Grant Medical College gave themselves a dinner at Parel, with the usual accompaniments of music and song. What the nature of the edibles was, how they were served, and whether all the castes sat promiscuously together, we are not told. It is said Drs. Kunte, K. R. Kirtikar, Deshmookh and other well-known gentlemen, more or less connected with the College, were invited, but not whether they attended and partook of the dinner. From the cautious terms in which the subject is referred to in the Native Opinion, we suspect there was a hitch somewhere. Our contemporary would encourage such movements "within certain limits" and warns the students against "running fast."

WE are obliged to the Chief Secretary, Government of Bengal, for the following result of the examination for admission into the Subordinate Executive Service, held at the Senate House of the Calcutta University in February 1888. The full marks were 2100.

Holloway's Ointment.—Sores, Wounds, Ulcerations, and other diseases affecting the skin, are capable of speedy amendment by this cooling and healing ointment, which has called forth the loudest praise from persons who had suffered for years from bad legs, bad breasts, piles, abscesses, and chronic ulcers, after every hope of cure had long passed away. None but those who have experienced the soothing effect of this Ointment can form an idea of the comfort it bestows by restraining inflammation and allaying pain. Whenever Holloway's Ointment has been once used it has established its own worth, and has again been eagerly sought for as the easiest and safest remedy for all such complaints. In neuralgia, rheumatism and gout, the same application, properly used, gives wonderful relief.

NOTES AND LEADERETTES.

THE domestic relations and family alliances of princes still play an important part in European politics. At this very moment, the whole Continent is being agitated over a proposed union, between Prince Alexander of Battenberg and Princess Victoria, the Emperor of Germany's second daughter and grand-daughter of our Empress Victoria. The match seems to have been quietly effected between the Courts, behind the Cabinets. This was hardly fair to the statesmen bowed down with anxieties for the maintenance of the dignity, prosperity, liberty, and perhaps the very existence of the States, specially at a time when the peace of the world is threatened. No wonder, Prince Bismarck resents this cool affront with which his new master greets him, after all the wordy tribute to his worth and his services. Apart from the point of personal honour, he may well be seriously staggered at the responsibility which a domestic alliance with the Czar's sworn foe and ex-ruler of Bulgaria, brings with it for Germany. That match, unaccompanied by explanations and guarantees, is a distinct defiance of Russia, which the old Chancellor, now that the great Emperor is gone, with whom he achieved not Prussian hegemony only but Prussian pre-eminence among the nations and throughout the world and built up the fabric of Empire, must more than ever feel himself under the necessity of humouring. Accordingly, he has set his face against it. He will resign, if it is attempted. And he has doubtless the whole people at his back. But Bismarck by himself is a Power. Just now, he is simply indispensable. It is useless speculating farther in the matter. The match has received its quietus. We are only sorry that our good Queen-Empress should have lent herself to what looks very like a court intrigue against the interests of peoples. We believe Her Majesty is not going, after all, to Charlottenburg, as announced, to celebrate the betrothal of her dear grand-daughter. Though the project is abandoned, Russia is sure to remember it against England.

A WHOLESALE fire has reduced to ashes the trading town of Colgong, in the Bhagalpur district. It stands on the right or south bank of the Ganges. Its population numbered 4,419 Hindus and 1,270 Mahomedans. The fire commenced in the morning of Wednesday at 9 and continued unchecked till two in the afternoon, when the work of destruction was complete. It was no work of arson, but a pure accident. Some oil was being put into a cooking utensil and this set the wood work of the house ablaze, and the contagion spread, aided by the strong wind from the west. There is no fire-brigade in the town and no wells, though the river flows by it. Attempts, if any, to put down the fire were unavailing, it spread so gallopingly. It must have been a grand pyrotechnic exhibition for several hours, but the people had scarcely the heart to note the æsthetic effect. Several lives are reported to have been lost, and very little of property has been saved. Mr. Antonine's Factory escaped the general conflagration, affording shelter to the destitute men, women and children.

WE confess we were alarmed when we heard that the Viceroy, with his Private Secretary and one of his Aides-de-camp, had been inspecting the backslums of our metropolis and that the Executive of the town corporation had led the party to some of the filthiest spots in town, particularly as we were not told of any precautions having been taken, probably the better to understand the harmful character of the sights. Considering that they were utterly unused to such a tainted atmosphere, it was a real and grave risk that the Viceroy and his companions incurred by his laudable curiosity to acquaint himself with the state of the metropolis. It is a relief to know that nothing wrong has occurred. It is lucky not only for the distinguished experimenters, but also for the town and corporation. Any attack of illness, from whatever cause, was sure to have been attributed to that morning's drive through the Black Town. And if the city stood a good chance of revolution on the illness of Lady Baring—wife of our former Finance Minister—a real shake to the Viceroy's constitution would surely have swept away the municipal government of Calcutta, and consigned the poor inhabitants to we know not what pains and penalties. Now they—Viceroy and all—are so far out of the reach of our nastiness that even the Indian Mirror cannot vomit on them the contents of its heart and brain, we may well rejoice at our escape.

If Sir Donald Mackenzie Wallace has suffered on the way to Allahabad, that is none of our business, sorry though we are on his account. There are causes enough of disease all the world over. He had been working like a mad man, during the last few weeks, before the departure, and any little circumstance acting on such an overstrained system might be sufficient to produce grave consequences to the health. Such an impulse may have been communicated by the atmosphere of part of the country through which he passed.

CHOLERA is raging in epidemic form in Raneegunge. The coolies in Burn & Co.'s Pottery Works are dying by hundreds. The surrounding atmosphere is surcharged with the poison. It is not safe to run by the railway through the district. A private letter reports that a European passenger from Calcutta to Allahabad was taken ill with diarrhoea at Raneegunge. A European child was similarly attacked while coming down. Sir Donald Mackenzie Wallace might have in the same way imbibed the poison at Raneegunge.

It is in contemplation to withdraw the British garrison from Neemuch, on the ground of its unhealthiness. The inhabitants are naturally in alarm. Accordingly, they have promptly appealed to the Viceroy against such a calamity being fastened on them, without any fault on their part. We hope the memorial will reach His Excellency, and not be disposed of by a smart Under-Secretary.

We truly sympathise with the Neemuchites. It is a question of ruin and no ruin—nay, even of life and death to them. It means the loss of employment—the loss of every kind of profession and of trade—the loss of property. It means the total wreck of the large amount sunk in lands and houses. The poor pensioner or poorer widow, who has settled there and scraped every possible means, even to borrowing, in order to purchase a shop site or a bungalow that might support self and family, is done for. And then the withdrawal of the troops will simply hand the place over to anarchy and lawlessness. The inhabitants could scarcely remain if they wished, after the removal of the cantonment. In fine, the withdrawal means the dispersion of the city, neck and crop.

Of course, if Neemuch is permanently and direly unhealthy, we can sympathise with Government. It is a grave responsibility to consign British soldiers to avoidable disease and death. But are matters so very bad? No case has been made out for abandoning the place, while all the political reasons for a garrison in the particular neighbourhood exist with full force.

AS some set off against the numerous Christian adventurers who flock to Hyderabad, to suck its heart's blood, a remarkable Mahomedan visitor is now staying there. Kazi Abdul Kader, who, as guest of the Minister, has been assigned for his accommodation one of the detached bungalows at Bushir Bagh, had been Minister of War and Prime Minister of Afghanistan in the reign of Amir Shere Ali Khan. And a right worthy Vizier of the Period he was, accomplished alike in Eastern and Western lore. For, the local Record not only testifies to his fluency in English but credits him with an acquaintance with French, German, and Russian. He of course knows his native Poshto and Persian, to which he adds a knowledge of Oordu as well as of some of the Turk dialects. There is no Afghan language other than Poshto.

"His Highness accorded the distinguished visitor a very cordial reception and held a most interesting conversation with the Savant for several hours together, and appears to have been favorably impressed by the bearing and conduct of the old gentleman. The Kazi Sahib himself was very much astonished at the natural intelligence and the avidity with which His Highness sought information about the countries situate beyond the northern limits of India, and the interview was altogether a most pleasant and reciprocally edifying one."

That shows a great advance in education and understanding at the Nizamut. The late ruler could not have made such intelligent use of the Kazi. His Highness, Afzal-ad-Dowla regarded Delhi as one of the ends of the earth, more distant than Constantinople. And no wonder, considering that "all his adventures were by the fire-side and all his migrations from the blue bed to the brown"—being confined, for the most part, to driving a hansom within the palace grounds.

A RATHER bitter literary feud is going on in the Press of Western India between Hindus and Parsees, respecting innovations in their common Gujrati language, the one complaining of Parsee corruptions, by introducing unnecessary English terms, and the other inveighing against Hindu pedantry in introducing Sanskrit vocables to the confusion of the people. Both complaints, we believe, are well-founded, and the controversy would be beneficial if it ended in teaching both classes of innovators moderation. The same things might be said of almost all our progressive Indian vernaculars.

THE North-Western Railway has made a concession to Tommy Atkins. Soldiers on furlough can travel on the line in second class on payment of third class fare. We trust friend Tom will, on his part, feel the responsibility entailed on him by this handsome consideration. More than ever, he should, henceforth, at all times, behave like a sober British soldier who reserves his courage for the field and is distinguished for his humanity and his regard for his brethren and the civil population in general, and not like a rowdy Cossack reeking with rakke—a nuisance wherever he goes.

WE are glad to observe any symptoms of healthy activity in our genuine Mofussil associations. All the more so since the metropolis has failed to lead. The British Indian Association, which formerly did such good work, has been paralysed by death, disease, or age of its working members. Our chief hope now lies in such bodies as those of Patna and Dacca.

In November last, the East Bengal Landholders' Association, Dacca, memorialized Government to exempt bastu lands, jalkar, bankar, and others from the income tax, in that these already bear the Road and Public Works cess. They argued that it could not be the intention of the Act or the Government to tax them twice. They accordingly prayed for a remedy either by rules under the Act or the amendment of the law.

The Government have now replied, thus:—

"In reply, I am desired to say that the Hon'ble the Advocate-General has expressed an opinion that the rulings of the late Commissioner of Income-tax correctly express the law on the subject. The general question raised by the Association, regarding the exemption from assessment to income-tax of income which is already liable to Road and Public Works cess, has been referred by His Honour to the Government of India. As regards the assessment on jalkars, I am to say that the Board of Revenue, in their circular order No. 5 of January 1884, have expressly directed district officers to abstain from any further collections of Road Cess and Public Works Cess in respect of jalkars, that is, of assessments made on rights of fishery as distinguished from proprietary right in the land which is covered by water. The Board have been requested to satisfy themselves that these orders are being carried out."

THE aristocracy of Great Britain has at last found its buttress. That chronicler of Society the St. Stephen's Review reports the interesting fact that a veritable Duchess—she of Hamilton—has just opened a shop in Ipswich for sale of her dairy produce. The same unexceptional authority tells us that it is crowded. We suppose the mob of gentlemen and snobs go more to see the fun than to buy, unless they buy for fun. It must be interesting to see a real peeress dealing. One is reminded of Sterne contemplating the operation of an ass eating macaroni. Seriously speaking, a real lady, whether a peeress or not, must sell as shop with a dignity and a grace beyond the reach of art—of the ordinary denizens of Cockaigne.

MR. KNOWLES, editor of the Nineteenth Century and lucky friend of all the prosperous and powerful men of light and leading, has at length been visited by a reverse of fortune. He has lost the star of his company. Mr. Gladstone has withdrawn his favours from him and will henceforth send his magazine articles to the older Contemporary Review, to which he was originally attached. The Nineteenth Century is now an established thing, and counts the best writers among its contributors and its supporters by the thousand—all, in some measure, owing to Mr. Gladstone making it his organ. At an earlier period, his defection might have been far more seriously felt. Even now, it means some diminution of prestige and some loss of popularity.

THE listless perfunctory way in which the High Court now-a-days performs its functions, is illustrated in a recent case reported in the Englishman. A Division Bench worked itself into confusion under the light of recent unequivocal legislation, and a Full Bench has gilded refined gold and painted the lily.

"Is Section 21 of the Bengal Tenancy Act (viii. of 1885) applicable to any suit which was instituted before that Act came into force?" The question was raised in the appeal of Tupsee Singh v. Ramsurun Koori, before a Division Bench (Messrs. Tottenham and Norris, J. f.) as questions of more or less pertinency, even to the length of absurdity, will, if allowed, be raised by counsel in order to "digest" (in Bengali phrase) fees with good grace. The wonder is that two superior Judges of our Westminster Hall should have allowed themselves to be puzzled by it so far as to offer it as a nut for the combined wisdom of the Judges sitting in Full Bench to crack. There was no dispute about the facts. The original suit was by a landlord to eject a tenant. The service of notice was proved. A right of occupancy was, however, set up. The plea would not stand under the old, but it prevails under the new, law. The suit was filed in June and the written statement the next month in 1885. The Bengal Tenancy Act came into operation on the 1st November of the same year 1885, and the case was decided by the Munsif in favor of the tenant in January 1886. Decisions of Divisional Benches are to be found supporting the Munsiff's judgment, but the referring Bench remark—

"With great respect to the opinions of the learned judges with whom we have the misfortune to differ, we must confess that we do not see anything in the retrospective operation of Section 21, anything that compels us to give it effect in a suit instituted and heard partly or wholly before the Act came into operation. In any suit instituted under that Act, the tenant would of course be entitled to the benefit in question unless he was debarred by some previous decree in another suit. But we do not see how he can take advantage of any Section creating a right in an Act not yet in force, when the suit was brought and his defence was made."

Mr. Justice Wilson (on behalf of himself, Mr. Justice Tottenham, Mr. Justice Pigot, Mr. Justice O'Kinealy, and Mr. Justice Ghose) thus answers the question in the affirmative:—

"The words that we have to construe are those of Section 21 Subsection 2. The Subsection is this:—'Every person, who being a settled rayyet of a village within the meaning of the last foregoing section, held land as a rayyet in that village at any time between the 2nd day of March 1883 and the commencement of this Act, shall be deemed to have acquired a right of occupancy in that land under the law then in force; but nothing in this Subsection shall affect any decree or order passed by a Court before the commencement of this Act.' I accept the proposition contended for by the learned counsel for the appellant, in his able argument, that an enactment affecting rights of property is not to be so construed as to give it retrospective effect, unless the intention that it shall have such effect clearly appears. But I think in the section under consideration such an intention is plainly expressed. The first part of the section deals with the case of lands held by a settled rayyet at or after the date at which it came into operation, and it declares that such holding shall give a right of occupancy. Subsection 2 deals with the case of lands held by a settled rayyet at an earlier period, namely, between the 2nd of March 1883, and the commencement of the Act, and it says that such holding shall be deemed to have given a right of occupancy. The Subsection is therefore in express terms retrospective.

It was further contended that, admitting this to be so, effect should not be given to the Subsection in a case pending before the commencement of the Act, and the learned judges who referred the case to us were disposed to adopt this view. I am quite alive to the inconveniences that arise when a suit has to be decided according to a law not in force when the suit was brought. But I think the language of the section is too clear to enable us to avoid the construction which entails those inconveniences.

The retrospective enactment is quite general in its terms. And the exception from its operation, expressly made by the last words of the section, in the case of decrees or orders passed before the commencement of the Act, seems to me to show that pending suits were not to be excepted. I should answer the question referred to us in the affirmative, and dismiss the appeal with costs."

What other conclusion could they come to? If the Judges of the Divisional Bench had seriously put their minds to the matter before them, they could scarcely have missed the clear intent of the law-givers. We are not surprised that one of them who sat on the Full Bench had nothing to urge in support of the Divisional view. In regard to almost any other Act, the question might properly arise and possibly prevail. But the Tenancy Act is an exceptional piece of legislation, undertaken on purpose to protect the peasantry, and the retrospective effect—the suggestion whereof startled the Divisional Judges—is expressly given in it. The legislature was well aware of the jealousy with which the Zemindars guarded their advantages. It knew that the introduction of the measure would be the signal for a systematic attempt to prejudice the tenantry, by dispossession and otherwise. Hence the subsection. The motion for leave to introduce the Bill was made on the 2nd March 1883, and it was not till the 14th March 1885, or more than two years thence, that the Act received the assent of the Governor-General. Even then, it did not immediately become law. For various reasons, and at the earnest solicitation of the Zemindars, its operation was postponed. It was not till the 1st November that any of its provisions came into force. It took nearly a whole year, after its passing, to become in its entirety the law of the land, on the 1st February 1886. 'Cute landlords had so much opportunity given them to sacrifice their tenants to their greed or their ambition, that the knowing men who had charge of the Bill took the necessary precaution in the interest of the ignorant masses.

THE FUTURE OF THE OUDH FAMILY. II.

IN our last issue, we discussed the differences existing between the ordinary form of primogeniture prevailing amongst Aryan communities in Europe and India, as contrasted with the rule prevailing amongst Mahomedan Royal Houses, here and elsewhere. We have there shown that, whilst in the former the rule was strict and almost indefeasible, in the latter it was subject to great variations, there being no line of representation, and the succession depending upon a rule of absolute seniority in age amongst the members of the whole Royal House, closely resembling the Tanistry, which prevailed in Celtic societies, or upon a rule of selection amongst the different sons or other near kindred of the last Sovereign. In connection with this topic, another observation of Sir Henry Maine, recorded in connection with Islamic royalty, is deserving of attention. "It is evident, however, that in polygamous societies the form of primogeniture will always tend to vary. Many considerations may constitute a claim on the succession, the rank of the mother, for example, or her degree in the affections of the father." (Ancient Law, p. 243). Now, it is curious to find that when the Shasters of the Hindus expressly permitted intermarriage between different castes, the precedence amongst sons was determined by the rank of their respective mothers. Similarly, in the Jungle Mehal rajgis, where marriages are still allowed with females of castes or families with whom the Rajas cannot eat together, the sons of begar bhati wives are postponed in the succession to the sons by bhati wives. The religion of Islam does not recognise any distinctions of caste or restrictions as to eating together, but in Mahomedan families the rank of wives would be determined by their social position previous to their marriage, and the status of their parents, as well as (among Shiahs) by the permanency or otherwise of the marriage. The mutah being only a legalised form of concubinage, among Shiahs it is natural that mutahi or temporary wives should be considered as inferior in rank and status to the nikahi or permanently married wives—and to some extent that distinction would extend to the issue by the respective marriages. The difference in the rank of the mother, alluded to by Maine, must mean, in addition to the social status of the wife's parents, this prominent form of difference, which is the most fundamental difference possible of occurrence in a Mahomedan family of the Shiah persuasion. If the Government enquire from proper quarters, they will, we believe, find that the desire of the late Amir Sher Ali Khan to supersede Yakub Khan by a younger son,—and which chiefly brought on all his troubles—was actuated, in part, by a difference in the rank of their mothers. A curious coincidence has just occurred in another part of the Mahomedan world, which would, we are sure, throw some light upon the question at issue. His Majesty the Shah of Persia has, it appears from the newspapers, recently dismissed his eldest son Prince Zillus Sullan, from the high office of Governor-General of the Province of Ispahan, which that Prince had, for several years, been holding with great credit to himself. Now, it may not be known to our readers that Prince Zillus Sultan, although the eldest son of His Majesty, is not the Wali Ahad or heir-apparent—that high position being occupied by a younger son of His Majesty, born of a mother of a much superior social status. The Shah was very fond of his first born son and had placed him in one of the highest posts of his kingdom. But from the fact of the Order of the G. C. S. I. having been lately conferred upon that Prince by Her Majesty the Queen of England, and probably from other circumstances brought to light, the Shah evidently got alarmed that Prince Zillus Sultan was strengthening his personal position to such an extent, that he might prove a formidable rival to the rightful heir to the Throne—the heir-apparent—after his (the Shah's) death, and so, with a view to put an end to such a possible contingency, His Majesty has removed him from the viceroyalty of Ispahan. That certainly was the reason which prompted His Majesty Wajid Ali Shah, upon the death of his Heir-Apparent, Prince Hamid Ali, son of the chief nikahi wife Nawab Khas Mahal, to devolve the ceremonial duties of the latter upon Prince Khush Bakht, although elder sons, prominently the Chhota General Prince Huzubber Ali, son of a mutahi wife, Nawab Mashook Mahal, were alive. Khush Bakht, as the son of a nikahi wife (Nawab Akhtar Mahal), had, alike by royal and popular usage, purer blood, higher rank and greater consideration than any mutahi son of His Majesty. Moved by the same feeling, His Majesty arranged a marriage (nikah) between Prince Khush Bakht and the relict of the late Wali Ahad, Prince Hamid Ali, his object being that if Khush Bakht could get any son by the said lady, who was the daughter of the King's own uterine sister and who had given birth to two sons by the Wali Ahad, both of whom had predeceased their father,—the purer line would thereby continue in His Majesty's family. When Prince Khush Bakht too, died, without leaving any issue by that wife, His Majesty's line of pure descent became extinct. His sons by nikahi wives had all predeceased him, and none of them had left issue by nikahi wives. Of sons by mutahi wives, His Majesty had enough and to spare, but they were incapable, in his opinion, of taking the place of his nikahi sons. In an official communication addressed in 1877 to the Agent, Governor-General, His Majesty expressed himself as follows:—

"I may add that reason, law and family custom all combine in acknowledging the superiority in the rank of the issue of a married wife of respectable parentage before that of a mutah wife, irrespective of the age of the latter issue. For these reasons, according to the custom in this Royal Family, the issue of a mutah wife (however elder in years) never gets precedence while the issue of a shadi wife may be in existence.

* * * * *

the right to succeed as heir-apparent or successor in a royal house like ours can never be inherited except by the issue of a shadi wife."

The Political Department, which had then espoused the cause of the Chhota General (a mutahi son of His Majesty) and worked itself into a regular passion over the case, light-heartedly passed over these asseverations of His Majesty as made simply to spite their protégé, but a dispassionate critic, examining them by the light of the dictum of Sir Henry Maine already quoted and the actual instance in Afghanistan, will surely arrive at the conclusion that there was a great deal of truth in the said statements.

Similar considerations afford a consistent key to the conduct of His Majesty after the demise of Prince Khush Bakht. Although many sons by mutahi wives (the Chhota General Prince Hazubber Ali and Prince Kamar Kadr included) were then alive and within reach, His Majesty conferred the quasi-Wali-Ahad status enjoyed by Prince Khush Bakht upon Prince Mirza Jehan Kadr Bahadur, and put him forward as his representative. Failing pure issue of his own, His Majesty naturally turned to his brother's line and conferred the representative status upon his nephew, the only son of the Prince General by his nikahi wife. Of course, it is well-known that Prince Jehan Kadr had other claims upon His Majesty's affections, but we doubt whether His Majesty's surviving sons would have been so summarily superseded, had their mothers been allied to His Majesty by permanent bonds of matrimony. Here again we may remark, that the last corroboration of the above sentiment is afforded by the otherwise strange phenomenon announced in the papers, that the leading collateral members of the Royal Family in Lucknow, have declared in favor of recognising Prince Jehan Kadr as the representative of the family at Calcutta. Of course, personal qualifications count for much in such matters, but we doubt whether that alone would have led to the supersession of the whole class of His Majesty's surviving sons, had it not been strengthened by the idea that the purest blood in the family was now represented not by the line of His late Majesty, but by the line of His Majesty's younger brother the Prince General, who, when alive, had the next rank in the kingdom below His Majesty.

So far as the legal distribution of the assets of the estate of His Majesty is concerned, there is no objection to the mutahi sons of His Majesty receiving their pound of flesh from the Government as the Administrator of the Estate. If, however, further provision is to be made for them from the public funds, and a public status conferred upon them, the matter is one which comes legitimately within the scope of public discussion, and it is but just and proper that in the disposal thereof due regard should be had to the acts and declarations of His Majesty, the sentiments of the disinterested members of the Royal Family residing at Lucknow, and the pretty unanimous verdict of the native public who will have most to deal with this bevy of princelings. Mr. Secretary Macaulay's letter of instructions to Mr. Peacock's Committee, contained a forcible expression of Sir Ashley Eden's opinions upon the true position of His Majesty's mutahi women and their offspring, which deserve the attention of the Government of India at the present juncture.

THE NATIVE PRESS ON THE VICEROYALTY.

THE most desperate efforts are being made by the Calcutta malcontents to work the native press into harmony, real or seeming, with their wild and mischievous attitude towards the Viceroy. But although several of our contemporaries have succumbed to appeals supported by rank falsehood, yet it is evident that the country in general has kept its head sufficiently cool. We can afford space for only a few extracts, at least this week. We commence with the Lucknow Express:—

"Whatever certain sections of the native press may allege to the contrary, there can be no question as to the great success of last Thursday's demonstration at the Calcutta Town Hall. All classes, including the masses, united to express their deep regret at Lord Dufferin's resignation of his high office, and all alike joined in lauding the Viceroy's high character, the elevated sense of duty to the people and country which has throughout actuated him, and the large measure of success which has attended his administration of public affairs. The meeting was one of the largest and most enthusiastic on record, and the large number of native gentlemen present on the occasion, testifies to the singular unanimity of public sentiment, European and Native, in regard to the Viceroy, his public life among us, and the singleness of purpose which he has brought to bear upon his administrative functions in the interests of India."—Express, 28th March 1888."

The Sind Times notices the extraordinary rush made to the press by that soul of music Sir Sourendra Mohun Tagore, to protest that he did not understand politics, of which so much was made in the Titoo Meer's killa of the malcontents:—

"Harmony is the soul of music, and true to his instincts and the darling object to which he has consecrated his whole life, the eminent rajah proposes to take part in some of the demonstrations in favor of the retiring Viceroy, simply out of a pure love for harmony. Read between the lines the semi-facetious letter of Sir S. N. Tagore appears to us to be a homily upon the unmusical wordy warfare of the Mirror and other Bengal journalists. The Mirror, however, brings it forward to prove the enforced and factitious character of the Dufferin demonstration."—Sind Times, 21st March 1888.

In this connection, we may observe that there are several gentlemen of the same name with the Raja's, and it was we believe a namesake of his who signed the Requisition to the Sheriff to call the meeting.

The Mahratta writes:—

"Taking Lord Dufferin's administration all in all we must say that the counterdemonstrations and very hostile criticisms which have appeared on the Bengal side do not appear to us to be either justified or in good taste. In fact we have not been able to understand why the tone of our contemporaries on the other side should have been so bitter."—Mahratta, 1st April 1888.

The People's Friend of Madras writes:—

"Many of our countrymen have gone on the dissecting tack, and, instead of looking at his administration as a whole, have selected the few worst parts for their irreverent and adverse criticism. They forget the circumstances under which he succeeded Earl Ripon, and they entirely are oblivious how he has been wire pulled by Lord Cross. We look upon Lord Dufferin's rule as on the whole wise, and advantageous to the country, and we shall prove this; but we do not say it was perfect.

Who ever hopes a faultless piece to see,
Thinks what ne'er was, nor is, nor e'er shall be.

Canada was proud of him, but India more hard to please, capricious and whimsical, is not capable of appreciating him."—People's Friend, 31st March 1888.

"Capricious and whimsical" our contemporary may well call us of the North, to spare bitter epithets. Fortunately, we are not all in the same boat. Here is leading native organ of our North-Western frontier:

"His Excellency was not unpopular—our opinion is that he was popular. His kind and candid utterances on all public occasions, his sympathetic attitude towards the National Congress movement, and his offer of a seat in his Council to Sir T. Madhava Rao, immediately after his election as Chairman of the meeting to welcome the delegates to the National Congress at Madras, his appointment of the Public Service Commission, his dealing out justice to so high-placed a Civilian as Mr. Beames, of Bengal, had made him popular. The people further knew that Lord Dufferin had written to the Secretary of State for India, strongly advocating the advisability of placing the Legislative Councils on a broader and more representative basis. We believe he was popular; and we very much regret that, owing to the indiscretion of his personal friends, his popularity has suffered such a shock. The people liked Lord Dufferin's kindness, good-will and efforts in their behalf, and they disliked his annexation of Burmah in the interests of English commerce, and the imposition of the Income Tax and the rising of the Salt Tax, to meet the cost of that annexation. For the last they would hold no demonstration in his honour, and for the first they would not oppose any demonstration in his honour. If they have opposed it now it is because the movement in his honour was set on foot in their name. If they made no protest, the impression in England would be that Lord Dufferin's rule was as popular as that of his predecessor. Such an impression would be of great harm to the interests of India. In those interests, it is necessary that England should know our opinion of our rulers, so that they might know what sort of rulers would best serve the interests of India. This is, we think, what has led the public of Bengal to do the unpleasant."—Tribune, March 28.

Again:—

"His Excellency has done some good to India, and he may yet do some more good. Moreover, the annexation of Burmah and the frontier railways and other defences, which have cost India so much money, are works of Imperial policy, over which, we believe, Lord Dufferin had little control. It is a great pity that the Calcutta promoters of the meeting did not wait till the eve of Lord Dufferin's departure from these shores, by which time the excitement caused by the publication of the notorious Police Circular and the sudden news of the Viceroy's resignation would have subsided, and the public would have settled into a frame of mind in which it could have calmly pronounced opinion on his Excellency's rule."

We come homewards to Behar. It is a pity that the Tirhoot Courier does not print on a rather better stuff, so that all its merit is in danger of being lost on the public. It is withal one of the best papers in the country, conducted by men of culture, sobriety and political grasp. One word from such a quarter is worth a bushel of the thoughts of most of our self-elected oracles. In these days when blatant journalism, judging its neighbours by itself, is ready to assign every act or opinion opposed to its view or the policy of its idols, to a base motive, we may as well say that this is not the first time that we have openly expressed such admiration for this Behar journal. That admiration has not prevented us from differing with it, specially in European politics, which it treats with more intelligence than any other organ of native opinion. We may add that we do not know the editor or conductors, and have no idea as to who he or they may be. On the present controversy, our contemporary has written with its usual wisdom and moderation. And it has shown rare courage, and done no small public service, by forcibly opening the eyes of our countrymen a bit to the true stature of the Avatar of their worship. The Tirhoot Courier is no admirer of the Foreign Policy of the present administration. On the subject of Burma, we are at one with the Courier, and even go beyond our contemporary, having always condemned alike the sudden war upon a weak and stupid neighbour, and the still less justifiable annexation which followed the easy and honourable submission of the poor King. Our views on this great question are altogether our own and somewhat peculiar perhaps, even among those who condemn the Burman policy of Government, being based on some general principles and, also, upon some information not open to the general public nor even to Government. Thus, for one thing, we do not regard His Majesty Theebaw as the monster that the Viceroy and his Government and the public agree in thinking him to be. What warrant has the Courier for calling the King "despicable"? He has been bloody doubtless, but not more so than many princes, Eastern and Western, who have counted sincere admirers among the best and bravest by hundreds and thousands. His domestic massacres were his business, and called for no interference of other Powers. Was Theebaw a worse miscreant than the Shumsheres who now rule Nepal? And do we send an army up the Himalayas to chastise the latter for their crimes? The other day the Viceroy received them and warmly shook their hands all tainted with the gore of dearest relations. Political blood-thirstiness apart, Theebaw was a respectable man. But he was an egregious fool and impracticable to a degree. Therein lay his offence to neighbouring states, and the best justification of the Indian Government. There was so much difficulty in dealing with him, that the first opportunity was taken to sweep him away as an encumbrance and a nuisance. And lusty in our strength, over-powered by the temptation of easy acquisition of a vast kingdom, our rulers, forgetful of other considerations, such as the effect of its action on opinion near and far, naturally enough, insured themselves against the possibility of another Theebaw, by swallowing Upper Burma within the Empire. The fault, such as it is, is as much the ministry's in London as the Viceroy's on the spot. It is, strictly speaking, more England's than either's.

We see we have been beguiled into longer writing on the Burma business than we set out with the intention of giving in the present connection, our purpose being rather to lay before our readers the opinion of other journals, just to show the gulf that separates respectable, responsible and intelligent critics from the maniacs nearer home. We will, therefore, not tarry over the Central Asian Policy. The Courier frankly acknowledges that the Policy had been determined by the preceding Government, and adds, "we cannot but admire Lord Dufferin's personal skill in carrying it out, and specially the way in which he managed to deal with the Ameer after the unfortunate affair of Pandjeh."

Our contemporary gives full and unqualified support to the domestic policy of the Viceroy. We read:—

"Lord Dufferin's fiscal measures are, we believe, so far wise that he has seen more clearly than most of our past Viceroys the necessity of making both sides meet, and of understanding that this can only be done by the most rigid economy, and also by introducing more of the cheaper native in place of the more expensive European element in the administration. Lord Dufferin's fame will rest more surely on the influence he has had in quelling race feeling than on any administrative act. When the Marquis of Ripon left India that feeling was very strong. It was one of the reasons why a man of Lord Dufferin's personal tact was so imperatively needed in the place of that well meaning, right principled but rather weak and impracticable Viceroy. Lord Dufferin's words on the matter in his speech at the Town Hall deserve to be inscribed in letters of gold over every Editor's table."

Our contemporary here quotes that admirable passage in the Viceroy's Reply in which he exhorts all races in India, European and native, to live in peace and neighbourly cordiality as members of the same community. The Courier then truly remarks:—

"Words, such as these, do not come from a re-actionary Bureaucrat. Indeed it is the broadness of Lord Dufferin's sympathies no less than the personal attractiveness of the man, that have made him so popular, wherever he has gone."—The Tirhoot Courier, Mar. 28.

The two leading malcontents are too deep in the mire for reasoning, but we earnestly commend the above to the candid attention of those who have been by them so sadly misled into an unmerited indiscriminate outcry out of season.

Other papers have expressed themselves to much the same purport as the foregoing journals, but we have just now lost the reference. They all have had something good to say of one or another point in the administration, and all have testified to the personal qualities of the Viceroy and the purity of his intentions and the philanthropy of his wife. With regard to the great demonstration in their honor, we see that most of them have been misled by lying telegrams from the malcontent camp. It was reserved for two journals in Calcutta, to pursue the administration with unreasoning fury and desperate rancour. One in particular has gone to lengths of which no respectable man in his senses would dream.

WE are sorry to record the death of Baboo Sreenath Roy. He belonged to the Subordinate Judicial Service. He had matured himself into a good officer. He did excellently as a Judge of the Calcutta Court of Small Causes, at which post he died. He had been on leave, though. How is the vacancy to be filled? There are many barristers who would be to glad to get into the place. But would it be proper to deprive the S. J. Service of such a prize appointment? The High Court Bench being practically closed to them, the members of that hard-working and most deserving body have nothing better to look up to.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—Have you witnessed, Mr. Editor, a curious nondescript exposed for show or, as some say, for sale in Mirror's curiosity shop, and which, if we are to trust to popular rumour, goes by the name of "Chabook?" Old men, fools and children calculate as to what this "chabook" is. Third rate undergraduates with little grammar and less idiom and with spectacles on, assure us that "chabook" will ultimately prove to be a fixed star in the literary sky. Their elders conjecture, and perhaps with some degree of truth, that it is nothing more than a short-lived lantern at the tail of a newspaper kite. This chabook riddle has puzzled many a wit. With your encyclopaedic knowledge of men and things, will you kindly tell me

Who is Chabook? What is he?

That Dan Mirror commends him.

I have made a feeble attempt to solve the riddle myself but I cannot vouch for its correctness.

Dullness incarnate is he,

God with care this gift has lent him,

That he might pooh-poohed be.

Or, if you do not like, Mr. Editor, the above solution, I will offer another which is due to one of my friends, to whom the smell of an old folio is passing sweet and who suggests that a very old poet—name unknown—thus sings of the illustrious house of the "Chabooks."

"Chabooks" are begotten by Folly,

By Folly nursed; and "Chabooks" die

With none to close their eye.

But this record of the "Chabooks" supplied by my friend is extremely meagre, and therefore I am compelled to disturb you for an elaborate and an authentic history of the "Chabooks."

If you have no objection, Mr. Editor, I would like to add to the above lines two of my own,

Let us all ring Chabook's knell.

I will begin it—Ding, dong, bell.

Mirror's "Chabook," who to the great merriment of the Mirror-ites and to the edification of himself, has of late drenched you with the rinsings of an unclean imagination, is, I believe, the last of the "Chabooks" and will ere long with his riaiseries go to the family vault "of all the Capulets."

We are now in a position to understand how Reis and Rayyet and its Editor are unmentionable to the "fair, large ears" of Master Chabook. For do we not remember how Bottom the weaver says, that he has a good stomach to a pottle of hay when Titania offers him a feast of beauty?

You may be, and all the world knows, you are "a man of infinite jest, of most excellent fancy." But Master Chabook will none of it. Have you, Mr. Editor, a copious fund of the billingsgate? By all means treat Master Chabook to it for he has, it may be well presumed, a good stomach to it.

Master Chabook has thought it fit to "dub" you a scribbler, but ere long he will come to know that you will publish right or wrong, for ever since your journalistic career,

Fools are your theme and satire is your song.

Master Chabook by his predilection for tame puns has clearly shown that "for anointed dullness he was made."

Master Chabook would make a capital penny-a-liner, for is he not an adept in false rhetoric? We quote:—

"Lord Dufferin's admirers must have been verily reduced to a desperate pass when it has been felt necessary to invoke a Shiva-Sambhu (!) for the salvation of His Lordship's reputation."

Bravo! Master Chabook, we do not know whether it is poetry or prose run mad. Is it not, Mr. Editor, redolent of the Surrender-Not-iams. Excuse, Mr. Editor, Surrender-Not-iams is too elegant a word to be pedantic. "Bark, bite" and you are fairly on the way to political salvation—such, I believe, is the alpha and omega of the political creed of Chabook-ism.

We are fallen on evil days, Mr. Editor, when you of all men in the world would be dubbed a toady and tuft-hunter. Dr. Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee seeking a handle to his name—this is pure Chabook-ese—a mere figment of Master Chabook's brain, if God has given him any.

It would be difficult for your worst enemies to point out a single occasion when you narrowed your mind,

And to party gave up what was meant for mankind.

To Chabook and his imps you may appear a "hoary scribbler," but you won your spurs long before Chabook and his imps were in embryo, and for our part we heartily wish we had the privilege to sit at your feet every now and then to learn politics and literature.

Calcutta, April 6.

ANTI-CHABOOK.

LORD DUFFERIN'S REPLY TO THE CALCUTTA ADDRESS.

Gentlemen,—I am sure you will readily understand that it is almost impossible for me to express in words my deep sense of the honour conferred upon me by the presentation of such an address as that which you have just read. To be assured of the good-will, the confidence, and the approval of his fellow-countrymen and fellow-subjects, whether English or Native, is the highest and the most legitimate reward to which a person in my situation can aspire. (Cheers.) Indeed the marks of approbation which I have received from so many different quarters have taken me almost by surprise. A Viceroy is so continually engaged every hour of the day in labours requiring all his energy and attention, problem after problem presses so uninterruptedly upon his consideration, that he has not even breathing time to ask himself whether he is satisfying the expectations of his friends or the reverse. (Cheers.) Nay more, the issues with which he is confronted are so vast and far-reaching, affecting as they do the destinies of millions and millions of men, that his own puny individuality and personal interests sink into insignificance in the presence of these mighty multitudes for whose welfare he is responsible. (Applause.) And it is very fortunate that this should be the case, for I cannot conceive a greater danger to India than that a man, in assuming this great office, should be pre-occupied with such trivial considerations as his fame for popularity. (Cheers.) His duty is to efface himself as much as possible, and to forget his own identity in his devotion to those absorbing duties with which he is entrusted. It is in accordance with this golden rule, that my illustrious predecessors have invariably lived and laboured, and it is the same spirit of self-abnegation and unostentatious devotion to duty, irrespective of recognition or reward, that has characterized the successive generations of those public servants of all ranks who, at the sacrifice of ease, health, and even life itself, have built up the India of to-day,—the loyal, contented, and prosperous India of Queen Victoria. (Loud cheers.) Nor, in thanking you for the kind expressions you use towards me, must I forget to remind you that it is to the Government of India and to my colleagues that the largest measure of the approval you are pleased to bestow upon me, is justly due. If I have succeeded in steering the Ship of State with success through the troublous period we have recently traversed, it is owing to their wise assistance in Council and to the energy and skill with which they have administered their several Departments. (Applause.) Not only so, but it must also be remembered that a great deal of the harvest reaped in one Viceroyalty is the fruit of the seed sown and the labours inaugurated in the preceding reign, and I gladly acknowledge that much of the policy of the existing Indian Government which has met with cordial acceptance, both here and at home, received its original impulse from my predecessor, with whom, as is well known, originated the demarcation of the northern frontier of Afghanistan. The settlement finally arrived at, though some people make light of it, is in my eyes a most valuable diplomatic achievement, and I venture to think that our policy as a whole in that region has been successful. (Cheers.) The fixing of the confines of India proper at the Amran Range has placed us in possession of an advanced military position of almost impregnable strength, and my interview with the Amir not only prevented a war which would certainly have broken out between England and Russia in connexion with the Panjdeh affair had he not been in my camp when that sinister event occurred, but by the knowledge it gave me of his character, wishes, and mode of thought, and by the mutual good feeling which was then established, it has enabled me to secure his assent to the Russo-Afghan settlement, and to deal with many other delicate questions which have since risen between us in a manner to increase and corroborate his confidence in the friendship and good faith of the English Government. (Applause.) Nor is it merely with the Amir himself that better relations have been established, the Afghan people generally have assumed a totally different attitude towards us during the last three years from that which previously prevailed, as was exemplified not only when Sir West Ridgeway and his companions returned through Cabul to India, but in a still more remarkable degree by the cordial reception given to our boundary escorts at those very places near which a little while ago they dare not even pass by reason of the hostility of the inhabitants. (Cheers.)

Turning to the next topic upon which you have touched, the conquest of Burma, I need not assure you that it is a great satisfaction to me that our policy in this respect should meet with your approval. War of course is always a hateful and evil thing; no one detests the very thought of war more heartily than myself. Again, annexation, the increase of our territories, and consequently of our responsibilities, is confessedly undesirable; yet I never had a clearer conviction of anything in my life than as to the necessity, under the then existing circumstances, of extending our control over the whole of the Irrawaddy valley? (Applause.) What was Burma? It was neither a Government nor a Kingdom. There was no central authority. Even after massacring most of his relatives and kindred, the King did not dare to leave the precincts of his palace. His whole territory was the theatre of anarchy and lawlessness. One-half of the population lived by plundering the other half. The local Chiefs were cruel and rapacious brigands, extorting money from the helpless villagers at the point of the sword. A Chinese horde had a short time previously taken possession of one of Burma's most important northern towns, and the Government of Mandalay had embarked upon a line of diplomacy which would have infallibly brought us into hostile collision with a great European Power. (Cheers.) English merchants who had sunk large sums on the express invitation of the Burmese Government in developing the resources of the country, were treated with the greatest injustice, and the temperate remonstrances of the Government of India on their behalf were replied to with insolence and contempt; while the total disintegration of all civil society in Upper Burma was exercising a most pernicious and baneful influence on the peace and prosperity of our own Province. In these circumstances something had to be done, and if only the moderate and benevolent terms of the Indian Government had been accepted, the tottering Court of Ava might have been kept upon its legs a little longer, though under no conceivable circumstances could the catastrophe have been very long delayed. As it was, our proposals were met with a declaration of war, and Upper Burma became a province of the British Empire. (Cheers.) I am well aware that this result has not been regarded with great satisfaction by some of our native fellow-subjects. On the one hand, they could hardly be expected to look at the question from the Imperial standpoint, while, on the other, they naturally dreaded the expense inevitably attending conquest; but it is evident, even taking the most restricted view of the matter, that India was bound, after drawing for several years a surplus revenue of a million a year from Lower Burma, to come to the assistance of the Province when it had become so obviously necessary to provide for its protection. Nor do I think that any apprehension need be entertained as to the ultimate financial effect of what we have done. (Cheers.) At first, of course, there must be a great deal of expenditure on Courts of Justice, Barracks, Jails, and the other appliances of civilisation, but the more we know about the country the more extensive and the richer seem to be its resources, and the more certain it is that in the course of some years it will become an even more prolific contributor to the Indian Exchequer than Lower Burma. (Loud Applause.) In any event, the verdict of History I am sure will pronounce that by establishing in that unfortunate country order, security, peace and justice, in the place of anarchy, rapine, torture and murder, and by replacing the late King's helpless and hopeless administration by the temperate and benign rule of Queen Victoria, we have reached a consummation as beneficent as it was unavoidable. (Cheers.)

I approach the next topic to which you have alluded with great reluctance, notwithstanding the gracious language in which you have been pleased to clothe your reference. How can the head of any Government reflect otherwise than with pain and regret on the hard fate which has compelled him on two repeated occasions to add to the burdens of the people? That after this he should be regarded with tolerance and equanimity would itself argue great generosity of nature in those to whom he has dealt such hard measure; but the fact of their so candidly recognizing the necessity of these unpopular expedients which, in the case of the Income Tax so immediately affects our industrious classes and the Civil Service, is indeed to pour coals of fire on his head. (Applause.)

To the Finance Committee and to the Public Service Committee I can turn, however, with a far happier feeling, for if ever two Committees did their work honestly, thoroughly, and effectually, it is those two bodies, and glad am I to have this opportunity of expressing my deep thanks to Sir Charles Elliott and Sir Charles Aitchison and their respective colleagues for the great services they have rendered to the Government by their arduous labours. (Applause.) The Report of the Finance Committee will, I hope, soon be in possession of the public. That of the Civil Service Committee has already, I believe, been laid on the Table of the House of Commons, and it is now in the hands of the local Governments, on the receipt of whose opinion it will be at once dealt with by the Government of India. (Applause.)

Leaving, however, these two important topics, I turn even with greater pleasure to your allusions to the noble spirit which has been recently displayed by the Feudatory Princes and Chieftains of India. Most heartily do I agree with you in all that you have said in their regard, for certainly a finer example of patriotism and loyalty has seldom been witnessed than that displayed by these august personages. (Cheers.) The Nizam, the Gackwar, Holkar, the Maharajah of Cashmere, the martial Chiefs of Rajputana and of the Punjab--one and all with an enthusiasm and a spontaneity without parallel, have not merely made offers of large sums of money, but have placed their persons, their swords, and all the resources of their States at the disposal of Her Most Gracious Majesty. (Cheers.) What more signal justification could we have of that equitable spirit which has recognized the fidelity and worth of those Princes, and of that sound policy which has made their power and dignity an integral part of the Imperial system. Most of them are my personal friends, and though here and there may be a Ruler less appreciative than his fellows of the responsibilities imposed upon him by his great position, without flattery I can say that both as regards their private characters, their sense of duty, their desire to benefit their subjects and their friendly feelings towards the British Government, there is every cause for satisfaction. (Applause.) And I can assure them that the British Government desires no better than that they should administer their several States in accordance with their own lights, untrammelled by undue interference, and along whatever lines are most natural to the habits and customs of their people. (Applause.) Above all things I hope it will be remembered both by them and by the Indian people at large that if here and there the Government has had to make its influence felt at a Native Court, so exceptional a procedure has only been adopted in the last resort, most unwillingly, and in the interests of the Chief himself and of the people for whose welfare he is responsible. (Cheers.)

And now, gentlemen, what more am I to say? You all know how deeply I have had at heart the interests and the welfare of all classes of the community, how impartially I have endeavoured to promote the welfare of each in turn, how faithful I have been to that obligation which has been always felt by the Government of India, to see in every subject of the Queen not the member of a sect, of a caste, of a religion, but a citizen of the Empire possessed of rights, and privileges which are equally the property of all. (Loud Applause.) What can I say to you, Europeans and Natives alike, but this:--Whatever you do, live in unity and concord and good fellowship with each other. Fate has united both races in a community of interests, and neither can do without the other. (Cheers.) The rule of England maintains peace and justice within the borders of India and secures its safety from outside dangers, but that rule cannot be exercised either effectually or acceptably without the loyalty and assistance of the Native races. (Applause.) Therefore, again, I say, co-operate with each other in a generous and genial spirit. I confess I would rather see the Europeans, Hindus, and Mahomedans united in criticizing the Government than that the Hindus and the Mahomedans, the Europeans and the Natives, should become estranged from each other by unworthy prejudices, or animosities of race and religion. God forbid that the British Government should ever seek to maintain its rule in India by fomenting race hatreds amongst its subjects. Thank Heaven, its antecedents, its strength, its self-confidence, and its dignity will for ever render a resource to such expedients unnecessary and impossible. (Cheers.) To those amongst my Native friends who, imbued with the political literature of the West, are seeking to apply to India the lessons they have learnt from the history of constitutional countries, I would say, pursue your objects, which no one can pronounce to be unworthy, with temper, with moderation, and with a due perception of the peculiar circumstances of your native land. (Applause.) Found your claims, whatever they may be, upon what is real and true, and not upon what is baseless and fantastic. It is by this method, and by this method alone, that you have a prospect of realizing anything practical. (Cheers.) My general feelings on these subjects I have already expressed in the speech I delivered on the occasion of the Queen's Jubilee, and to what I then said it is needless to say I still adhere. (Cheers.) To the writers in the public press I would say, pursue your most honorable vocation in a manly, courageous, and faithful spirit. When England gave you a free press she intended that it should become an instrument for the guidance, the assistance, and the enlightenment of the Government and the protection of the people; nor will any Viceroy or any Government ever complain, no matter how severely you criticize what they have said, written, or done, provided there is that ring of sincerity and conviction in your utterances which none can mistake. (Applause.) But do not seek to excite the hatred of the people against the Government by attributing to it intentions and designs which are the fruit of your own imagination. (Cheers.) It was misrepresentations of this kind that thirty years ago helped powerfully to deluge the land with blood, and those who indulge in them are abusing the protection and freedom of speech extended to them by the laws of England, a freedom which a considerable portion of the Indian press I gladly acknowledge exercises with sagacity, discretion and moderation, and which I trust it will every day be found more worthy to enjoy. (Applause.)

These I think are the only valedictory words with which I need trouble you. It only remains for me again to assure you from the very bottom of my heart that I have been deeply touched by this proof of your good-will and generous appreciation. (Cheers.) I shall never forget my friends in this country. It will always be my earnest endeavour, if I ever again take part in public life in England, to further the interests of my Indian fellow-subjects and to consider in a sympathetic and liberal spirit whatever demands they may prefer. (Cheers.) The English Empire in India is, indeed, a marvel of the world; and encouraged by your approbation I hope to carry home with me the conviction that, in the opinion of my Anglo-Indian countrymen, and of my Indian fellow-subjects, I have done nothing during the four years of my anxious rule to shake its stability, to dim the glory of its majesty, or to tarnish that reputation for humanity, justice, and truth which is its crowning and most precious attribute. (Loud and long continued cheers and applause.)

OPINION OF THE PRESS.

It is many years since I first met, and some years since I last met, Dr. Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee, editor of the Reis and Rayyet (Prince and Peasant), and an author of high repute among the kindly, as well as acute and intellectual, people of Bengal. One of the real misfortunes of India was, and still is, Lord Macaulay's picture of the Bengalee. The picture, true perhaps as regards Nuncomar and many Bengalees, is not accurate as a representation of the people generally, taking them as an Englishman may find them if he looks fairly. If they had been unfaithful, the sad story of the Mutiny had been vastly sadder; and, apart from the Mutiny, many Englishmen could give individual instances of Bengalee faithfulness almost unique in history, taking all the circumstances of our relation to India into account. The Bengalee is generally eager for knowledge of all kinds, and is often both courageous in the expression of his opinions, and gifted to a remarkable degree with the power to express those opinions with force and precision. Mr. Fawcett once told me that an unprepared speech made, on his behalf, during an election, by a young Hindoo, surpassed, in force as well as eloquence, any unprepared speech he ever had heard made by any member of the House of Commons, if four or five members of the House were excepted.

Among these Bengalees there is a small body of men—small for that large province—who are, ironically or otherwise termed "Young Bengal." Some of them are no longer young, but grave and aged; some have, in the course of years, been highly distinguished for their public services and their scientific and other attainments. Some have at times been misrepresented, and their language misinterpreted, so that on its return to them it has amazed none more than themselves. Nothing of this has been done by the really great administrators of India. That it has been done, however, cannot be denied.

In the forefront of this little band is the author of this book of travels, Baboo Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee—a writer of high repute, as I have said, also an administrator, as the reader will see from the title-page to this book. A keener, yet a kindlier satirist, one might seek for and not find. His use of the English language has astonished many an educated Englishman; and the quality of his reading is shown by his marvellous power of quotation; not merely from authors like Shakespeare, and Milton, and Macaulay, and men eminent in science, but from out-of-the-way old ballads, and little-known old pamphlets, in the application of which he leaves one wondering—first, how he obtained the productions at all, and secondly, how, having obtained them, he learned to apply them so appositely to the subjects which he intends them to illustrate.

Passing from the author to his book, we shall, perhaps, first of all be attracted to the work of the administrator. He comes upon a milkman's village, on which he finds fastened the grip of a Court favourite. He unloosens the grip, and re-settles the village, in the double interest of Prince and Peasant. And all the time he sees everything. The poor people bathing on the rivers' banks, have his genial and kindly, if also at times, what a Scotchman would call, his "pawky" notice. A "fair maid of Sonargoan" attracts his attention by the gracefulness with which she carries a vessel of water from the river; and, though the fair maid and he are divided by race and faith (she is Mussulman), she has his full meed of praise. Indeed, it must be admitted—and he will not be offended with me for saying so—that he never meets with a fair face, without at least giving evidence of the fact that he has eyes to see and a heart to comprehend.

Of his wide and generous sympathies, much might be said, and still leave much more to say. He meets a missionary on the river, and evidently is inclined, in writing his notes, to pass a joke on the subject. He nips it, however, in the bud, and contents himself with saying, "So new is preaching here, that the simple people said the padre had been singing in the street." He meets Catholic and Protestant missionaries on shipboard, and chuckles over their disputes, while he astonishes them by his command of the English language, and even by his knowledge of the Bible—a knowledge, I may add, which is evident in many of his writings.

A parrot falls overboard, and is drowned in its cage, to his great distress, which is not however paraded. He says: [Extract.]

These are not the words of a Christian, but of a Hindoo.

Again, he has a faithful ugly dog, whose name is Tom, and whose glory it once was to bark, with a noble independence, at some very dignified Sahibs. Our author is compelled to leave Tom behind; and here is his farewell: [Extract.]

I think this is a very fine passage, and one that will draw the author very close to the great heart of humanity, wherever the words are read. Could anything be finer than the testimony to the two foreign "gentlemen," ending with the "Bengalee pariah, my poor Tom"? Not the pariah merely, but the pariah dog. The passage is worthy of the author, and of the great mercifulness of the land that bore him.

Whoever reads this book must be prepared further to find bold and manly language. The author is no flatterer of John Bull, though he gives John his due, and admits that India owes him a great debt. Here is one passage relating to foreign fruits: [Extract.]

Among the sketches of country—word-pictures—the reader will find some exceedingly pretty, and all the more valuable in that they are taken from a standpoint purely Indian; not English. Where an English artist's mind would be filled with European ideas, the mind of this gifted Eastern artist is filled with a class of ideas totally different, yet equally instructive and certainly not less subtle and far-reaching.

On the eve of one of his journeys, our author was placed in a dilemma of a kind not unknown to travellers in India, but not on that account the less stupid. He wished to go by a particular boat, and took time by the forelock for that purpose. The fare was at first stated as 90 rupees, to pay which he offered "a new crisp, fresh British India" note for 100 rupees. "It was," he adds, "fresh from the Currency Office, and had been received only the day before from another Government department." The rest of the story is thus told: [Extract.]

The humour of the little sketch is worth something. I can fancy the author laughing even in his dismay; for he can laugh well at others, and equally well at himself. I shall only venture on one more passage; and I give it as showing the spirit of the man who dares to call his newspaper Prince and Peasant. He desired to return to his home in Bengal, and to bid adieu, for a time at least, to Independent Tipperah, where he had been located "some two years." He received the Maharajah's permission to return home; but still he could not get away. [Extract.]

There is, I think, a sound lesson in this passage; the lesson of the immense value of courtesy and urbanity in the relations of rulers and ruled. "There is a great deal in that sentence, 'He serve fresh and blood.'" The best administrator in India is not always the ablest, the man whose plans are the wisest as plans; but the man who, with plans or without them, gives confidence to the people, and confidence not merely in his justice, but also in his considerateness and forbearance. A clever man once said that the art of success in India is the art of giving good dinners. It may be so; but the peril is great—the peril of debt; and in any case the art has its limits, and its natural collapse. Even dinners and champagne pall in the end. But there is one art that never fails—the art of true courtesy; of that courtesy which, being natural, is not affected by any whim or caprice, either of the person who possesses it, or of any one with whom he has relations.

In bidding farewell to this little book, I once more recall, as I easily and very vividly can, the author's kindly face and gentle voice, as known to me many years ago. I see him, as I see Baboo Kristo Das Pal, Dr. Mahendra Lal Sircar, and some others, including a much-abused editor of the Amrita Bazar Patrika; and I feel and say, with all earnestness and sincerity, that among these are men whom the Government of India would be wise in recognising and winning entirely to its side. They are men of whom no really generous word—true as well as generous—ever is thrown away. I have compared them at times with men of kindred occupations at home, and I think that they are as a rule by far the truer gentlemen in good manners, and often in very much more than mere manners. May the great God, whose sacred Name they use as that of the Father of all, guide them to a nobler destiny than any they yet have known, and with them, and by them, bless their native land!

CALCUTTA, SATURDAY, APRIL 14, 1888.

No. 319

BERLIN, THE SIXTEENTH OF MARCH.

BY SIR EDWIN ARNOLD, K.C.I.E., C.S.I.

Thunder of Funeral Guns !
Deep, sad Bells ! with your boom ;
Sorrowful voice of Soldiers and Folk !
Whom lay ye here in the Tomb ?

" Whom ? " the cannons reply—
Baying like Dogs of War
Whose Master is gone on a path unknown—
" Our Glory, and Lord, and Star ! "

" William, Kaiser and King,
" For him our iron throats yell ;
" Victor we hailed him on many a field,
" We make to his soul farewell ! "

" Whom ? " say the slow-swinging-bells—
" William, pious and dear !
" Oftimes he knelt to the King of Kings
" Where now he lies on his bier ! "

" He took from his God alone
" The Crown of the Fatherland ;
" And now he hath given it back undimmed
" To Death's all-masterful hand ! "

" Whom ? " shout the serried ranks—
" Guardsmen, and Jagers, and all,—
" The Lordliest Lord and the Kingliest King
" That ever raised battle call ! "

" At his word we thronged to the Field,
" Sure of success to betide ;
" Sure that our Kaiser would fight for peace ;
" Sure of Heaven on our side ! "

" Whom ? " sigh women and men,
" And fair-haired Germany boys,
" And girls, with eyes of his corn-flower's hue,
" For our Father we raise our voice ! "

" William the Emperor dead !
" Lo ! he made us one Land !
" Thanks to him and his chosen chiefs,
" Strong and secure we stand ! "

" Steadfast from birth to death,
" Whatso was Right he wrought !
" Duty he loved, and his people, and home !
" Now to dust he is brought ! "

Thunder of Funeral Guns !

We hear you with English ears.
In English breasts it echoes—sad bells !
This message your tolling bears !

Warriors, stalwart and fierce !
We see you are tender and true ;
We are come of a kindred blood, we share
This sorrow, to-day, with you !

Folk of the Fatherland !
Our hearts for your grief are fain !
God guard your Kaiser Frederick,
And give ye good days again !

NEWS AND COMMENTS.

DACCA was visited last Saturday by a tornado, and its new Nawabs have been shaken, with their palace dismantled and their best friend lost. We hope they will take the warning.

MR. A. P. MACDONELL has returned from leave and rejoined his place as Secretary in the Home Department.

BOMBAY has an unwelcome visitor in its midst—the small pox. The Corporation has set apart Rs. 3,000 for a temporary home for those especially marked by the visitor.

LAST week we had to record the death of a native Judge of the Calcutta Court for Small Causes. It is a misnomer to call the Court Small since the increase to Rs. 2,000 in the value of its Causes. On Monday, the Chief Judge mourned the loss of the native Registrar-Judge, Baboo Rajkisto Sen.

ON account of the cholera, the Viceroy does not go to Cashmere. Lord Dufferin left Lucknow direct for Simla which he reaches this day.

SIXTY thousand acres of cultivated land have been submerged by floods in Hungary.

THE Ameer is breaking up camp at Jellalabad. Most of his family have already left for Gundamuk, and he himself remains with one wife and eight attendants.

THE Kazi of Bhokhara the Noble, for his Russian proclivities, has been publicly disgraced, and Ulemas are preaching throughout the country that friendship with Russia is forbidden to the Faithful.

THE Salem Municipality has been called upon by the Madras Government to explain why it incurred any expenditure for reception of the Governor without previous sanction. A most proper call, worthy of Lord Connemara's manliness.

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given, any other being unnecessary, and likely to cause confusion.

THE Dewan of Indore has at length discovered that Tantia Bhil has relations and friends in the capital of the Holkar itself, who receive money from him and who protect and conceal him whenever pursued hard. The Dewan has had these men arrested and committed to the sessions. If the Court is independent, the Minister will scarcely succeed. Tantia himself being at large, the necessary proof will, in all probability, be wanting. If proof be perfect, we doubt whether the law will be found—unless the Judge is prepared to make one from the Bench. We do not know if the Holkar Code has been reformed in this direction. If it has, the reform is against the grain of native sentiment. Anyhow, considering that the Minister has set this prosecution in motion and is understood to take great interest in it, the prisoners are in peril.

THE agitation of the Amrita Bazar Patrika in behalf of Siddiq Hossain, the guiding genius in the Bhopal mal-administration, has ended in the following letter, dated Fort William, March 29, from the Secretary to the Government of India, in the Foreign Department, to Sir Lepel Griffin, K.C.S.I., Agent to the Governor-General in Central India:—

"I have laid before the Governor-General in Council the representations you have submitted regarding certain articles in the Amrita Bazar Patrika and other newspapers, which reflect upon measures recently taken in the Bhopal State.

2. You have recommended the criminal prosecution of these newspapers, both in the interests of the Government and on the more personal ground of defence of yourself. In the event of the Government not desiring to institute such proceedings, you ask that you may receive a public and official expression of confidence and approval from the Governor-General in Council. Your observations have been carefully considered, and I am now to communicate to you the following orders.

3. The Governor-General in Council is assured that the attitude of the Government in respect of Her Highness the Begum and her country needs no vindication against criticism which evinces a spirit of mere partizanship on behalf of an individual, and complete disregard for the people of Bhopal. The Governor-General in Council therefore holds that the interests of the Government would be in no way served by the institution of criminal proceedings against the newspapers containing the attacks to which you refer.

4. As far as you are personally concerned, it appears to His Excellency the Viceroy that you also can afford to treat these attacks with indifference. You have the satisfaction of knowing that the policy of the Government in Bhopal affairs was in great measure based upon your advice; that it has already succeeded in removing serious grievances, and introducing valuable reforms; that your action has been consistently supported by the Governor-General in Council; and further, that Her Majesty's Secretary of State has been pleased to express his sense of the vigour, judgment, and discretion you have displayed.

5. I am to add that you are at liberty to publish this letter."

FROM old, men have been in search for the philosopher's stone, and though many have suffered in the pursuit, the stone is yet non est. If baser metals cannot be changed into gold, experts are not wanting to reverse the process. Just now it is reported, in transmission through the post, from Peshawar to Kurrachee, 42 tolas of gold were transmuted to iron.

The Barwani correspondent of the Eastern Herald writes:—

"Megwal is one of the lowest castes among the Hindus of this side of India. They lead a wild and savage life. They maintain large herds of cows or she-buffaloes and sell their Ghee. They prefer to live in villages, where grass and fodder can be obtained in great abundance and at a low cost. At Sewai, a village in Rajpore Pergana, a boy of the above caste was put in prison by the Dewan of the State in a case which was brought against him by a wealthy person in the Holkar territory. His aged mother, a poor and helpless woman, sought to go to the Dewan and to bring her son's case into the notice of him. But as according to the strict order of the present Dewan no one is allowed to have a free access to him (which was neither the case with any of his predecessors nor is even with the Maha Rana of the State) except a certain number of men who are his favorites, so she was unheard; so much so, five months passed, she neither got access to the Dewan nor her son was tried. She was utterly disappointed to receive justice from the hands of the state, and patiently waited the arrival of the Political Agent. When the latter arrived here, she kindled two torches in the broad day-light and holding them in her hands went to the Bungalow of the Political Agent (as if to enlighten him in the dark and gloomy state of affairs) who asked her the cause of this extraordinary act and was sorry to learn that the poor sufferer remained in jail for five months without being tried. He took pity upon the poor mother and her son and at once ordered for his setting at liberty. Such are the ways in which justice is administered here. I will also mention hereafter how many persons fell victim to the new administration in similar manner. God may help us."

MR. E. G. COLVIN, Private Secretary to the Lieutenant-Governor, is Gazetted 3 months' leave from the 10th instant. Captain W. C. W. Rawlinson, Aide-de-Camp officiates as Private Secretary.

ON Wednesday week at 8 in the evening, the Port Commissioners made over to the Police an unclaimed tin box found at the Jugganath Ghat. It was covered over with gunny and carefully tied with rope. On examination, it was found to contain the dead body of a man with his legs doubled up, hands tied down and the head pressed in and securely tied. There was also a bottle of mixture prepared by R. Scott Thompson & Co., for the Superintendent of the Doveton Institution for Young Ladies. For once, the Police were equal to the occasion. The body was identified as that of a thatcher Sheik Hurri and three khansamas of the said Institution—Mehar Ali, Bhutto and Jorab—have been placed on their trial before the Chief Magistrate. The Coroner's Inquest charges these with culpable homicide. The medical evidence recorded runs thus:—

"Dr. Mackenzie, Police Surgeon, deposed to having, on the 5th instant, examined the body of a Native male adult, aged about 30 years, identified as that of the deceased, Sheik Harri. The body was well nourished, and I discovered abrasions on the left forearm, back of the right forearm, back of the right wrist, inner sides of the left and right knees, right cheek, right side of the face, left temple, and left shoulder. These abrasions may have been caused after death. There were also circular marks of a cord on the lower part of the neck, sides, and back. There were three abrasions on the lips, and the tongue was protruding between the teeth. In my opinion, deceased died of asphyxia, or suffocation due to strangulation. There were three cords round the neck of the deceased—one of jute, the other of hemp, and the third of cloth. The last was tied lightly round the neck, and was below the other cords, was passed over it from the back of the neck, and went on to the arms. The third cord was made of soft cloth, with two twists, afterwards doubled and twisted tightly round the lower part of the neck, tied at the back with a double knot."

We hope the police will unravel the whole mystery.

THE following appears in the Morning Post:—

"The following petition is about to be filed in the N.-W.-P. High Court, Matrimonial Jurisdiction:—Ellen Prinn, falsely called Ellen Hindhaugh, versus William Hindhaugh. The petition of Ellen Prinn, falsely called Ellen Hindhaugh, sheweth: That on the 30th day of December, 1871, your petitioner, then a spinster of 19 years of age, was married in fact (but illegally) to William Jackson Hindhaugh, then a widower of 18 years of age, at St. James' Church at Calcutta; that from the said 30th of December 1871, until the month of March, 1888, your petitioner lived and cohabited with the said William Jackson Hindhaugh at divers places in British India, and particularly at Sutna; that at the time of the performance of the said ceremony of marriage, the said William Jackson Hindhaugh was a widower, having previously on the 22nd day of December, 1868, married Mary Ann Prinn, who died previous to the performance of the said ceremony of marriage between your petitioner and the said respondent. That the said Mary Ann Prinn was the sister of your petitioner; that there is no collusion or connivance between your petitioner and the said William Jackson Hindhaugh with respect to the subject of this suit. Your petitioner therefore prays that this Hon. Court will be pleased to declare that the said marriage in fact (but illegally) executed as aforesaid between your petitioner and the said William Jackson Hindhaugh is null and void, and to decree that the said William Jackson Hindhaugh pay the costs of, and incident to, this suit, and that your petitioner have such other and further relief in the premises as to this Hon. Court may seem meet. I, Ellen Prinn, falsely called Ellen Hindhaugh, the petitioner named in the above petition, do declare that what is stated therein is true to the best of my information and belief."

UNLESS the Indian Mirror has been hoaxed—and our contemporary is so easy of faith as to assume everything on trust, even to religion, and it is nothing if not serious—by "a gentleman who was present at the Towry Hall on the occasion of the presentation of the farewell address to Lord Dufferin," our contemporary has made a notable discovery, namely, that the gathering at the Conversazione in honor of Lord Dufferin consisted chiefly of khits and barwarchus.

There was, no doubt, a necessary contingent of native waiters at table below, but they had no occasion to go upstairs where the party was held. We strongly suspect the Mirror's informant a khil or a chie who went on the chance of ticca employment and was disappointed and blackguarded the whole business to the ears congenial of the Mirror.

Next time we may hear that the party consisted of all Africans, there having been the West Indian volunteers in attendance.

CANON Knox-Little, in the course of an address before the members of the English Church Union at Oxford, inveighed against the moustache for men in holy orders. Speaking on the important functions and duties of the sacred office, he said:—'I have lately seen a number of moustached clergymen, who reminded me of second-hand cavalry officers. I admire a cavalry officer, and I admire a priest, but I do not like a cross between them.' Thereupon 'A moustached Clergyman,' retorts in the Standard:—

"I have lately seen a number of clean-shaven clergymen, who reminded me of women. I admire a woman, and I admire a clergyman, but do not like a cross between them."

On this the Roman Catholic Rock remarks—

"For our part, we utterly fail to discern what influence—mischievous or otherwise—the natural growth of hair on a man's face can have on an earnest life in the service of God."

The ladies know better. The same innocent continues—

"In becoming ministers of Christ nothing could be more contrary to the spirit of His teaching or more opposed to common sense than for clergymen to cease to be men."

What then is the meaning of the celibacy of the priesthood?

SOME sensation was caused in town on Thursday by the total collapse of the house No. 11 Kyd Street adjoining the Roberts' Memorial College. That building was a three-storied one, and was under repairs. Workmen were at work, and other persons were living there at the time. The Police were at work on receipt of the notice. Their act of succour commenced with the pulling down of the east boundary wall which alone withstood the general fall. Some bodies were discovered wounded and dead, and the place is still a large heap of ruins, maybe covering yet undiscovered unfortunates. The Coroner's Inquest is anxiously looked to for the cause of this disaster.

ACCORDING to Sir Evelyn Baring, the finances of Egypt are very reassuring. There was financial equilibrium in the past year. The prospects of the present are more encouraging.

IT is reported that a few days ago an attempt was made on the life of Sardar Nur Muhammad Khan, the Governor of Kandahar. It appears that a shot was fired at him from a distance while he was riding. It missed him, but killed his camel. The offender has not been discovered, but it is believed that he was a soldier of the Hazari Regiment now stationed at Kandahar.

Some particulars have been received of the recent attack on the Kashmir fort of Numal, to the north of Gilgit, by the Rajas of Hunza and Nagar. The latter ejected the Kashmir picket from the post of Chaprol in January last, and entered into negotiations with the Gilgit authorities with a view to being allowed to retain peaceable possession. The negotiations breaking down, the tribesmen, over 2,000 in numbers, advanced on Numal, about half way between Chaprol and Gilgit. Numal had meanwhile been reinforced, and was able to stand a siege. On the 17th March, the garrison made a sortie headed by Colonel Makhani Singh. They succeeded in driving off the attacking party, but the Kashmiri Colonel and eleven men were killed and several wounded. The tribesmen are said to have lost heavily. Fresh reinforcements have now reached Numal, but no attempt has yet been made to re-occupy Chaprol, which is still in the hands of the Hunza and Nagar people. 1,000 Regulars and 500 Militia are being sent up from Srinagar.

Holloway's Pills.—Enfeebled existence.—This medicine embraces every attribute required in a general and domestic remedy. It overturns the foundations of disease laid by defective food and impure air. In obstructions or congestions of the liver, lungs, bowels, or any other organs, these Pills are especially serviceable and eminently successful. They should be kept in readiness in every family, being a medicine of incomparable utility for young persons, especially those of feeble constitutions. They never cause pain or irritate the most sensitive nerves or most tender bowels. Holloway's Pills are the best known purifiers of the blood, the most active promoters of absorption and secretion, whereby all poisonous and obnoxious particles are removed from both solids and fluids.

NOTES AND LEADERETTES.

MRS. ANNA KINGFORD, M. D., the vegetarian propagandist, has died at the age of 42—no victim, we hope, to her diet.

IN Mr. J. Gotter Morison, London literary society has lost one of its lights. He was probably the best writer in the Positivist camp, which contains such masters as Frederic Harrison.

WE can well believe that a great sensation has been caused among the Jains of Lucknow by the refusal of Mr. Wells, the City Magistrate, to allow their "Rath" procession to pass through the Chowk. According to Mr. Wells, there is not the slightest reason why the procession should be allowed to proceed through the Chowk to the annoyance and exasperation of the Hindus. The Jain cause in the city has been defended with considerable spirit, in the columns of the local Express. The writer says:—

"The first principle of Jainism is to propagate its truths and teachings. As soon as a person reaches the Jain ideal of salvation, it becomes his duty to preach the truths he has embraced. Now, Sir, this propagation is effected by means of processions in which the Idol is carried and the earnestness of its worshippers displayed. Publicity is thus given to the existence of Jainism and the zeal of its adherents. The Chowk being the most populous part of the city it is therefore the most fitting place for public processions of this sort."

This is probably the first time, after many, many centuries, that the Jains, who have occupied in India the position of the Jews in Europe, have held such language. Scorned and repressed by Hindu and Moslem alike, they were glad enough to be let alone, even with a slap if necessary. Now at length they feel that they can take up a loftier attitude. It is not enough that they can worship according to their faith unmolested—they must preach too and extend their religion if possible. This is a new development, but a legitimate change effected by the present regime. We cannot blame the Jains. In fact, they feel that they are British subjects. But this very progress introduces a new complication and makes administration more than ever difficult.

The champion goes into more specific detail:—

"Because the liberty now asked for has been extended to members of other religious communities. The Tazias were allowed to proceed in spite of all the opposition of the Hindus. The 'Ramlilas' were held and their processions carried when the Mahomedans bitterly complained and even fought against it. The Jains only ask for that religious toleration which has been granted to both Hindus and Mahomedans. They always manifest toleration towards other religions and it is only fair that a similar spirit be shewn towards them."

It is not easy to decide between the pretensions of rival sects. At any rate, Mr. Wells has lately had the rare opportunity of personal conference on the subject with both the provincial Governor and the Governor-General.

AT call of the Sheriff on a largely signed Requisition, the rate-payers met in force yesterday at the Town Hall, to express their dissatisfaction at the treatment of the Municipal Bill at the hands of the local Legislature. It was not only a large but also a respectable gathering. Thanks to the example of firmness of the late Dufferin Demonstrators, the School Boy nuisance at public meetings has abated. If the boys were not excluded, their seats were more distantly arranged, the front chairs being reserved for their elders and seniors. The meeting was illgot up, but orderly and well conducted. The audience was all attentive without visible signs of impatience at either the inaudibility or the active dullness of the speakers. The earnestness of the meeting may be gathered from the fact, that it stood the heat of the sun and the gas for three mortal hours. It was essentially a native meeting, but not of Baboos only. There were Mahomedans and Armenians. The Europeans were conspicuous by their absence. Almost all the principal native families were represented. The Chair was taken by Maharaja Narendra Krishna. We give the Resolutions below.

I. That this Meeting desires to place on record the sense of its regret at the disregard of public opinion which has hitherto marked the progress of the Calcutta Municipal Bill through the Bengal Legislative Council, and earnestly prays that His Honor the President in Council will be pleased to allow the reconsideration of the sections already passed by the Council.

Proposed by Prince Ferrok Shah.

Seconded by Coomar Devendra Mullick and supported by Baboo Surendra Nath Banerjee.

II. That in the absence of any proper enquiry as to the results likely to ensue from the proposed amalgamation and without new sources of income, this Meeting apprehends that the scheme will prove injurious both to the Town and the Suburbs, and that the Government having been pledged to the scheme on condition only of certain inconsiderable items of revenue including the duty on petroleum being made over to the new Corporation to fulfil the purpose thereof, this Meeting desires to protest against the project which without a very considerable addition of revenue will fail to fulfil the important sanitary ends in view and is likely to saddle the Town and the Suburbs with additional taxation.

Proposed by Mr. J. G. Apar.

Seconded by Baboo Ashutosh Biswas.

III. That having regard to the success of the elective system in the Calcutta Municipality, this Meeting is of opinion that the time has come when a further extension of the same principle may with advantage be made and the proportion of Commissioners elected by the wards raised from two-thirds to three-fourths of the entire body of Commissioners.

Proposed by Raja Poorna Chunder Singh.

Seconded by Mr. Braunfield.

IV. That having regard to the success of non-official chairmen in Moffusil Municipalities and the further extension of this principle by the recent orders of the Bengal Government, this Meeting is of opinion that the Municipality of the first city in India may be allowed the right to nominate its own chairman under such restrictions and safe-guards as the Government may choose to impose including the power of vetoing any obviously improper election.

Proposed by Kumar Benoykrishna.

Seconded by Baboo Kalyacharn Banerjee.

V. That this Meeting views with alarm the changes which have been introduced into the section relating to the control to be exercised by Government, investing the Government with undefined and unlimited powers over the Corporation and empowering it upon mere complaint without enquiry by a regularly constituted Commission as at present, or giving an opportunity to defend its proceedings, to direct the Corporation to undertake works which the Government may think necessary and for which the expenses will have to be met out of Municipal funds.

Proposed by Mr. M. P. Gaspar.

Seconded by Baboo Gonesh Chundra Chundra, and supported by Khan Bahadoor Serajul Islam.

VI. That this Meeting views with alarm some of the changes which have been introduced into the Bill which mark an important departure from the principles of the existing law, and while referring for a fuller exposition of them to the Memorial, the Meeting will beg leave to protest against the following innovations amongst others as being dangerous in their character and likely to be attended with serious hardship:—

(1) Section 122 which imposes a five per cent. rate estimated upon the cost of dwelling-houses.

(2) Building regulations which invest the executive of the Corporation with power to refuse or permit the erection of buildings.

(3) Regulations relating to huts which will entail grievous hardship upon owners.

(4) Sanitary sections which will invest the executive with extensive powers to declare buildings to be overcrowded or unfit for habitation and to remove persons to hospital without their consent.

(5) The provisions under which it is proposed to reduce the size of the ferrule for the supply of water.

Proposed by Baboo Jodoolal Mullick.

Seconded by Baboo Amrita Nath Mitter.

VII. That the following Memorial be adopted and that the gentlemen named below (list is omitted here) be appointed to wait in deputation upon His Honor the Lieutenant-Governor with the Memorial.

Proposed by Baboo Saligram.

Seconded by Mr. R. D. Mehta.

The weakness of the demonstration lay in having anything to do with discredited political agitators. The two Europeans who took part gave something worth listening to. Indeed, Mr. Braunfield was particularly lively. Coomar Devendra is always sensible. Baboo Jodoo Lal, with his penchant for personalities, made a good point against the proposition to assess house property according to cost, finishing with describing Sir Henry Harrison as the Aurungzebe of civic Government. With this exception, the native speakers were all bores, great and small, new and old. The Bauerjee was egotistical and interminable. Baboo Kali Charan expended his whole force on "your distinguished representative in Council" the Hon'ble Kally Nath Mitter. No one had a word for poor Dr. Gurudas, who has led the opposition in the Legislature. Nor were the parts happily allotted. Surely, more experienced men ought to have moved the important propositions demanding the extension of the elective element and the concession of an elected chairman. The very Resolutions were loosely worded and hurriedly strung together. These are, besides, too many of them for any useful purpose or effect.

Making every allowance, however, the importance of the meeting cannot be gainsaid. It was a real representation of the town, and the Government and the Legislature will not be wise in disregarding it, so far at least as the practical grievances are concerned.

The protest comes too late, it may be said. Some of the clauses objected to have already been considered and passed. But the Council itself has not been regular in its treatment of the Bill.

WITH the new year, the Calcutta Police has developed new powers of interference and petty and irksome sources of revenue. As if higher offences need no vigilance of the Police, miscellaneous offences outside the Penal Code, those under the Police and other Acts, now engage the minute attention of the Constabulary Force. Special returns have to be submitted for arrests under the Police, Hackney Carriage and other Acts, and prosecutions made before proper tribunals. If the course is extremely irritating to Her Majesty's peaceful subjects, it is welcome to the authorities for the revenue it promises. We are afraid the Police exceed their authority in making arrests under the Hackney Carriage Act. Not only carriages with their fare are marched off to the Police Station, but there the necessary enquiries are made and entered in the books and the excess passengers told to find their own way. The outrage is completed when the occupants of the Zenana happen to be such victims. Many of the Police officers, we may be sure, feel the enormity of the proceeding, but they are bound by orders to do this violence to native feeling and honor. It is curious that while the Imperial Legislature has secured the women of India freedom from arrest for the civil jail, it should be necessary to humiliate them in other ways. If the object is to enforce the license, the drivers may be prosecuted for breach of the law without inconveniencing or humiliating the passengers. Loaded carts are, we believe, saved from arrest under the Municipal Act. Is human freight less worthy of reverence? We hope Mr. Lambert will slacken his zeal, at least as regards the Zenana fare. Of course, if the new policy is to raise a revenue, our cry will be in vain. But surely Government, after undertaking to find the cost of the Police, and agreeing to divert the Police rate to sanitary purposes, should not descend to these low tricks for raising the wind.

COOCH BEHAR has come back to India and gone home to Cooch Behar itself. A number of native gentlemen, mostly Brahmos, were present at the Howrah Railway station to welcome him back from his exhausting European tour. They were well punished for their officiousness. The Maharaja was busy with his portmanteaus, unmindful of the presence of those who had forced themselves on him to do him honor. Poor Raja Peary Mohan Mookerjee, who had come all the way from Uttarpara for the purpose, realised to his cost the difference between an English nobleman as Viceroy and an Indian Raja with European polish. The Maharaja walked up and down the platform dreamily, unconscious of his votaries. By dint of effort of a handful of a Dewan Kalikadas Dutt, Raja Mookerjee was barely recognised. Nawab Abdool Luteef saved himself by his own address. The rest were nowhere. In the face of this, some of the morning papers published a false account of the landing in which the Maharaja is represented as shaking every one cordially by the hand and speaking with all who had taken the trouble to come and receive him. The gathering at Scaldah to receive the Bara Thakur of Tipperah, was more numerous and influential, while the conduct of that Prince—a mere boy—sent back every one pleased. The eldest son of his deceased father-in-law welcomed the Maharaja with an Evening Party in his honor. Notwithstanding the scene on the railway station, it was well attended. The Maharaja came between his European leaders whose presence seems to check his soul. In spite of the adverse element, some of His Highness' well-wishers, towards the end, drew the Maharaja and the remaining native guests together, and the Prince had begun to be agreeable, when the whole prospect was marred by the unfortunate presence of the Mahatma of the Mirror. This gentleman introduced into the company his wild manners and his rabid politics. He bullied the late Keshub Chunder Sen's younger brother—the most intellectual Sen now living, and as modest as he is capable—for the moderation of his views, and even catechised the Maharaja as to what he thought of Lord Dufferin and the demonstrations in the Viceroy's honor. A wild boar introduced into that party could not have disturbed it more than this patent bore. The Maharaja then left for his own territory. If the official or officious account in the Calcutta papers is to be believed, Cooch Behar was all welcome. The people there seem still to retain their old love for their Maharaja, and they received Nripendra Naryan Bhoop with all enthusiasm and loud jubilation.

There was a Durbar. It was held at the new hall erected for the purpose. In honor of the occasion, it is said revenue of a lac of rupees was remitted, rent-free lands granted to 73 Brahmins, life-scholarships founded for 8 Brahmins, nine prisoners released, and titles conferred.

There were other entertainments—a State Evening Party and what else we are not told. The Maharaja summers at Darjeeling.

WE sincerely regret that so promising a journal as the new Advocate of Lucknow should have so early in its career so deeply committed itself. We have watched with keen personal interest the development of this paper, and we have derived no ordinary pleasure in seeing it improve so wonderfully within so short a time. It is already a power in the land, and it deserves to be for its sterling merit. It is written with a mature ability which has most agreeably surprised us. What a pity that, under a mistaken sense of duty, it should have ranged itself on the side of the Irreconcilables! It is rather fond of the hackneyed Latin exclamation O tempora! O mores! Times and manners are indeed changed when the approach of the Viceroy to its city did not impose some decent restriction on the expression of unpleasant opinion—to say nothing of grace where all is gracelessness itself. It is not many years since Lucknow was the capital of an Oriental despotism: the memory of that day must still be alive there. These publicists no doubt show their appreciation of the privilege of British subjects. They might at least remember that the Viceroy of India has some share in the maintenance of that boon. Above all, they should never forget that for us, at any rate, the glorious Liberty of the Press is an indulgence.

The only reassuring reflection is that the Advocate is in the beginning of its journey and will learn better manners as it proceeds.

THE Governor-General in Council has conferred on the eldest of the surviving sons of His late Majesty Wajid Ali Shah of Oudh the headship of the family. We give in parallel columns the allowances drawn by the members of the family during his Majesty's life time and the pensions now fixed on them.

MR. ROBERT TURNBULL is the luckiest man going. Even superior merit does not often meet with such a measure of reward all round as friend "Bobby" has achieved. He has served many masters, through many years, without an angry word. In fact, he has performed the impossible feat of pleasing everybody—Hindu, Mahomedan, Jain, Jew, Parsee, Armenian, Greek, English, Scotch, Irish, French, or German. No wonder he has had the unique fortune to obtain a pension above the rate of his pay. No less wonderful, he, a mere Secretary to the Municipality, has had a public memorial voted him—an honor denied to any member or even head of the Corporation. And last not least, he has had his portrait for the Town Hall painted by no less an artist than Mr. J. Archer.

The other day we paid a visit to Mr. Archer's studio after the work was finished, and we were fairly astonished at the result. The portrait is flattering no doubt; professional art, even the more mechanical art of photography, must, as a condition of existence, be flattering, and monumental art has need to be flattering where the subject is not adequately blessed by Nature; but it is the flattery of genius. It does not overlay the characteristic expression: it only takes that expression at its best. You recognise your Bobby at once. Not the every-day Bobby who seems to scowl on you for all his bonhomie, but Bobby fresh and blooming and when most charming. How the artist manages to preserve the identity of his subject is a wonder. It is the privilege of genius. Herein lies all the difference between good painters and better painters.

THE Archers leave town to-morrow morning en route to the South. They will summer at Ootacamund till the end of June. Next month they repair to Poona, whence they go to Bombay to pass the next cold weather. We hope they will be called back to Calcutta, if only to paint the great portrait of Lady Dufferin for the Town Hall, which has lately been voted in public meeting. The presence of Mr. Archer is very opportune in the public interest. Such a commission ought not to be given to an inferior local artist. Neither ought it to be denied to a great artist who happens to be on the spot. Such a refusal not only involves an unmerited slur but also is detrimental to the cause of art in the country. It is a prohibition to artists of repute to come to the East. Mr. Archer has already painted Lady Dufferin so well that he may be expected to do even better.

THE triumph of administration of criminal justice of the Government of India during the year, has just been achieved at Mhow. It consists in the execution of not simply firm but relentless justice on an old offender. It was a grand criminal that the Government has brought to book. But though his greatness, at once in age, in race and in person, was obvious, he was scarcely great enough for all the ado of the great Government of India. For many good people presume to doubt whether he had a soul to be damned, though certainly he had enough body to receive the simultaneous kick of dozens of men. In fact, his bulk must have embarrassed a good deal our all-knowing Bureaucracy. Nay, it led to a distinct departure in the practice of criminal judicature. The law lays down hanging by the neck till death takes place, as the sole mode of executing capital punishment throughout the Empire. But the great Government could not undertake the responsibility of hanging the great prisoner. He was too great for being despatched in that petty undignified way. There were no gallows to match: there was no hangman to put the noose round the convict's neck: a syndicate of all the Calcrafts in the land would have been unequal to the work. It would have been necessary to import a hangman from Brobdingnag or to pray to almighty God for a special giant of the craft—of the Calcrafts, to carry out the sentence. The local officers could but report the difficulty and await orders. The Government proceeded in its usual thorough-going way, calling for help upon its advisers, legal and illegal. We do not know what escape the ingenious Advocate-General, who lately muzzled a huge mammal of the Civil Service become must from a threatened latrine, proposed. Be that as it may, the Government referred points and received suggestions and then minuted and minuted, till it realised the necessity of the situation, and finally resolved to keep the ordinary practice in abeyance, and ordered accordingly. And, accordingly, the venerable, if not venerated, prisoner was executed by shooting.

The prisoner was an old servant of Government in the Army, in the Transport Department. He had done good service in his day, and had every reason to expect to pass what little span of life remained to him in peace and comfort, at the bounty of a grateful Government. He had fully earned his right to a liberal special pension. He might be regarded as one of the pillars of the Empire, having borne on his Atlantean shoulders the weight of many camps and carried endless equipage and furniture and provisions. He was certainly one of the band of heroes who extended British sway in Northern and Central India, having shared the brunt of war with Lake and Combermere. If now, when he had descended into the vale of years, he showed some senile freaks, he might well hope for consideration for his grey hairs and his past services. But herein Government is too machine-like, exacting and uniform in action. The hero of Army Transport has been in a rather chronic state of must, and he had had the ill luck, under this influence, to kill a man at Poona, about two years ago. He might still have received fair play, had his civil and military neighbours been more manly. Unfortunately for him, the humans about him proved poltroons, and of course ungenerous foes. They were terribly alarmed at the proximity of the veteran quadruped. Hence the complaint to the Viceroy and the order for his execution. The poor fellow has been very harshly treated. There was no pretence for taking his life. Neither law nor equity cried for his blood, seeing that he was not in his senses. The utmost that the safety of the public required, was to restrict his liberty. But there was no counsel to plead the prisoner's cause. The whole proceeding was ex parte. And there was no good Vaishnav nor Buddhist in the Government to put in a word for him or warn his colleagues against the consequences of useless slaughter.

So firm were our great functionaries in their evil resolve, that they would grant no reprieve. The Maharaja Holkar and the Maharaja of Rutlam, like good Hindu princes, offered to save the great veteran at any cost, but to no purpose. The Government of India was determined to execute vengeance on the mad murderous brute. And so he was shot in great state.

THE MORBHANJ STATE :

A TYPICAL CASE.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Englishman, who has been eating the Raj's sheep and chicken and eggs and drinking its wines at the table of Manager H. P. Wylly or Engineer Morrow, is repaying the obligation by praising the European servants at the expense of the former native management of Morbhanj, the chief of the Tributary Mahals of Orissa. He is quite right in saying that there are few places in India less known even by name, than Baripada, the capital of this semi-independent state, a city of no antiquity on the left bank of the Burabalung—a small hill stream—some 32 miles North-West of Balasore :—

"The town contains a most imposing Raj Bari, the residence of the Raja's family, numerous temples on a grand scale, two splendid tanks, and an immense lake constructed by the present Manager, a circuit house, cutchery, record offices, jail, school, hospital, and several new pukka shops in the main street. Five years ago, I am told, there was only one miserable little shop in the whole town, which now possesses a Municipality that does its work thoroughly and well, Baripada being the brightest and cleanest little native town I have ever seen in India. When it is considered that there are only two European gentlemen in the place, namely, the Manager, Mr. H. P. Wylly, and his Engineer, Mr. Morrow, this speaks volumes."

Yes, "volumes" in all directions. A single European introduced for the first time into a Hindu town, necessarily causes many changes in it. Strange articles and unknown luxuries make their appearance. Food that no Mussulman will touch and food that no Hindu can contemplate without horror, has to be provided for the new ogre. Coarse thick stuffs, more fit for covering floors than for human wear, make their entry and debase the people's taste. Of course, the Saheb wants one or more native tailor trained in a peculiar school. The stiff-limbed stranger can not squat on the floor, and so furniture on stands are in requisition for him to sit upon. Silver plate is too costly and native brass or bell metal is too nasty for him to eat off. Hence frail crockery and glass-ware and earthen-ware of all kinds. One queer piece of furniture combing wood-work and earthenware is introduced which puzzles the wisest heads in the Raj. And well that it is so, for every porter or coolie or beggar in the State would flee from its neighbourhood directly its use was discovered. As he requires special tailors and special valets, so he wants special cooks and scullions and waiters and special nightmen. Accordingly, the scum of the native population of our great cities and stations, who serve Europeans in menial capacities, are established in the heart of the Indian Arcadia. So much is necessary for the comfort of a single Saheb, with or without the complement of a Saheeb. A colony usually follows him, and a town starts up wherever he is settled. At Baripada, we see there are a couple of such fixtures, with families perhaps into the bargain. What wonder that a market should have sprung up where five years ago none existed! Besides, one lucky man draws another. Wylly wanted a companion as much as the state required an Engineer, and so the Morrow of progress dawned upon Morbhanj. Between them, the two made themselves comfortable—making roads for their drive, improving the health of their neighbourhood and the prospect around, and opening the way to the woods for hunting, and so on. By the earliest opportunity, they were bound to repay their patrons by inviting them to shoot and enjoy themselves at the expense of the Raj. Here is another great step in civilization. More houses are required and more furniture and stores and provisions than ever, and altogether a grand stimulus is given to trade and activity in general. We are not old fogeys enough to see no improving element in all this. All, however, is not gold that glitters. And our taste for such good as we recognise, is sadly spoiled by our sense of the cost.

A native population in the heart of the backwoods, does not require a great dry goods mart or a row of shops of European articles. There are not even many public handicraftsmen, artisans and artists at a native capital, for the simple fact that the Raj keeps these in pay, and the whole country derives the benefit of maintaining them. The people, when they really wait, get their service for nothing or for a trifle. Native ways are not all charming, but they have their special recommendations. They are, beyond question, eminently suited to the people. Hence the anomaly of native weariness under the improving Briton.

It is amusing to see the airs assumed by our British engineers and officers after laying out a few streets or erecting a few trumpery bungalows. If the natives are so worthless, who built the great Indian cities? who have filled the country with structures which stand after centuries to inspire the wonder of beholders? Even in Orissa, Bhubaneswar and the rock caves and the sun obelisk attest the constructive genius of the natives. In Morbhanj itself, who built the imposing Rajbari?

Nor is that all. In the following passage, our contemporary's correspondent gives passing testimony to the merits of native rule :—

"Baripada is approached from the north by the Midnapur Road, a nicely kept and picturesque highway made by the late Maharaja, from the south by the Balasore Road, equally picturesque and also constructed by the late Maharaja. Within the last three or four years the Manager has also constructed a fine road, partly over the mountains from Baripada to Bamungatti, one of the largest towns in the north-west of Morbhanj. These roads, metalled with laterite, are all in splendid repair, and cross the most beautiful young sal forests, which are now being carefully preserved by the State."

That evidence is all the more valuable that it comes from a writer pledged to support the present European management. After that, we may well ask Government to reconsider its policy in pitchforking prologés of its own kith and kin on an unoffending native state. Why should the indigenous administration be superseded? Morbhanj under his late Maharaja was a model of a well-governed Indian principality. After his death, things were done under British authority or in the British name for which Britons must ever blush. The crowning iniquity was to deprive the State of its own management. And now here, as in Cooch Behar, the young Chief is being carefully educated so as to acquiesce in the wrong and to continue to leave it in the hands of strangers. This, indeed, is Progress—with a vengeance!

HYDERABAD.

THE accession of Mr. Arthur Howell to the Residential Musnud of Hyderabad, is an event of good augury. The change is opportune. A change had long been required, but a Civil Servant, even when found wanting, is not easily displaced. All power had however passed out of the Residency. The Residency will now be itself, at any rate. Mr. Howell is as good a scholar as his predecessor.

but he comes with an unsullied reputation, public and private. Let not our native friends take fright at the name. Mr. Howell was not the famous Britannicus of the Englishman. He was in the Home Secretariat of Lord Lawrence, whose kindness for the masses he shared, but was unaccountably shelved in Central India. He now emerges to achieve the fame his talents are capable of securing. It is a difficult sphere to which he has been called, and perhaps it may somewhat help him if we pass in rapid review the more prominent personalities with which he will come in contact.

Hyderabad politics can be likened to nothing so much as to a "duleelah" a kootni—who has a different face for different people and always entices the novice and new-comer to his destruction. Few can resist her blandishments or escape from her meshes. Europeans and Natives alike she can count among her victims. Many a Resident has lost his head and his reputation.

To descend to particulars. Colonel Marshall was prime favorite with duleelah for a few months—but, like the rest of them, his days of power are over. He is a good man—one of the very few Englishmen really capable of assimilating with the people of the place and understanding its ways. But he made the mistake of beginning his career with a contempt for the intriguers of Hyderabad and an overweening confidence in himself, and the result is that these despised intriguers have cooked his goose for him as nearly as possible. If his position were not so strong as it is, they would have finished him by this time.

There is only one man who has kept his head cool throughout and risen superior to every emergency, removing obstacles, overcoming intrigue with superior intrigue, cunning with greater cunning, and getting the better of friends and enemies alike—and that man is Mr. Madhi Ali (Nawab Mohsin-ul-Mulk Bahadur) the cleverest man by far and the astutest. His personal ambition is absorbing. He would sacrifice anything or anybody to his ambition—whether it is a friend who is in the way or any state or national interest—it is just the same to him—down goes he or it as the case may be, and our friend is seen next moment standing by the corpse of his victim, with one of his bland smiles on his face as if nothing had happened, and as if he had just put the finishing stroke to one of the most righteous pieces of work.

His secret ambition is to be some day Minister of the place, and he has already paved two-thirds, if not three-fourths, of the way to it.

The present Minister is the best man that could have been selected for the place on the spot. He is slow, but he is firm and not easily intimidated. He is thoroughly loyal to his master and is free from the slightest taint or tinge of personal aims. He is a cautious man and is rather strong in the organ by which many of his birth and position are reputed to be led. He is very careful in money matters—rather suspicious of character—a distinct advantage in a place like Hyderabad. His administration has so far been successful—there has been no contretemps of the kind that were rife under the régime of his predecessor. His Highness trusts and honors him, and the Imperial Government have just emphasised their sense of the last fact and at the same time marked their approbation of the man himself by Knighting him. He is very conservative which is a distinct advantage, as the late régime, which was really Mahdi Ali's, gave Hyderabad no rest, so many and quick-succeeding were the changes that were made. There is rest now at last, and we hope there shall be no more changes for sometime to come. Even changes for the better are sometimes harrassing.

PRE-BRITISH INDIA.

BABER.

THERE is, perhaps, no period in the history of India which is more interesting than the period occupied by the reign of the House of Timour, miscalled, both in India and by foreigners, the Mogul dynasty, for no one had a greater aversion for the Moguls than Baber, the founder of the empire which this race of princes built up in India, though it is true his mother was a Mogul, the daughter of a Mogul prince of some eminence. The empire the princes of this House built up, was great, and India rose to the highest pitch of prosperity during the rule of succeeding Kings of this line. The pinnacle of prosperity and fame was attained under the wise and able rule of the great Akbar—while the marvellous wealth and magnificence of pre-British India was displayed under Shah Jehan.

India is fittingly called the jewel in the Crown of Britain, but alas! it is a jewel much of whose lustre has been dimmed. Yet India is reviving after a lethargic period. The quickening process has begun. She is manifesting life-movements from one end of her great continent to the other. India possibly will yet arise, and her glory be more resplendent. Her new glory, however, will be distinct from her former glory. Barbaric pomp and splendour will have no part or lot in her future greatness. Her people's eyes are opening to what constitutes true glory and greatness; they are awakening out of a lengthened sleep; they are stretching forth their hands towards the light—ethical and intellectual light—such light as brings out the characteristics of a high state of civilisation—that moral curb over the promptings and impulses of the natural heart.

The civilisation of the East must always differ from that of the West, though the basis of both be laid on the same foundation. Eastern civilisation must always be more soft and silken than that of the West. The Eastern peoples are so fearful of giving offence; so anxiously polite; so desirous of avoiding wounding the susceptibilities of others, that their civilisation, though a facsimile of that of Europe, must always abound in more of society shams—more of social fibs. The rugged vein running through English civilisation, when copied in their manners by the youth of India, more especially Young Bengal, does not show well. It is a manifest aping.

When will this day of India's future glory dawn? The young men, the men in their prime, and the old men, may help to hasten it, by patient and faithful service rendered in their day and generation—by setting themselves laboriously to study the true meaning of patriotism. This much-abused expression should be studied in the light of the history, past and present, of the nations of the earth. Patriotism studied under such a light, will doubtless cause the head of many a blatant Indian youth to be bowed in shame and self-contrition. The men of to-day may help forward the aspirations of India, but neither the youth, nor the strong man, nor the aged, of this day, will ever see the revived glory of India. They must be gathered to their fathers, yea, and some generations after them must come and go before that eventful time. Nations are not born to the highest moral freedom in a day. Stages of transition are always slow. It seems to be fundamental law of the Divine Ruler of the earth, that storms precede calm; and the more forcible the storm, the deeper the thick darkness, the more still will be the after calm, and the more brilliant the light. That man is perfected by suffering, is a law of the Creator. The beneficence of this law can only be learnt from experience. Nations as well as individuals are benefitted and strengthened by the fiery trial of afflictions. Sorrow and suffering must be the germ of joy. The mourners are the only ones who can be comforted.

The searchers after truth often bow the head through manifold mistakes—they sometimes take tinsel for gold, and a glittering glass for a gem—but it is only these bowed and humiliated ones who can understand the full joy of triumph. The sons and daughters of India must seek after truth—the nation's greatest good. They must seek with bowed heads and humble hearts, and then the harvest they reap will be rich and full. Stump oratory, and the machinery and wiles for gathering an aimless, witless crowd, for pseudo political purposes, must be relegated to limbo. These are childish toys. Let the men of India say in the spirit of the words of the Apostle of the Gentiles—"When we were children, we spoke as children, we acted as children, we loved childish things; but now that we have become men, we must put away the things that would be seemly for children. "Only those are crowned and sainted who with grief have been acquainted." It is such acquaintance that not only makes nations noble but free.

II.

The life of Baber, the first prince of this line, reads like romance, so full it is of surprising vicissitudes and remarkable adventures, and recalls the history of the life of Scottish Bruce, whom he resembled in tenacity of purpose and the happy constitution of hopefulness, and being unable to give to despair, even during the darkest moments of his life. A most singular man was this Baber, as we gather from his Memoirs. Baber has written his life in so simple and frank a manner, so honest is he in the disclosures he makes, that the reader closes the perusal with the impression, that this Baber must have possessed a most manly spirit, and a mind remarkably free from affectation and the pride of a high station in life.

These Memoirs, like a looking glass, reflect faithfully the character of the man, and also acquaint us with the manner of life of a great Tartar monarch. Baber is shown to us as a man of a remarkable easy and sociable temper, which his great trials could not alter, nor the subsequent possession of power and grandeur diminish. Baber was gifted with remarkable sensibility, and was by imagination a poet. His refined taste prevented him falling a victim to the gross vices which disfigured Moslem rulers and great men of those days. Baber had a keen and appreciative love for nature. Possessed of a kind and affectionate heart, he loved with a strong and abiding love. The friends of the poor and unfortunate Baber, were still the friends of the conqueror of Hindostan.

To his relatives he was ever indulgent and kind, especially so to the ladies of his family. His mother he loved with a reverent affection, and ever deprived himself to secure her ease and comfort. In these Memoirs, he speaks so simply of his love and affectionate interest in his mother and female relatives, that we recall Baber as a boy, or as a youth, and forget that it is the life-story of a bold and brave warrior and a great King.

In these Memoirs, we also see how unselfishly Baber placed his friends on a level with himself. He records the most minute incidents of their lives. Their illness, their accidents, their successes, their adventures, their disappointments, their failures, are all jotted down in a kindly way. Baber even shows his interest in them by noting their jokes and eccentricities. The book shows the writer to be of such a tender and loving disposition, that we are not surprised when we read the confession, which tells us, that he wept for the playmate of his boyhood when he heard of his death. In a letter to a confidential friend, this passage occurs—"They very recently brought me a single musk-melon: while cutting it up, I felt myself affected with a strong feeling of loneliness, and a sense of my exile from my native country, and I could not help shedding tears while I was eating it." The musk-melon was not indigenous to India at this period. We owe the musk-melon to Cabul. To this very friend he writes on another occasion with great freedom, relating little anecdotes of their common acquaintances, which he thinks will please him. He winds up the letter with, "for God's sake excuse all these fooleries and do not think the worse of me for them."

Unfortunately for himself, Baber was at one time a great wine-bibber, and there is reason to believe that his indulgence in wine tended to shorten his days. The deep drinking of wine was a popular habit with most of the great Mussulmans of the time, I mean, of course, the Mussulmans with whom India has been acquainted. "In these Memoirs of his many a drinking party is recorded with as much interest, as his negotiations or his battles; and unsuitable as they are to his station, they are not the least agreeable scenes in Baber's history. The perfect ease and familiarity among the company makes one forget the prince in the man; and the temptations that generally led to such excesses; a shady wood, a hill with a fine prospect, or the idleness of a boat floating down the river—together with the amusements with which they are accompanied—recitations in Turki or Persian, extempore verses, with sometimes a song, and often a contest of repartee, take away all coarseness that may attach to such scenes of dissipation." In after years, Baber, as we shall see, relinquished the use of wine, and advised his friends to do so also; to one friend to whom he was particularly attached, he wrote persuading him to give up this habit and to follow his example. The argument he uses is quaint. "Drinking was a very pleasant thing with our old friends and companions; but now since you have only Sheir Ahmed and Haidar Kuli to take your wine with it can be no great sacrifice to leave it off." Besides his Memoirs, Baber, it is stated, took high rank among the poets of his country; his Persian poems and collection of Turki compositions are remarkably elegant.

JAMES H. LINTON.

MNEMONIC BRITISH HISTORY.*

The Barat Press has issued, in a neat little well-printed pamphlet of 70 pages, a synopsis of the leading events in British history from the Roman Period down to Her Majesty's Jubilee. Although a school-book, it is obviously distinguished by execution from the literature of that description which now issues in shoals from the Indian press. Some of our native school-book-makers are not bad hands at compiling and digesting information, while the majority simply crib from different English sources. But they all discover themselves in their own part of the work. The very title is often faulty. If they somehow get over that, their pretensions are usually wrecked on the preface, let it consist of ever so few words. This little brochure shows a scholarly hand in the preface. In it Miss Allen explains that the present work is her second effort towards supplying the deficiencies of Mrs. Slater's Sententia. That book gives the history of the world in a nut-shell. Necessarily meagre in details as it is, it sufficeth not for our schoolboys who have to show a larger acquaintance with Indian and English history. Hence Miss Allen's labours. She commenced with Indian history and has now followed up with the outlines of the history of the mother-country. Like its predecessor, the present book follows Mrs. Slater's in adopting the mnemonic method. This is to present the leading events in brief sentences, followed in each case by another brief, or briefer, sentence so constructed and printed that the capitally printed initial letters of the words contain, in accordance with the key observed, the date. The key is simple, all the consonants but two being assigned numerical value from 1 to 9 and nought.

Thus the book opens :--

"B. C. 55.

Julius Cæsar's first invasion of Britain
Julius's invincible Legions Land in Albion.

A. D. 59.

Suetonius Paulinus, Governor of the Roman Province of Britain, during the reign of Nero.

An Imperial Legate, Paulinus, is appointed."

The mnemonic sentence is printed in Italics with the exception of the initial consonants of value. The two L's in the first such sentence give the date 55, L being valued at 5. In the second, LP gives 59.

The Eastern languages have long possessed similar systems of their own of greater elaborateness. It is this literal valuation that supplies the Persian chronograms. But that system has the advantage of time and universal acceptance, whereas the English language has no such time-honoured valuation. Whatever exertion has to be bestowed by the learner in mastering the key of this book, will be of no further use to him in life.

SURRENDER NOT THE GREAT COOKED IN HIS OWN JUICE AND DISHED.

Vanity of vanities, saith the preacher, vanity of vanities: All is vanity; in the midst of life we are in death. His High Mightiness of the Chair--of North Barrackpore has Fallen, fallen, fallen, fallen,

Fallen from his high estate, fallen like Lucifer never to hope again—at any rate, not for three mortal years to come. No wailing is heard, no sigh is wafted, not a tear is shed: the eloquent apostle of self-government falls unwept, unhonored, and unsung.

Oh, mighty Cæsar! dost thou lie so low?
Are all thy conquests, glories, triumphs, spoils,
Shrunk to this little measure?

But if Surrender Not has been snuffed out, he has tempted his own fate. No sooner had he attained the upmost rung of the ladder, the highest civic honor in the gift of the Peddlingtonians, than he turned his back unto it, nay, began to scorn the base degrees by which he ascended. Is it to be wondered at then that, stung to the quick, the ladder would rise and send him about his business? Disadvantaged as he was by the defection of his own allies and creatures, and knowing as he did that discretion is the better part of valour, Mr. Banerjee did not offer himself a candidate but made a friend of his, among the faithless faithful only he! to stand for the Chair, hoping himself to be the Chairman de facto if not the Chairman de jure. But the enemies had their wits about them and knew that the candidature of Roy Gopal Mohun Sirkar Bahadur was a mere blind. Though Surendra Nath did not appear in the field in propria persona, the defeat sustained by Roy Bahadur will none the less be regarded as a defeat inflicted on him. It has been said by one of the greatest military geniuses of modern times that the next dreadful thing to a battle lost is a battle won. But Surendra Nath is too bumptious, too self-sufficient to lay this lesson to heart. In '84 he won a double victory, having been elected both as a Commissioner and the Chairman. But he did not use the victory with moderation. He was Sir Oracle and when he opened his mouth he would let no dog bark: His friends began to fall off never to be whistled back, swell the ranks of the enemy and hate him with the rancour of a renegade; and by the time that the 2nd General Election took place there was not a rat left in the sinking vessel. But the bitterest drop in the cup was that the seceders linked themselves to an interloper, nay a Britisher and a Government officer to boot, and have voted him to the Chair. But if a stranger now fills Banerjee's throne, is there any body in the whole Municipality to cast a longing lingering look behind at the good old rule with which he has shaken hands and parted simultaneously with the enforced retirement of Baboo Banerjee? There can be but one reply, and that is an unhesitating and emphatic No. The reason is not far to seek. Demagogues are despots in posse; add to this, power, you know, pollutes whatever it touches, and it is no matter of surprise that dressed in little brief authority Surendra Nath would develop a variety of unamiable qualities, play such fantastic tricks before high heaven as make the angels weep—nay, pose as a Cæsar till the people were provoked to cry,

Why, man, he doth bestride the narrow world,
Like a Colossus; and we petty men
Walk under his huge legs, and peep about
Men at some time are masters of their fates.

The Immortal Bard of Avon has sung:—

Could great men thunder
As Jove himself does, Jove would never be quiet;
For every pelting, petty officer
Would use his heaven for thunder,—
Nothing but thunder, and unlike merciful Heaven who, with his sharpened and sulphurous bolt splits the unwedgeable and gnarled oak rather than the soft myrtle, they would fight shy of the big swells and hurl their bolts on the devoted heads of the weak and helpless. This was pre-eminently the case with the champion of Local Self-Government. He signalized the first year of his administration by Hairan-ing and Parashan-ing one Kanai Mistrî—a man as poor as Job but not so patient. He was accused of encroaching on a public drain by blocking it up with a mound of earth in one place with the object of widening his own land and tried by a Bench of Magistrates composed of Surendra as President and two other gentlemen, one of whom had as a Municipal Commissioner already held an inquiry into the alleged offence and so far expressed an opinion as to issue notices both written and verbal on the accused, and as such was not competent to be associated in the trial. But other illegalities were committed which stagger belief and before which the one just noticed, pales. None of the Magistrates were specially empowered under the law to receive a complaint or hold a criminal trial without having received a particular case on reference from a Superior Magistrate—taking it for granted that they were properly appointed ones which, I am afraid, they were not. The Chairman Babu Banerjee had no authority to issue a summons. The summons instead of bearing the seal of the Magistrate bore the seal of the Municipality. The accused was required to answer the charges in less than 24 hours after the service of the summons.

He asked for postponement in order to produce witnesses for his defence but this was refused—though the prayer was perfectly reasonable and legal, seeing that he was convicted under Sec. 218 Act III B.C.'84 of an offence other than that specified in the summons. He was fined Rs. 20 for disobedience of the orders of the Commissioner, and Rs. 10 with costs for obstruction of the drain; a further order was passed directing that "if the accused within one week did not remove the obstruction a daily fine of Rs. 5 would be imposed upon him until the same was removed" though the imposition of a daily fine has more than once been held by the High Court to be illegal. It goes without saying that the High Court which justly inspires public confidence quashed the arbitrary illegal—nay tyrannical proceedings of the model Huzurs. Long before Surendra Nath was hatched into a Mazzini by the heat of his own ambition, his conduct had been described by no less a personage than the Argus-eyed Sir George Campbell as "dishonest and fraudulent." And what strikes me with surprise is not that he should be capable of zoolum and zaburdusteesm, but that the man who was not righteous enough to remain in the Civil Service should have been called to sit on the benches of both the Metropolis and a considerable metropolitan borough to do justice between man and man like the immaculate or uncaught members of the service. That a man of his antecedents holds two of the most important, though honorary, offices, is a proof positive of how little the interests of the people weigh with those to whom their destinies have been committed. If there were honest and honorable journalism—if the Press really deserved the high sounding name of the Parliament always in session the scandalous satire of Local Self-Government that was enacted at North Barrackpore would have created quite a sensation and the principal actor would have been held up to public execration and contempt.

Characters, they say, never change. Opinions alter—characters are only developed. Towards the close of his administration, Surendra Nath again rode roughshod over law, justice and common sense and convicted and sentenced another person. The decision was, it need hardly be said, set aside but then the poor man had to prefer an appeal before the District Magistrate—nay invoke the High Court which held as follows:—"We consequently hold that in as much as the proceedings in their initiation and in the manner in which they came before the Municipal Bench which held this trial illegal and void ab initio, the conviction and sentence must be set aside. It is a matter of much regret that there should have been such irregularities in the initiation of these proceedings so as to involve considerable expense to the parties concerned."

One more instance of high handedness and I am done. Some-time in 1886 Mr. Banerjee on the unseconded and unsupported motion of one of his colleagues—a lick spittle of his, turned out of the vestry several ratepayers who were there to hear the deliberations of the village elders. When called upon by another commissioner to put the resolution before the meeting—he refused to do so saying that he had as much power to order a ratepayer to leave the meeting room as the speaker of the House of Commons to clear the strangers' gallery on emergent occasions. But his colleague was not a man to be terrified into surrender by the apparition of the practice of Parliament. The autocrat was, after all, made to put the motion to the vote and was, as a matter of course, ignominiously defeated—though he it said to his shame, he took care not to enter the resolution in the proceedings of the meeting. It must be said in this connection that when an official predecessor of his turned a ratepayer out of the room—the Bengalee was a running tirade, a filthy current of rancorous abuse and a ceaseless diabetes of acerbity. But if our patriotic editor is consistent in nothing else, he is consistent at any rate in his inconsistency.

Those who are believers in patriots and are not aware of Mr. Banerjee's antecedents might, after reading the above lines, cry Etu Brute, but as for myself I only wonder that he has not yet done anything at which the world would grow paler—if paler, indeed, it can possibly become—for no man is a hero to his valet.

A BLUNT MAN CALLING A SPADE A SPADE.

ZEMINDARY ZOOLUM.

Sir,—Permit me to bring to the notice of the public, through your widely circulated journal, the particulars of another suit recently instituted by Baboo Hurry Hurr Mookhurjee, the landlord of Utterbar Jhapordah, against one of his rayyets of the name of Umbica Churn Ruckheet.

The arrears claimed under the law of Landlord and Tenant amounted to 1-5-11½. Umbica proved previous tender of his rent at Baboo Hurry Hurr's Village Catcharry. On non-acceptance of the same, he had deposited it in Court. The Court granted Baboo Hurry Hurr a decree for 5 couries (pacca) equal to one-sixteenth of an anna; of course, Baboo Hurry Hurr has been ordered to pay Umbica his costs.

Sir, what does this suit prove? Does it prove a bonâ fide case on the part of Baboo Hurry Hurr for his annas and gondahs, which as he lately said in the papers would amount to several hundreds? Well, the law of limitation in respect of such claims, is three years. Could not Baboo Hurry Hurr wait till at least the last kist of the year to see how Umbica behaved? Would this have entailed any loss on him? What made him rush to Court for 5 cowries on the very first day on the expiry of the Kist? Has Umbica been able to recover all the unauthorised and authorised costs that he had really to incur; I hope Baboo Hurry Hurr will kindly answer some of these questions quoting, if he can, even a single instance of any other landlord in all Bengal (I give him all India too in the bargain) who has ever sued a tenant for such trifle.

Howrah, 18th March 1888.

MONGHYR.

An accident happened at mile 191 on the Loop line between Barharwa and Tinpahar Stations, of the E. I. Railway, when an up Goods train was passing over the Cbotta Pugla bridge, which I hear was undergoing repairs. The driver having run his train over the bridge at a greater speed than he should have, some of the loose rails came out and the train was derailed. Several wagons were smashed to pieces, and the bridge was also very much damaged, the girders being bent by the force with which the train went against them. Fortunately no lives were lost. In consequence of this the up Loop Mail arrived here at 8 A.M. being 3 three hours late. The passengers having had to be transhipped to another train which was waiting on the up side of the place where the accident occurred.

Nothing has transpired as yet, as to the origin of the accident in question, of course it will, when the investigation of the case comes off.

Busy preparations are now being made here for the Barowari Poojab of which allusion was made by me some time ago. It is now in full swing, having made rapid progress. The image for symbol of worship has been nicely made. The members of the Barowari committee having secured the services of competent "Image makers and painters" from Lower Bengal, did well. The deity selected for the worship is Rajrajeswari. The work on the images has been remarkably well done, especially the idols Mobadeva, Mobakala and Brahma have a very natural appearance.

Arrangements have already been made to secure a jatra, "keertan" "dhop" and dancing party from Lower Bengal.

The ceremony is expected to come off by the latter end of the current month (March), when I hope to be able to give your readers an account of the proceedings.

All I can now say is, that this is a novel sight to the Beharees in general here, who have also joined the Bengalees in this movement.

An annual entertainment of the kind under notice was no doubt a desideratum, especially in a place like this, which a few years back was nothing but the abode of wild and ferocious animals only.

It is a matter of great delight (not to speak of anything else) to see both Bengalees and Beharees united co-operating with each other in such an undertaking.

A she goat gave birth to a kid a few days ago at Kosim Bazar, in Monghyr, having 2 tails, 8 legs, 2 spines, 2 stomachs, one neck and head, 2 ears and 2 eyes, but it expired after a short while. The owner of the animal contemplated earning his livelihood by means of this unnatural production, but unfortunately failed to accomplish his wishes, owing to nature's surrender. He is really to be pitied, for his disappointment.

The has been a change in the weather of late, though we still have cold nights and mornings.

OPINION OF THE PRESS.

It is many years since I first met, and some years since I last met, Dr. Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee, editor of the Reis and Rayyet (Prince and Peasant), and an author of high repute among the kindly, as well as acute and intellectual, people of Bengal. One of the real misfortunes of India was, and still is, Lord Macaulay's picture of the Bengalee. The picture, true perhaps as regards Nuncomar and many Bengalees, is not accurate as a representation of the people generally, taking them as an Englishman may find them if he looks fairly. If they had been unfaithful, the sad story of the Mutiny had been vastly sadder; and, apart from the Mutiny, many Englishmen could give individual instances of Bengalee faithfulness almost unique in history, taking all the circumstances of our relation to India into account. The Bengalee is generally eager for knowledge of all kinds, and is often both courageous in the expression of his opinions, and gifted to a remarkable degree with the power to express those opinions with force and precision. Mr. Fawcett once told me that an unprepared speech made, on his behalf, during an election, by a young Hindoo, surpassed, in force as well as eloquence, any unprepared speech he ever had heard made by any member of the House of Commons, if four or five members of the House were excepted.

Among these Bengalees there is a small body of men—small for that large province—who are, ironically or otherwise termed "Young Bengal." Some of them are no longer young, but grave and aged; some have, in the course of years, been highly distinguished for their public services and their scientific and other attainments. Some have at times been misrepresented, and their language misinterpreted, so that on its return to them it has amazed none more than themselves. Nothing of this has been done by the really great administrators of India. That it has been done, however, cannot be denied.

In the forefront of this little band is the author of this book of travels, Baboo Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee—a writer of high repute, as I have said, also an administrator, as the reader will see from the title-page to this book. A keener, yet a kinder satirist, one might seek for and not find. His use of the English language has astonished many an educated Englishman; and the quality of his reading is shown by his marvellous power of quotation; not merely from authors like Shakespeare, and Milton, and Macaulay, and men eminent in science, but from out-of-the-way old ballads, and little-known old pamphlets, in the application of which he leaves one wondering—first, how he obtained the productions at all, and secondly, how, having obtained them, he learned to apply them so appositely to the subjects which he intends them to illustrate.

Passing from the author to his book, we shall, perhaps, first of all be attracted to the work of the administrator. He comes upon a milkman's village, on which he finds fastened the grip of a Court favourite. He unloosens the grip, and re-settles the village, in the double interest of Prince and Peasant. And all the time he sees everything. The poor people bathing on the rivers' banks, have his genial and kindly, if also at times, what a Scotchman would call, his "pawky" notice. A "fair maid of Souargoan" attracts his attention by the gracefulness with which she carries a vessel of water from the river; and, though the fair maid and he are divided by race and faith (she is Mussulman), she has his full meed of praise. Indeed, it must be admitted—and he will not be offended with me for saying so—that he never meets with a fair face, without at least giving evidence of the fact that he has eyes to see and a heart to comprehend.

Of his wide and generous sympathies, much might be said, and still leave much more to say. He meets a missionary on the river, and evidently is inclined, in writing his notes, to pass a joke on the subject. He nips it, however, in the bud, and contents himself with saying, "So new is preaching here, that the simple people said the padre had been singing in the street." He meets Catholic and Protestant missionaries on shipboard, and chuckles over their disputes, while he astonishes them by his command of the English language, and even by his knowledge of the Bible—a knowledge, I may add, which is evident in many of his writings.

A parrot falls overboard, and is drowned in its cage, to his great distress, which is not however paraded. He says: [Extract.]

These are not the words of a Christian, but of a Hindoo.

Again, he has a faithful ugly dog, whose name is Tom, and whose glory it once was to bark, with a noble independence, at some very dignified Sahibs. Our author is compelled to leave Tom behind; and here is his farewell: [Extract.]

I think this is a very fine passage, and one that will draw the author very close to the great heart of humanity, wherever the words are read. Could anything be finer than the testimony to the two foreign "gentlemen," ending with the "Bengalee pariah, my poor Tom"? Not the pariah merely, but the pariah dog. The passage is worthy of the author, and of the great mercifulness of the land that bore him.

Whoever reads this book must be prepared further to find bold and manly language. The author is no flatterer of John Bull, though he gives John his due, and admits that India owes him a great debt. Here is one passage relating to foreign fruits: [Extract.]

Among the sketches of country—word-pictures—the reader will find some exceedingly pretty, and all the more valuable in that they are taken from a standpoint purely Indian; not English. Where an English artist's mind would be filled with European ideas, the mind of this gifted Eastern artist is filled with a class of ideas totally different, yet equally instructive and certainly not less subtle and far-reaching.

On the eve of one of his journeys, our author was placed in a dilemma of a kind not unknown to travellers in India, but not on that account the less stupid. He wished to go by a particular boat, and took time by the forelock for that purpose. The fare was at first stated as 90 rupees, to pay which he offered "a new crisp, fresh British India" note for 100 rupees. "It was," he adds, "flesh from the Currency Office, and had been received only the day before from another Government department." The rest of the story is thus told: [Extract.]

The humour of the little sketch is worth something. I can fancy the author laughing even in his dismay; for he can laugh well at others, and equally well at himself. I shall only venture on one more passage; and I give it as showing the spirit of the man who dares to call his newspaper Prince and Peasant. He desired to return to his home in Bengal, and to bid adieu, for a time at least, to Independent Tipperah, where he had been located "some two years." He received the Maharajah's permission to return home; but still he could not get away. [Extract.]

There is, I think, a sound lesson in this passage; the lesson of the immense value of courtesy and urbanity in the relations of rulers and ruled. There is a great deal in that sentence, "We serve flesh and blood." The best administrator in India is not always the ablest, the man whose plans are the wisest as plans; but the man who, with plans or without them, gives confidence to the people, and confidence not merely in his justice, but also in his consideration and forbearance. A clever man once said that the art of success in India is the art of giving good dinners. It may be so; but the peril is great—the peril of debt; and in any case the art has its limits, and its natural collapse. Even dinners and champagne pall in the end. But there is one art that never fails—the art of true courtesy; of that courtesy which, being natural, is not affected by any whim or caprice, either of the person who possesses it, or of any one with whom he has relations.

In bidding farewell to this little book, I once more recall, as I easily and very vividly can, the author's kindly face and gentle voice, as known to me many years ago. I see him, as I see Baboo Kristo Das Pal, Dr. Mahendra Lal Sircar, and some others, including a much-abused editor of the Amrita Bazar Patrika; and I feel and say, with all earnestness and sincerity, that among these are men whom the Government of India would be wise in recognising and winning entirely to its side. They are men on whom no really generous word—true as well as generous—ever is thrown away. I have compared them at times with men of kindred occupations at home, and I think that they are as a rule by far the truer gentlemen in good manners, and often in very much more than mere manners. May the great God, whose sacred Name they use as that of the Father of all, guide them to a nobler destiny than any they yet have known, and with them, and by them, bless their native land!

No. 320

KAISER WILHELM.

AFTER THE FUNERAL, MARCH 16TH.

It is said, in days of Summer, when the moonlight on the Rhine
Floods with scintillating silver all the land of hill and vine,
That the shadow of a monarch comes to visit earth again,
And that great imperial phantom is the ghost of Charlemagne.

Not in anger comes the Kaiser from his tomb at La Chapelle,
But his eyes are fain to look on all the scenes he loved so well ;
And upon the Bridge of Moonbeams, lo ! the spectre takes its stand,
With the palms of benediction o'er the ancient Fatherland.

So the olden legend runneth. Now once more the Teutons weep
For a paladin as peerless, who has won eternal sleep ;
Though they mourn the mighty Soldier that his God has ta'en away,
'Tis the Father of his People that his children miss to-day.

Brave in battle, sage in council, with no thought of praise or pelf,
On the altar of his country he had immolated self ;
And the up-hill path of duty with a steadfast foot he trod,
Single-hearted in devotion to the Fatherland and God !

May we not then, looking forward to the years that are to be,
When all living men have vanished like the sands beneath the sea,
Dare to presage of a presence, will be seen of man once more,
A twin-spectre in the moonbeams with the Charlemagne of yore.

And the children of those ages shall look out upon the night,
And with awe-struck whispers murmur, as they see the fearsome sight,
" Lo ! his great sword flashes upward for an everlasting sign ;
Kaiser Wilhelm comes to bid us keep with him the Watch on Rhine ! "

NEWS AND COMMENTS.

THE Doctors have pronounced their verdict on the ailing Emperor Frederick. They apprehend pyæmia, which once set in quickly poisons the blood.—The Crown Prince William has received formal appointment to act the Emperor.

SNOW-STORMS have checked the reconnaissance march of our Sikh Force to the Jalep-la Pass.

THE Deb Raj of Bhutan is said to have fixed upon a deputation to mediate between our Government and Tibet.

IT was placarded in Mandalay that there would be a rising by the 22nd.

ON the evening of the 18th, there was a storm at Mandalay, uprooting several huge trees, blowing off roofs of houses and otherwise damaging property. Two men are reported killed. The temperature went down by 28 degrees to 76.

THE noted Abdul Huq, the Railway King of Hyderabad, has been suspended from the Home and Public Works Secretariat of the Deccan Government, for disobedience and peculation, and explanation called for from him of his conduct in respect of the concession of mining rights.

DEATH is telegraphed of Mr. Mathew Arnold, the critic and poet, of heart disease.

THE usual conflagration at Moorshedabad broke out on the 16th, at Rajabazaar, the whole quarter to the extent of four hundred houses being burnt down.

ON the 7th, a fire—supposed to be the work of incendiaries—occurred in the village of Sripore, Hoogly, reducing 15 big thatched houses to ashes.

TWO or three—the thing is so common that people do not care to be precise—fires occurred at Cuttack within the first week of this month, in one of which some hundred huts of the poor and four cows, together worth about Rs. 2,000, perished.

THE first Mahomedan Chairman of the Bombay Municipal Corporation has been elected in the person of Rahimtoola Mahommed Sayani.

THE Public Works Member of the Government of India and the Director General of State Railways (Sir Charles Elliot and Colonel L. Conway Gordon) with a number of officials had had a narrow escape with their lives recently, while travelling on inspection on the Bengal-Nagpore branch of the G. I. P. Railway, a rail having been removed by the Bhil Tania, it is suspected. This kind of mischievousness has become rather common of late in that part.

THE Sub-Post Master in charge at Ghoraghat, in Dinagepore, an old man passed fifty, of good character, was found in his bed in the post office killed apparently by a burglar for the money in the chest, as there were marks of bloody fingers on it. The wretch got nothing for his crime, as the Post Master had removed the cash Rs. 200, to the Police Station for safety.

A MEETING of the local bar was held at the Ranchee court-house, under the presidency of the Government Pleader Baboo Devendra Lal Basu, at which it was resolved that each of the eight members of the said bar should pay Rs. 100 towards building a house for a bar library and that the gentry of the district be asked for funds for the purchase of books. Suitors will be expected to pay for the maintenance of the institution.

THERE are Indians and Indians. The creatures of ilk name that are still permitted to remain in the precincts of the great Republic of the United States, have recently been described by a writer whose article is thus summarised in a London paper:—

"A Paper in the March number of Harper's Magazine gives some curious particulars of the Indian territory—that wild but beautiful region lying between Kansas and Texas, wherein, surrounded by a broad belt of land, left uninhabited the better to isolate them from their neighbours, the 'five civilized tribes' now dwell in peace. These are the Cherokees, Creeks, Seminoles, Choctaws, and Chickasaws. Each of them is described as living a life absolutely separate from the rest, with its own peculiarities, its own institutions, and its own national characteristics. The government of each nation is republican, with elections frequently recurring, legislatures, executives, and systems of judiciary. Each nation too supports common schools and high schools, provides charitable institutions, and fosters churches. Whether Choctaw or Cherokee, these Indians carry on large business interests, and live intelligent and valuable lives. Vinita, the most commercial town of the Cherokees, is described as 'a brick and mortar city with shops and newspapers, and a busy life of its own.' But Vinita is not the most representative Indian settlement. 'Have you seen Tahlequah?' is the question always asked of the traveller who has visited this part. It is situated in the interior of the country among the mountains. 'Up and down its streets,' says Mrs. Dawes, walks a population industrious and well-to-do, busy about the daily affairs of shop and farm and school and state.' Its women, dressed in the fashions of the metropolitan market, sit down in their elaborately decorated parlours, or in their more humble homes, to discuss the food and clothes of the nursery, or the last magazine, or the gossip of the town, according to their tastes and habits, much as their sisters do across the border. According to the testimony given in 1885 to a committee of the United States Senate, of the 5,000 men of this nation 3,500 were farmers, not 200 of them professional men, 133 were mechanics, and—in an Indian tribe it must be remembered—only 23 were hunters and fishermen. The Cherokees with their nationalised land system seem exceedingly prosperous in a worldly way. But this writer is not satisfied with the result of their essentially communistic organization. The result, we are told, is that 'half the nation sits down content to eat and drink, a great unprogressive animal class, a weight upon the community, failing of every end of civilization or any comprehension of its advantages.'"

THE Budget estimate of Home Remittances for the year 1888-89 has been fixed at £14,000,000. The remittances from 1st to 14th April 1888 amounted to £743,300.

HERE is another poor innocent unable to make use of the money he had been at so much pains to acquire:—

"Last December (writes a Paris correspondent) the State came into a large fortune which was left it by an old man named Meyer, who said in his will that he had no relatives. When the inventory of Meyer's goods and chattels was being made a stone filter was thrown aside because broken and unfit for any use, but the other day, when it was being carried away as rubbish, a bundle of papers fell out. On examination they were found to be debentures and other stock, payable to bearer, and, at the present rate of the stock market, worth £12,000."

ON account of cholera in the district, order is Gazetted prohibiting the emigration of coolies from Manbhoom to the Labour Districts.

ASSISTANT Surgeon Doyal Chunder Shome, M. B., has been admitted an Honorary Assistant Surgeon to the Viceroy, in place of Assistant Surgeon Samuel Pollock Johns, deceased.

IN its issue of the 13th instant, the Daily Athenæum publishes as "Notes" nine paragraphs. The first eight are verbatim reprints from Reis and Rayyet. There is, of course, no acknowledgment of any kind. That even might be endured, perhaps, if the wrong ended there. But the ninth and last extract is from another Calcutta paper, the name of which is mentioned at foot—thus making it appear that all the nine passages are from that source. Had this been an occasional case or confined to our contemporary in question, we would be the last to notice the matter. We can understand that it is by a slip that the Eastern Guardian, in the same issue in which giving due credit it quotes our leaderette on the passing of the Abolition of Imprisonment for Debt Bill, gives no clue to the paternity of our long article on the Dufferin Demonstration, which it reproduces in extenso. In point of fact, it is a common vice in India; and we have suffered from it more than almost any other paper, the Pioneer of course excepted. We appreciate the compliment that our contemporaries do us in transferring from our columns. We only wish them to add to their obligation by giving the reference on each occasion. Surely, this is not asking too much. They will, we can assure them, be in no danger of giving us more than our due. The writing in all the departments of our paper, even to "News and Comments," is all our own.

A TELEGRAM from the Resident in Kashmir dated Srinagar the 16th instant reports the occurrence of thirty cases of cholera, eighteen in Srinagar and the rest in different parts of the valley. The disease is said to be assuming a severer type as seven cases and three deaths were reported within 24 hours previous to the despatch of the message.—Press Commissioner.

THE House of Commons have read the Deceased Wife's Sister Bill of the session a second time, by a majority of fifty-seven votes.

HERE is a curious crime:—

"Miss Bellina Prior, daughter of the late Colonel Prior, was, on Tuesday, March 27, arrested at the residence of her mother, Vicar's Hall, Armagh, and charged before the magistrates with having drowned Ann Slavin, aged three years. The evidence showed that Miss Prior enticed the child into her house, gave it sweetmeats, and then drowned it in the kitchen boiler. Prisoner said she committed the crime because she was treated unkindly at home, and she did not care if she were hanged. She was remanded."

That poor girl cannot be in her right senses.

ON the 12th, Sir Frank Souter, Commissioner of Police at Bombay, presented a young Bania lad, named Lilladur Dharsi, with the bronze medal of the Royal Humane Society, for saving, on the 14th of August, 1887, about 7.30 in the evening, the life of a Bania boy, named Curson Purshotum, who jumped into a well with the intention of committing suicide. Although several people, hearing the splash, rushed to the spot, it was Lilladur Dharsi, who, without a moment's hesitation, jumped in, and supported the drowning boy till they were both drawn out.

ON the 6th instant, a police peon with a double-barrelled name, Kalekhan Soobratkhan, of Rajkote in Kattywar, did more havoc and caused more consternation than he ever accorded protection in his capacity of a public servant. We must go to Singapore or Hongkong in order to find a parallel to the bloody deeds done by this single man on a single occasion. He was understood to have assisted some persons who had grievously wounded others in the Rajkote State. Pursuant to application under the Extradition Treaty or Act, he was made over to the State. There he made up matters with the complainants and induced them to withdraw the charge. But the State authorities would not permit them. He was at his post on bail, when he heard that his Kotwal or suspector in charge of the station, Mr. Bawanian, and a Police corporal, named Dost Mahammad, had caused the application for withdrawal to be rejected. Brooding over his grievance, he resolved upon vengeance. Issuing forth with his drawn sword in the afternoon, he cut the head of Dost Mahammad almost clean off as he was counting money for the pay of the men with Narayan, a Karkoon. For exclaiming "what have you done?" poor Narayan was despatched with another cut. The sword being slightly bent under the successive operation, the man of blood threw it away and took up another and rushed outside. A sweeper was cut down at a blow for another unlucky remark touching the state of the man's head. The runner-amok now ran off to the Inspector's house and hacked him. Thus he went on, killing and wounding whomsoever he had a grudge against or a bad opinion of. The slightest appearance of criticism was punished by drawing out blood. Thus he ran to the mutton market to cut down some of the meat sellers who were among his complainants or had perhaps at one time or another passed neck-beef for good mutton. There he found the stalls deserted, the butchers, warned by news of what was going on, having taken shelter in the military lines. He then turned towards the Police lines. On the way, a plucky Parsee gentleman named Sorabji, who was luckily provided with a stick, saw him coming and boldly faced him with the question, "Kalekhan what are you about? Are you mad?" As usual, the bold man succeeded in taming the tiger, where the terrified sweeper Dhania not only failed but got killed into the bargain. "I have killed many persons," said poor Kalekhan, who now for the first time seemed to realise his doings. By this he had exhausted his strength and his thirst for blood. Now supervened the natural thirst—for water. He made no more ado, threw himself into no attitudes, but quietly gave his sword to Mr. Sorabji and called for water. After drinking, he, like a quiet good boy, walked up without assistance to the Police station, where he gave himself into custody and where he was locked up. Soon after, the Magistrate arrived, followed by the mounted Police, and then Col. Morse, commanding the station, and last by the Political Agent. The man had already been hand-cuffed and chained, and he was now marched under a strong escort to jail. A superfluous measure! He was now quiet as a lamb. He had done his work, having killed five men and wounded six. The scene of wailing and confusion and panic at Rajkote was indescribable.

THE personnel of the German Parliament has been classified according to build or general outfit of the person or personal habits on cardinal points. The House consists of 380 members and these are divided as follows:—

"9 wear spectacles, 57 use the double eye-glasses, and 21 a single eye-glass; 142 still retain luxuriant heads of hair; 65 wear full beards, 87 have their beards cut in the military fashion, 24 wear 'bristly beards,' 48 wear nutton-chop whiskers, 73 indulge in moustaches only, and 52 are clean shaved, 97 are corpulent, 78 conspicuously thin, 84 are of unusual height, and 74 noticeably short. The whole are tobacco smokers, with the exception of 39, or rather less than 10 per cent."

Our countrymen who are looking so monkeyish with their cropped pates after the latest British fashion and so hideous in their apery of the European black coat, should note the German preference still for luxuriant heads of hair.

A CORRESPONDENT of the East furnishes the following particulars of the case of Mr. Sandys, the manager of the Maharaja of Tipperah's Zemindary in British Territory, which was recently being investigated before a commission at the Durbar:—

"Mr. Sandys, Manager of the Maharaja's chakla catchery, has after all been dismissed from service under order of the Maharaja for embezzling, I hear, a large sum of money, and falsifying accounts in a ridiculous manner. The public here consider the order to be an equitable and impartial one, as they know the man perfectly well. But what our Magistrate, Mr. Price, is of opinion is not known as yet; it is, however, whispered all round here that, he acted quite inconsistently with his position as Political Agent by pressing upon the Maharaja to raise the emoluments and powers of Mr. Sandys. The embezzlements in question are connected with money drawn in lumps for unforeseen charges; but the account connected with money spent under Mr. Sandys's orders as manager of the chakla has not been scrutinized as yet. Movements are, however, on foot to do the same shortly, and also to sue him in the Civil Court for recovery of the amount already traced out as embezzled. A few items of the so-called embezzlements are given here for enabling your readers to know their nature (1) a large sum is entered as disbursed for the feed and keep of two carriage-horses from November 1884, though the said animals were actually procured from Calcutta in March following, or 4 months after (2) an expenditure of Rs. 519 is shown for the entertainment of Mr. Price during his stay of 11 days at Agortola in April last year; but on the Commission declining to pass this charge for want of proper vouchers, certain bills, signed by a Calcutta Firm were produced but they proved to be relating to charges for subsequent periods. (3) A sum of Rs. 2175 is shown as spent in the course of 33 days for going to, and coming back from, Sylhet and Shillong; but the Commission after granting First class fare and other charges, found still over Rs. 1000 to be accounted for by Mr. Sandys. (4) One Mahabat Ali, is entered as being paid Rs. 800 on account of salary, though this man never held any appointment, either under the order of the Minister or Maharaja."

NOTES AND LEADERETTES.

THE Indian Daily News has exercised the entire Indian public by its telegram from Simla stating that the Viceroy is certain to go away in August, and may depart even sooner. Our contemporary's correspondent seems to have seized and made the most of one of the rumours floating about Simla. At any rate, there is no truth in this report. Nothing is yet decided about the precise date or manner of Lord Dufferin's departure. There is no reason to think his Lordship will go before December.

SIR STEUART BAYLEY is in no hurry to fly to the Hills. Lady Bayley however, with her daughters and Miss Farquharson go to Darjeeling on the 24th. The Lieutenant-Governor follows about the 20th of next month.

HIS many friends will be glad to learn that Sir Donald Mackenzie Wallace, who was reported by the Simla correspondents of some of the papers as far from recovered from his recent attack, is all right again.

SIR STEUART BAYLEY has dismissed the rate-payers' suit on the initial pleas of limitation and res judicata. We expected as much. Nor can we blame. There is a time for everything, and the time in this case had positively, absolutely expired. As the Lieutenant-Governor pointed out, in his exhaustive reply to the miserable deputation headed by Maharaja Jotindro Mohan Tagore, the time for protesting against amalgamation has long since passed away. Most of the details too have already been passed in Council, and have passed out of His Honor's hands. All he can now do is to place the memorial of the meeting presented by the deputation before the Council. Sir Steuart has no fear that it will be ordered to be preserved for the benefit of the future historian, but such notice as is now possible will be taken of it. If the Council thinks fit and sees its way to reconsider its own decisions, he as President will not be in the way with technical objections. What more could they expect? We confess we do not sympathise with the querulousness of our native contemporaries. After the Lieutenant-Governor's ample explanation, their complaint has no leg to stand upon. Sir Ashley Eden would have made short work of the meeting and the memorial. The memorialists should now take the lesson, and learn to prepare themselves betimes and better for the next battle, for the interests involved are too great and too lasting for them to abandon them. We hope, instead of exhausting themselves on sentimental grievances, they will reserve themselves for the clauses of the Municipal Bill which affect their hearths and homes.

WHEN will our journalists learn to husband their energies and wits? We had hoped that after the appearance of Secretary Durand's letter to him, they would have done with the incorrigible old Giffin, now specially that he is leaving the country. Not a bit of it! The Government letter is being made the occasion for reiterating all the charges and reviving buried complaints. As a specimen of the candour with which the letter has been criticised, we quote the following from the Dacca Gazette's leading article:—

"He asked for an expression of confidence from the Governor-General in Council but Lord Dufferin is too wily a bird to be drawn in. He confesses that he shares responsibility with Sir Lepel for his Bhopal proceedings and nothing more. He further adds that the Secretary of State for India has often expressed 'his sense of the vigour, judgment and discretion' displayed by Sir Lepel. Reader, please note, Lord Dufferin makes no expression of confidence of himself and his Council, though it is pointedly asked for? What can a Viceroy do but support the proceedings of his representatives abroad? It is often done as a matter of course, and Lord Dufferin did it, and he publicly acknowledges it. Does it amount to any expression of confidence? Sir Lepel wanted to extort a confession. But Lord Dufferin, a veteran diplomat as he is, is a little too cunning even for Sir Lepel Griffin. Who knows that the Viceroy does not now regret that he ever allowed himself to be blindly guided by his Agent."

Such is the unblushing way in which the deliberate, though certainly cautious, deliverance of the Government of India is disposed of by patriotic publicists! For our Dacca contemporary is by no means singular. They are all, all of the same kidney, and talk in the same vein—the very tune. Their unanimity is wonderful. And it is this Press whose supposed mutual variations have vexed the soul of our Yankee friend of Hope, who proposes a drawing together and founding Association. What! more unanimity? Why, already they are as alike as a basketful of peas! Most of the papers, like Most women, have no character at all.

Talk of organization and agreement! Is it not one oppressive monotone already, throughout the length and breadth of the Empire? To us it seems we should organize and agree to differ. In this, as in other walks, we badly want independence—of one another.

THE Mahomedan community has gained by the recent deaths in the Small Causes Bench of the metropolis. As the casualties were caused in due course of Nature, and no Abdulla was deputed by Wahabis of Patna or Ferazees of Dacca to despatch the Kafir Kazees, we unfeignedly rejoice in the luck of our fellow-subjects of the Islamite faith. We are glad to see Mr. Abul Hassan Gazetted to permanently fill the place—he had been officiating temporarily for Baboo Rajkisto Sen—of Registrar and Chief Ministerial Officer, in the Calcutta Small Cause Court. Government seems not to have been able to make up its mind as to the other vacant post. Mr. Chatterjee who is officiating, would make an excellent Judge. But the Subordinate Judicial Service has had a claim to one of the Puisne Judgeships since the appointment of the late Baboo Hurro Chunder Ghose, more than thirty years ago. If Baboo Amrita Lal Chatterjee cares for it, he will probably get it. He is not only senior on the list, but is also a good conscientious Judge. There is also another Chatterjee, Baboo Kristo Chunder, in our neighbourhood, Sub-Judge at Alipore, who is also a meritorious officer. They are all, all good and true, and all Chatterjees—God bless them. And may the Government see its way to reward them according to their deserts!

THE Mahatma in the Manger is acting after his kind. He will neither eat nor let eat. Titles are his abhorrence, and his high soul prefers to fish for Backshish of the upstart nobility and the nouveau riche to accepting the pay of an unrighteous Government. And if any body else less heroically patriotic, elects to serve that Government, he will be damned if he allows him! In fact, the news of anybody's good fortune throws him into a fit. Therein, he is a colleague fit of the son of Joseph Hume, who used to fight pitched battles over every appointment and the slightest expenditure of the State. Just now, his torture is the prospect of a worthy countryman and even friend of his getting a Small Cause Court Judgeship in Calcutta. What is this—A saint, a savage, or a sage? The spectacle is indecent in the extreme. Day after day, has poor Mr. Chatterjee been abused in the most atrocious way. His Mahatmaship affects not to know the other's merits. That does him little credit as either a prophet or a journalist. He might at least have remembered his obligations to that quarter. He seems alarmed at the consequences of such an appointment. Why does he lash himself into hell and fury for nothing? He need be in no apprehension about the interests of the public. If competent men are not found to testify to Mr. Chatterjee's capacity, he will certainly not get any appointment. The editor of the Mirror may be among the Prophets, but he is certainly not among the competent men—thank goodness and Mr. Chatterjee's stars! Though a nominal attorney, he is confessedly innocent of law and has evidently a grudge against facts, or at least an incapacity to take their measure and understand their bearings. We are told that his countrymen of the Native bar do not regard Mr. Chatterjee. So much the worse for Asia Minor! It is thus that the democracy of Athens banished her best citizen. We have ourselves been witness of the terms on which Mr. Chatterjee is treated by some of the leading European members of the bar. The statement is, also to our knowledge, untrue as to the native members too of any consequence. There may possibly be young imps of the law who, without either the opportunity or the disposition to drudge honorably and legitimately, in a professional way, spend the odds and ends of their large leisure with develling to the literary attorney of Dhurmollah. These may have caught the infection of the Mirror's spirit of envy, hatred and all uncharitableness, but we know that Mr. Bonnerjee, the Messrs. Ghose, Mr. Ameer Ali, and Mr. Mitter, and others who are at the head of the native side of the bar, have the highest regard for Mr. Chatterjee, professionally and personally. It would have been strange if it had been otherwise. A gentleman by birth, he has the manners of one and a fund of natural bonhomie into the bargain, and withal he is the most accomplished man in the bar, familiar with native and foreign languages, his mind stored with the classics of the East and the West, modern and ancient.

THE hot-house rose of a Kshetriya or Vaisya Pandit, which Professor Monier Williams transplanted from India to Oxford and nurtured with assiduous care, and whose wonderful growth's progress he incessantly advertised, has, after all, succumbed to the scorching blasts of Native Central India. It is in any case a hazardous experiment to place a young man fresh from College in any responsible charge. The idea of an Indian youth without Indian experience, or for that matter any experience at all, except that of English University life, being pitchforked into the chancellery of a Native State, however small, is simply preposterous. But the kindness of his influential friends and patrons would not hear of Shyamaji Krishna Varma's noviciate in the business of the world. Apprenticeship is vulgar. Initiation might be the necessity of ordinary powers. Their protégé was genius sublimated by the latest Oxford culture. He was up to anything. He would not only do at the head of a principality, but do wonders. It were infra dig for genius to wait like the rest of us. So a suitable post was provided for him to take up immediately on Shyamaji's return to his mother-country. He stepped into the office of Minister of State of Rutlam. He had the advantage of serving a good and educated master. He made one or two speeches, of course, and announced himself a man of liberal ideas. But business proved a bore, and the ordeal of office exploded genius and classicism. All sides felt this, including himself. At length, the Maharaja could no longer drag on the burden of a useless and injurious connection. And the Dewan made the best of a bad bargain by accepting Rs. 13,000 in lieu of all claims and in consideration of relieving Rutlam. He left "bag and baggage" on the 14th.

We hope poor Rutlam in escaping from the frying pan is not reserved for the fire. For such a result the Maharaja will be to blame. He should take time to deliberate on his next choice. Meanwhile, the current duties of administration may be carried on by Naib Dewan Nobin Chunder Roy.

MR. ALLAN HUME, the father of the Indian Congress, after leaving Madras, is touring through the Mahratta and Guzerat countries on his Congressional mission, before proceeding to Hindostan on his way to Simla. At Bombay, he got up a meeting at the Hon'ble Pherozshah Mehta's residence, on a Sunday afternoon, at which he spoke, chalking out the lines on which the work of the Congress must proceed. At the end, a hundred more or less well-known gentlemen, with power to add to their number, were elected the standing Congress Committee for Bombay. That is the show Committee. It is on the face of it unworkable, being too unwieldy. A working Committee was, therefore, appointed with Mr. N. G. Chandravarkar of the Indu Prakash and Mr. D. E. Wachi of the Indian Spectator, as Secretaries.

THE mango blossom this year was magnificent. Thicker than leaves in Vallambrosa was the profusion of embryo fruitage, and high have been the hopes of our people, after having been last year condemned to scarcity, if not famine, of the whole coming season's daily feast of nectared sweets where no crude surfeit reigns. Alas, for the vanity of human wishes and expectations! The absence of seasonable showers in many places literally nipped the bud a good deal in many districts, and the late weather has completed the mischief. How could puny fruitage resist gales and hurricanes which have shaken Nawabs and dismantled the palaces of their pride!

There was still some chance left for the people in and around Calcutta, now that it is in easy communication with the more distant parts of India. So long as Benares remained untouched, the lovers of mango would still enjoy the finest kinds. But disappointment upon disappointment, all hope of solace from that quarter must be abandoned. The Pioneer's Benares Correspondent gives warning:—

"Lovers of mangoes will have to look elsewhere than in Benares for their supply of this fruit this year; the late blight has ruined all the blossoms."

WE draw our readers' attention to the St. Peter's College in our advertisement columns. The institution is meant for Europeans as well as Indians. It is to be removed to a very spacious building with ample play-grounds. An Indian gentleman living in England, who is incapable of deceiving, assures us that the place is a very big one and the climate of the sea-side town most agreeable. There are already three Indian boys and it suits them beautifully. The Principal is Charles Unwin Simson, B.A., St. John's Coll., Oxon. The object is not only to train students for examinations but also to prepare them for a business career. Children are admitted at six years of age, and the younger pupils are specially cared for by Mrs. Simson.

THE other day we were drawn to visit an interesting place of education. Situated in the native town, it is for the benefit of Hindu boys. It is a boarding reformatory with day and night schools attached. Started in August 1886, under the patronage of Mr. H. J. S. Cotton, of the Civil Service, the accomplished and liberal author of New

India, it is called the "Cotton Institution." It originated in the desire to supply a place for confining unruly, vicious, criminal, or even dangerous boys. This was a crying want and the founders are entitled to the thanks of not only unfortunate parents and guardians burdened with such boys, but also of the whole community which, directly or indirectly, suffers more or less from such young imps of mischief. The school is housed in a palace lent for the purpose by its generous owner. It is not quite Perfection in a Palace, but it is in modest docile hands and, with increased public support, improvements will be introduced.

In passing a sentence at the Criminal Sessions, Mr. Justice Kernan of the Madras High Court sang to Clough's charming refrain. "Money, money, money!" cried his Lordship, Money, money money "pervades all departments." And so it is as a rule.

THE Madras People's Friend puts its foot in a sore place of the body administrative:—

"The Government offer their subordinates good salaries to keep them from avarice and bribery, but in spite of handsome remunerations, bribery is the besetting sin of the official of position and influence and wealth. Not that the small fry are without such temptations. These act as bribe givers likewise. Almost every place under officialdom is purchased, from the peon's to the Keranee's; and justice is overturned by a bribe. And bribes are given in various ways. Our readers must have heard of Master's and Mistress's Christmas Cakes. The latter went into the lady's room and contained in it Bank Notes for large sums secured so as to keep them from being soiled; and the former, with the ostentatious liberality of the Collector, was handed over to the household servants. Of course, Ramasawmy had an important case and it was decided in his favor through the magic agency of these Notes."

It is the same in all parts and Presidencies. That is, corruption, though not rampant, remains. We doubt whether even the Benighted Province retains the old institution of pagoda pies and bank-note pies. Here in Bengal and Upper India, it was called the dally system. Lord William Bentinck knocked it on the head. It is still observed in Behar and the N. W. Provinces, though not in the former gross and shameful way. It may be condoned as the practice of the country, if strictly confined to a compliment, but care should be taken that it does not degenerate into a nuisance nor is made use of as a vehicle for actual corruption.

BABU SHYAM KRISHAN of Benares advanced Rs. 20,000 to a man possessing property in Jaunpore, on mortgage, without enquiry into the estate hypothecated. So unsuspecting was the lender that he paid the money before registration, which was leisurely made afterwards. Thereafter he discovered that the property was saddled with a previous mortgage of which he has had no notice. Further inquiry disclosed that he had been amused with a fictitious registration of his bond. He believed the mortgagor not wisely but so implicitly that he let him register the deed in Jaunpore himself, leaving the whole matter entirely to him without taking any precautions, indeed without any interference of his own. Babu Shyam Krishan has, however, been unable to find any record of its being registered at the Jaunpore office, though the deed bears on itself the marks of such registration, such as the Seal of the office of the Registrar of Jaunpore, as well as a No. and a date. The whole transaction in fact is no mortgage at all, but a sale—"sell" as our British friends airily choose to spell it. It was a fine sprigge to catch the gentle wood-cock of the Benares Lombard Street! Poor Shyam Krishan has charged his borrower with cheating and forgery. But that man is evidently an old stager and is not to be put out of countenance. In fact, he fully expected the attack and was prepared with his own measures. He is a bold fighter and scorns the defensive. He is determined to drive back the war into the enemy's country. He has, in return, charged Baboo Shyam Krishan with trying to extort money from him by intimidation with a forged document.

ANOTHER startling application of science and ingenuity:—

"Photographic science has advanced so far that a detective camera can now be carried in the waistcoat pocket or even worn as a waistcoat button. This latter feat has actually been done, and a successful photograph taken. The waistcoat pocket apparatus has tiny plates ready for work at any moment, and it contains six of these plates on a pivot, so that a movement of the fingers will bring one plate after another into action, and enable six photographs to be taken in a few seconds. By this means many people will be photographed who would not sit for the world, and the instantaneous views of landscapes or startling incidents can be taken without any trouble or preparation. The tiny 'dry plates' last a long time, and the photos can be enlarged so as to give a fair sized picture. That is only one among the many developments of the photographic art, another of which is to be found in the recent attempts to reproduce natural colours. This is attempted by acting on a red salt called photochloride by various other chemicals which change its colour. The experiments in this direction are hopeful, but only certain colours, such as red and lilac, have been reproduced as yet."

Why should not our smart Prefect of the Town Police be asked to introduce this miniature photography into his Force, commencing with the detective branch? It is a snug easy post on which he is perched. That was demonstrated beyond doubt during his flight to other latitudes and longitudes, when the great metropolis was governed in this department by an amiable boy. Now that the Court of Bengal is pure, the Police have been relieved of the more delicate part of their responsibilities—none the less onerous for being secret—in the demi department. One of these not overfine days we may find the poor Prefect reduced to preach as a Salvation Armist from very ennui, if not also yet by way of penance for Police sins. Under the circumstance, he may as well learn photography or Poshtu or Greek. Anything to keep these precious Police birds employed.

SUBTERRESTRIAL disturbances of intensity are becoming rather common. Formerly, the destructive freaks of Nature in this line were almost confined to Central and South America. The calamity of Lisbon is historical, but the destruction of man and his works on such a scale is rarely heard of in the Old World, at any rate, in the olden parts. Of late years, there have been symptoms of—if we may use the word in such a connection—abnormal activity in Java, New Zealand and other regions. There have been terrestrial commotions in India too, from Cashmere to Bengal and Cachar and Assam. At one time, a few years back, in some of the parts of these countries, the shocks of the ground were so constant and so serious as to cause a chronic sense of insecurity, and several people actually abandoned home and family to retire from the world to pass their remaining days at Benares or other shrine. Still there had been no case of wholesale destruction of life or property.—no massacre—en masse.

It is now from China that we hear of catastrophes that recall the earthquake of Lisbon or the destruction of Quito or Lima. The people of Yunan and the neighbouring Provinces must be in consternation. At first heavy shocks were felt throughout them, which continued for four successive days at Shikh Ping Chou, the sudder station, destroying the city, killing 5,000 men, women and children, and injuring many more thousands. The sudder station of Lin An was equally reduced to ruins, and the inhabitants killed and wounded. So at Sechuan and other towns and villages. In Lin An the earth split and a spring of reddish liquor—blood the simple might think—issued.

LORD DUFFERIN has shown his usual generosity to the Music School of Raja Sourendra Mohan Tagore, who lately lent himself to be a cat's paw of the miserable conspiracy of a disappointed journalist to prevent the farewell demonstrations in honor of the Viceroy and his good wife. The Musicians, headed by their Adhikari Tagore, shouldered their instruments and waited upon His Excellency at Government House, and, after performing before him and his family, presented a parting address to Lord Dufferin. His Lordship briefly replied. It will be remembered that the Raja had given as a reason for his mischievous attempt—at the egging on of the wire-pullers—to discount the Dufferin meeting by anticipation, that he was no politician himself but a mere musician, that he did not understand public affairs but only cultivated harmony. If Lord Dufferin saw the Raja's performance in the unfiner art of political discord, he was not likely to forget it. If he did see and remember it, there was no bitterness in the recollection. His reply was cordial.

"Gentlemen,—I need not say that I am very much touched by your kindness in presenting me with so friendly an address, and particularly for incorporating it with this interesting performance. I am always anxious to promote harmony, whether in the political or in the artistic world, and with this object, if you will allow me, I will place at the disposal of the Academy a medal to be competed for, under whatever conditions it may be determined. I must not forget to return you my especial acknowledgment for the kind manner you have alluded to Lady Dufferin, and it is, indeed, a great pleasure to me to have established relations of such firm personal friendship with your distinguished President, to whom great credit is due for the liberal patronage he is always ready to extend to the art you cultivate."

It was probably with an insinuating but agreeable reference to the Raja's own avowal that his Lordship said that he too "was always anxious to promote harmony, whether in the political or in the artistic world." His Lordship did not content himself with verbal protestation, but gave substantial token of his sentiment by giving a medal for competition among the students of the school.

GENERAL BOULANGER, the fire-eater who would square his country's account with Germany and chafes under the pusillanimity of his countrymen, who are not prepared to embark on the hazardous experiment, has, we see, been elected to the Chamber. For the peace and prosperity of France, we had hoped to see him snuffed out. The man is a firebrand and has been permitted much too long to compromise the nation. And now he is sent to Pavliament to ventilate his quarrels and—what is far more serious—to precipitate a political catastrophe!

REIS & RAYYET.

SATURDAY, APRIL 21, 1888.

THE DUFFERIN DEMONSTRATION AND MALCONTENT CRITICISM.

WE are come upon strange times, when respectable and able papers like the Hindu and the Tribune consider such utter rubbish as the following of the Indian Mirror's, worth laying before their readers with four introductory lines of their own:—

"We do not know whether all these names have been correctly described by our contemporary, but we confess we find a difficulty in identifying "Babu" Durga Churn Law, and Sumbhu "Nath" Mukherji. Excluding Behar, Orissa and Chota Nagpore, we have about 27 Districts in Bengal proper, and the Hindu inhabitants of 27 Districts as well as of the metropolis have been represented by twelve gentlemen, ten of whom are residents of Calcutta and its suburbs, and two—the titled son and the plain father—of Utterpara, almost within a stone's throw from Calcutta. We tremble to think if such representatives of the Hindu population of Bengal proper be always accepted by Government in all matters."

Such petty tricks are worthy of the Mirror (which, by the way, is said by its own kind friends, including the great Surrender Not, to have lost its head, if it ever possessed one) and are of a piece with its whole desperate game against the voice of reason and moderation. But why should those who are capable of better things, be deceived by them? What temptation is there for our other contemporaries to commit themselves to even seeming endorsement of transparent foolery and rancour?

The Mirror has been sorely tried. Having helped, by its unprovoked ferocity, to swell the triumph of the Viceroy, it proceeded to prove, in its characteristic way, that there has been no triumph at all. By the application of its diminishing lens, it was easy to show, to its own complete satisfaction, that the demonstration in the Town Hall was nothing in particular. Unable, either by private cajolery or public bullying, to prevent the meeting, it took to analysing the attendance and descended to sneer those that formed it down to nothingness. And the above passage is the precious result.

That passage itself will not bear analysis. The writer does not perceive that his first sentence is guilty of suicide. The two clauses clash one against the other, exposing his pretence and destroying his own credit. It were tedious to notice the peculiarities of expression of our contemporary. We leave to the Padishah, who, for want of possessions and possibly in quest of pennies, has got himself installed in the columns of the Mirror as "Aristarchus—a mere word-catcher that lives on syllables—what is meant by "names" being "described." For our part, we remark that there are two different confessions in that sentence, not different only but even contradictory. First, the Mirror confesses that it does not know whether or not the names of those who are enlisted as present at the meeting are correctly given—or correctly described, as the Mirror incorrectly puts. Then comes the professed confession—so called—that it finds a difficulty in identifying "Baboo" Durga Churn Law and Sumbhu "Nath" Mukherji.

The suspicion of inaccuracy in the description of the names with which the writer starts, exposes the succeeding affectation of difficulty in identifying the two names singled out! Even without the introductory clause, who would be deceived by such a flimsy pretence? Was the Mirror really put to such difficulty? Are the two men so very obscure as to be utterly unknown to the subjunta journal? Were "Baboo" and "Nath" such stumbling blocks? Did it find any difficulty in identifying the late Chunder Sen? Is it able to identify Baboo Surendra Nath Banerjee? Is Mr. Surendra Nath Banerje a different person? Who then is the firebrand who has earned the name of Surrender Not? And who is his alter ego cycled No-render-to-Cæsar Sen? Are not "Durga Churn Law" and "Sumbhu Mukherji" enough for comprehension, with or without "Raja" in one case and with or without "Nath" in the other? Does the usual title of the gentry of Bengal, "Baboo" before the name of a Bengalee gentleman who yesterday became "Raja," or the introduction of the nominal trifle or surplusage of "Nath" or its substitution for "Chunder" in another name in which the initial and the patronymic designations are correctly given, make it so that no fellah can understand? That indeed is a confession of something inherently rotten in the state of Denmark in the upper storey! This crave for accuracy is a new hunger in a paper which, besides its emanations of the mind and heart at work on it, is notorious for its blunders, typographical and verbal. But the very fact of our contemporary distinguishing the words "Baboo" and "Nath" by inverted commas proves his pretence—amounts to a virtual confession that the writer had no difficulty in identifying the names in question, and knew perfectly well who were meant. Thus the Mirror is convicted out of its own mouth of a paltry trick having for its purpose to run down a movement of many of the most respectable and highest in the land. And does it not feel the lash on the Indian Mirror when the Calcutta Mirror simply is punished for its delinquencies?

Had there been any "chaffing" in the matter, the thing might pass. Had there been the slightest suspicion of liveliness in the profession of difficulty of identification, it might be legitimate, inverted commas and all. But the Mirror is innocent of fun, nocent or innocent. It is nothing if not serious. It avows its unhappy weakness. It is proud of its propensity. It is prima facie lugubrious lackadaisical to the last degree. The Mahatma who guides it, is great Grim himself—though curiously enough a Jesting Pilate of a Padshaw has taken protection behind his ægis. He is melancholy personified: Any tyro in Lavatar might see it. He is Burton's Anatomy in living human morocco, nurtured on Young's Night Thoughts.

In the same spirit and by the same method, the Mirror goes on to reduce the size and importance of the meeting. Professing to go upon facts and figures, it coolly throws out the assertion that only twelve men represented the whole of the 27 districts of Bengal. Here is genius to be sure! This is statistical manipulation with a vengeance. The shade of Whateley must bow its head before this competitor of his fame who has succeeded in casting a doubt on the reality of a great public demonstration of thousands. That great meeting shrinks under the Mirror's magic wand to a thing of less substance and significance than one of Brother Surrender Not's mass meetings.

THE AGITATION IN UPPER INDIA.

WHILE the practised eloquence of Surendra, the calm words of mature statesmanship of Sir T. Madava Rao, the Grand Old Man, the sympathetic utterances of Mr. Norton heralding as if it were the message of peace and good-will among the subject-races, the proffers of friendly co-operation of Mr. Chester, the adroitness and humor of Babu Bipin Chandra Pal, the seemingly phlegmatic yet earnest address, learned and thoughtful, of Pandit Bishen Narayan Das, and last, though not least, the light and leading of Mr. Buruddin Tyabji with all the grace and wisdom of a practical administrator—while all these at the Madras gathering are still ringing in our ears, grand and active preparations are already in progress for the forthcoming Congress at Allahabad. As regards the three past Congresses at Bombay, Calcutta and Madras, it must be conceded that the people of these centres of education and enlightenment were in a great measure prepared and only required rousing. Contrariwise, the United Provinces is a veritable Sleepy Hollow—an inert mass to be reduced to working material by the rather unnatural processes of platform oratory and by that yet more potent educator and civiliser of mankind, the Press. And the leaders of thought and action there, we understand, are just now busy sweating their brows and taxing their brains in extracting high-pressure work of both of these. Against the “pugilistic oratory” of the Sage of Aligarh, now only the shadow of his former self, that “combustible patriot” of Allahabad, the Hon’ble Pandit Ayodhya Nath, has thrown in all his weight and energy for the Congress movement. An influential Reception Committee has been formed, and otherwise the infant prodigy of three years called into being as a natural result of the silent mental renaissance of English education, as the French Revolution was, in part at least, of a similar literary movement in the 18th century is being nourished and cherished. Gentlemen of the long robe and the press are specially active, and the aims and objects of the Congress are being discussed and explained in public meetings at the chief centres, notably at Allahabad and Lucknow. It must be encouraging to the promoters of this national movement, that their labors are already bearing fruit: the Congress is the topic of conversation of all, the rich and the poor, the high and the low, the “loyalist” and the “anarchist,” from the highest official to the lowest court prentice. And if the Muhamadans as a body are not in active sympathy with the movement—not as the result of the wild declamations and the zihad against the Congress proclaimed by the Aligarh Prophet of disunion, but as the natural and necessary result of the admitted ignorance in which they are still steeped, of their inordinate desires to please, at least not to displease, the powers that be, and of the foolish way in which they are patted on the back by the Government officials—they are not arrayed against the movement in active hostility. In fact, as a body they have not as yet learnt to take any interest in measures affecting the weal of the country; they lack public-spiritedness. And if there is the Syed of Aligarh unreasonably against the Congress with his small clique, because forsooth they are taken care of, all kith and kin, by the Government, the sons and grandsons, nephews, protégés and followers of the Syed, there is the redoubtable Oudh Taluqdar, Sheikh Raza Hossein Khan, President of the Rifah-i-Am (Association), who can take a broad and sympathetic view of the present political situation. Somehow or other, that advocate of the heaven-born Service, the incorrigible Pi, the self-styled champion of the nobility, compromised with his conscience not to publish the rejoinder of a true scion of aristocracy to the heated effusions of a waif who began life on a salary of Rs. 10 only. The inconsistency of Sir Oracle of Allahabad is on a par with the advocacy of the Aligarh Sage in behalf of the hereditary nobility! Verily, in these days we hear things only to be contradicted! Well this is the nobleman who, it will be remembered, soon after the second Congress at Calcutta was over, delivered a sympathetic speech at Lucknow, in the course of which he refuted the assertion that the Mahammedans are not in sympathy with the movement,—by undertaking to collect, if necessary, the signatures of 50,000 Mahammedans in favor of the Congress. But it was enough that the respected Sheikh Sahab had praised the Bengalis to ensure his rejoinder being consigned to the waste-paper basket. The activity with which pamphlets and leaflets are being issued from the two contending parties of the Mahammedans for and against the Congress, of which the Hindus are the silent spectators, bespeaks their political education. The bulk of the Mahammedan papers have assumed an attitude of inoffensive neutrality, arguing that they are not yet themselves prepared for the reforms proposed by the Congress, but telling at the same time, in plain and unmistakable language, that it is criminal folly, to oppose it so vehemently as the self-seeking Syed does. It is an open secret now that the Syed has engaged the services of a band of political fakirs whose mission it is to preach the Gospel of disunion, to discredit the Congress by ludicrous concoctions and cobwebs of their brain.

And if there is the Syed assuming an attitude of uncompromising hostility to the Congress and the Bengalis, there are others also who cannot at all claim his respectful indulgence or his force of an apology for unreasoned and unreasoning opposition and who only betray their own folly by their unpatriotic actions. The half-a-dozen Mohammedan anti-Congress meetings which, after severe wire-pulling and under the agis of the petty local hussoors, were held in Allahabad, Meerut, Mirzapore, Lahore, Jubbulpore and elsewhere—should not be taken to reflect at all the free and independent opinion of the Muhammedans; for, as we have said before, their attitude is one of inoffensive neutrality in the matter of the Congress. The intelligent portion of the Muhammedan community, led by high-minded men like Sheikh Raza Hossein and Munshi Sajjad Hossein, the spirited Editor of the leading Muhammedan paper of these provinces, the Oudh Punch, are, on the other hand, prepared to sink or swim with the tide of time.

Recently has started up a number of Hindu anti-Congress meetings at Lucknow. Their promoters have constituted themselves apostles of loyalty and moderation under the banner of the notorious, “glib, guttural and oleaginous” Munshi Newul Kishore. Their chief strength lies in Pandit Sri Kishen, Vice-Chairman, Municipal Board, and his client the Raja of Bhinga, who are alarmed at the rapid pace at which India is moving. Having conjured up phantoms of fear, they are now trying to remove them by mantrams within closed doors. They have taken up their cue from the Sage of Aligarh of rousing the religious prejudices and passions of the ignorant classes, and who will deny that a better and more effective, though foolish, method could not have been devised? What is to be wondered at that short-sighted officials do all in their power to set aflame their worst passions without even caring to reflect with what grave consequences the step is fraught. Have they ever reflected upon the seriousness of their course? Suppose, if by an irony of fate—and it is revolting even to assume it—these dharmatmas are arranged against them, and there is nothing extraordinary in it—and suppose they all join in strong phalanx against them—what a huge conflagration would they not make?

Nor are they all. There are the Taluqdars of Oudh who have met in solemn conclave and declared themselves against the united voice of intelligence of the whole country. Fortunately, on such a question, their opposition does not signify much. It would have certainly meant something if it were even the spontaneous expression of their free opinion. Only 29 of them met of an evening at the Kaiserbagh Baradari; and as yet nobody but perhaps Munshi Imtiaz Ally, the chief organiser of the movement and the faithful lieutenant of Sir Syed in Lucknow, knows for what special purpose they all met. Their resolutions, or with what ever other name they may be called, have not as yet seen the light of the day, and many present, we understand, are as yet totally ignorant of the objects with which the meeting was convened. Such is the history of the oppositions raised against the Congress. They do not signify much, but they have done a world of good to the Congressionists. For now by this opposition they are more than ever united in the closest bonds and have learnt the better to cherish the aims and objects of the Congress, and to strive with head and heart to realise the thousand and one good results that might flow to all from its success—a consummation devoutly to be wished.

The great activity of the opposionists, the silent and imperceptible way in which the promoters are carrying on their uphill task—all these speak volumes in favor of Indian progress, and we for ourselves regard them as harbingers of better days for our land. The National Congress is at once the embodiment and expression as also the means of the political education of the people. And this is particularly true of the backward provinces. B.

PRE-BRITISH INDIA.

BABER.

III.

THE early life of Baber was a tissue of transitions and curious adventures. He was but a boy when he succeeded his father, Omar Sheik Mirza, in the Government of Firghana; for he had numbered only twelve summers. His patrimony of Firghana was small, but it was rich and beautiful, situated on the upper course of the Jaxartes. Baber loved his beautiful little Kingdom with an abiding affection, and in after years, even when ruling in India, remembered it with regret.

The days in which Baber lived, were the days in which might was right. The strong hand took and the strong hand alone kept. So it followed in almost a natural way, that two of his uncles should attack him, and try to seize his heritage, when he was barely seated on the Musnud. Ahmed Mirza of Samarcand, his father's brother, and Mahmud Khan, the Mogul, his mother's brother, besieged the boy king. Both these princes, however, entirely failed in their attack on his capital: and shortly after Ahmed Mirza died. He was succeeded in his Government of Samarcand, by his brother, who also died soon after, leaving the Government to his son Buisanghar Mirza. As usual in Eastern countries, confusion ensued. The confusion prevailing at Samarcand led Baber's advisers to look on it with a covetous eye, and they accordingly urged him to attempt its conquest for himself.

Baber was yet only a lad, being but fifteen years old; yet young as he was, his natural abilities were so great, that he was conducting the Government of his own little Kingdom. Baber then, at the instigation of his advisers, made more than one attempt to capture Samarcand, but his attempts failed. Failure, however, served, young as he was, to develop his character. He persevered in his attempts in an indefatigable spirit, and was at last rewarded with success. It is matter for surprise that he should have succeeded, when we consider his extreme youth and the meagre means he had at his disposal.

In obtaining possession of Samarcand, the capital of Tamerlane—from whom he was the sixth in descent—it served but as a finger-post, pointing to the sovereignty of all Transoxiana; but such a conquest, at such a period, Baber could have but little hopes of achieving. It was a difficult matter for him to maintain himself at Samarcand. The country around had been subjected for many succeeding years, to the tumultuary disorders emanating from undisciplined troops, both those of foes, and those of its hereditary rulers. The result was, that the country around was so completely exhausted, that Baber almost found it impossible to raise any revenue, by taxes, either in kind or in coin. Baber thus found himself with an extended dominion, but with empty coffers, and not having the "sinews of war" he was unable to pay his troops, who in consequence deserted in large numbers. These deserters naturally went back to their own country, Firghana, and were the means of spreading disaffection among the troops left there. This disaffection reached a crisis in open revolt, under the leadership of Ahmed Tambol, one of Baber's principal officers.

Tambol was a very wily leader, and shielded himself from the chief consequences of his revolt, in case of failure, by nominally playing a secondary part. He proclaimed Baber's younger brother, Prince Jehangir Mirza. This evil in his native Kingdom was sufficient to draw Baber away from Samarcand, which he quitted after a reign of only a hundred days. Baber had scarcely left his new acquisition when its inhabitants threw off their allegiance to him. Thus necessitating a new expedition to re-establish his authority.

Baber hastened on, with the remainder of his troops, to Firghana. Unfortunately he fell dangerously ill by the way, and survived with difficulty. This so retarded his progress, that when he recovered, he found that his followers had melted away, and his hereditary dominions were lost; for in the interval Ahmed Tambol had strengthened his position considerably. Baber now found himself reduced to the position of a refugee, and one would have thought, that as he was so young, this strait would have broken his spirit. It appeared chimerical to cherish any hopes of regaining possession of Firghana. Baber's buoyant spirits, however, did not sink under the trial—he sought aid from his Mogul uncle, and with his assistance, which was at best slender help, attempted to recover his dominions. He made oft-repeated attempts; in some of which he had not even the help of this uncle, but had to depend on his own resources alone. If an attempt on Firghana failed, he tried an attempt at seizing Samarcand. At length, owing to continued perseverance and a disposition that would not accept defeat, he recovered Firghana. He was but a little time in possession, and had barely subdued the rebels, and put the affairs of the Kingdom into some semblance of order, when he felt himself attracted towards Samarcand through an invitation he received from the inhabitants of that capital. The temptation proved too strong for Baber when the invitation was repeated, with strong assurances of support. He accordingly left Firghana and marched for Samarcand, but before he reached it, he was informed of its having been seized and occupied by the Uzbegs, who were then a new people in those parts, and were beginning to found what afterwards became great dominions.

IV.

As soon as Baber had set out from Firghana, Tambol began to bestir himself and again obtained possession of it. Baber in seeking the shadow had lost the substance. By this calamity, Baber was reduced to such straits that he was compelled to fly, and eventually to take refuge, in the almost inaccessible mountains to the south of Firghana. While in this retreat, he received information that Samarcand was very slenderly garrisoned, as the chief of the Uzbegs, Sheibani Khan, had left it on an expedition. With that spirit for enterprise which was one of his most prominent characteristics, Baber determined to attempt to surprise that city. He accordingly set off with only 240 men, and approached Samarcand without his design becoming known. He escalated the walls; overpowered the guards; and acted with such boldness and rapidity, that he achieved his purpose. The fickle citizens of Samarcand also rose in revolt, in his favour, and massacred the Uzbegs wherever they were to be found. Meanwhile, Sheibani Khan received intelligence of this occurrence and returned with all speed, but he was too late, the last of the Uzbeg garrison had been overpowered or killed, and the gates of Samarcand were shut against him. Sheibani quietly retired to Bokhara, but he only bided his time.

Baber, by being in possession of Samarcand, obtained the allegiance of the whole of Sogdiana, the inhabitants of which, one and all, declared for him. He reigned in undisturbed possession of Samarcand but for six months, when he was called to encounter alone the whole power of Sheibani. As soon as he heard that the Uzbeg chief was preparing to attack him, he endeavoured to form, among the neighbouring princes, a combination, for offence and defence, against the Uzbegs. He failed most miserably in this attempt. In vain he represented their common danger, in vain he used every method of persuasion he was master of, he could not prevail on these princes to form an alliance with him, but was left to oppose alone his powerful foe. Though Baber was thus left to cope single-handed with an enemy with greatly superior force, he yet had hopes of success; and probably he would have baffled and thrown back the attack of Sheibani, through the vigour of his own abilities, had not the Mogul auxiliaries among his troops, acted with the basest treachery, and crushed all his possibly legitimate hopes regarding victory, in the battle he had accepted outside the walls of Samarcand. These Mogul troops, with base cowardice, withdrew from the battle at a critical moment, for the sole purpose of plundering Baber's baggage. The result of this desertion was a total defeat, and Baber had to retire, with the few troops that adhered to him, within the walls of Samarcand.

He now resolved to defend this city to the last extremity; he repelled many assaults of the enemy. The Uzbeg chief had then recourse to a blockade, and so strict was the watch he kept round the devoted city, that in four months he reduced the besieged to suffer all the miseries of famine. Death reigned in the city and the sufferings of the people were terrific. In addition to all this burden of ever present misery that Baber had to bear, was superadded the anxiety regarding the fighting strength of the place, through the desertion of the soldiers, who began letting themselves down from the walls in great numbers. Baber shared in all the privations of the soldiers and the people, but he was at last compelled to evacuate the place.

Babers' history for the next two years is a very sad tale, the privation and distress he endured, was indeed, very great; and probably could not have been borne by many men. He was so reduced in circumstances that his very servants forsook him, in fact he was perfectly destitute. It would have been a bold prophet who could have forecasted the man's future glory and greatness, while seeing him wandering about the mountains, in an almost aimless way, or visiting at his Mogul uncle's camp in the guise of a pensioner. So great were Baber's trials, that his wonted evenness of temper, and his bright cheerfulness forsook him, giving place to despondency; and while in this mood, he actually determined upon retiring into China and passing the remainder of his life there in obscurity. But just at this critical juncture in his life, his prospects brightened for a short space. He succeeded through the help of his Mogul uncle in recovering Firghana, where he was joined by his brother Jehangir, who had up to this time been his nominal rival.

The ousted Tambol in his strait called in the aid of the now formidable Uzbeg. Baber was overpowered after a desperate conflict and compelled to fly, and so closely was he pursued, that his companions, one by one, fell into the hands of the enemy, and he himself was overtaken by two soldiers, who at first seemed willing to listen to his arguments and entreaties and come over to his side, but eventually they betrayed him to his enemies, from whose power he regained his freedom with the utmost difficulty. His condition was now as hopeless as it could be; he had not even his Mogul uncle to look to for help, for this relative had been defeated by the Uzbegs, and was a prisoner in their camp.

Sheibani, the chief of the Uzbegs, held sway over the whole of Transoxiana, except a small part annexed to Bactria. Baber tells us, that at this time his mind was so much depressed, that he shed many tears and wrote verses of a most melancholy character. We must remember, that he was yet only three and twenty years old, though he had done and suffered enough to fill a long and eventful life; but Baber did not sink under his trials, as other men might have done, his cheerful temper made him rise superior to his position, buoying him up, and enabling him to enjoy the present and look with favourable hopes to the future. Baber summed up his present position with the conclusion, that the best course for him to pursue now, would be to leave his native country of Firghana, as all his hopes regarding it had been extinguished. He therefore bade a last farewell to it, and set out to try his fortunes in new scenes, beyond the range of the Hindu Coosh.

MOORSHEDABAD.

April 14, 1888.

Outbreak of cholera having been reported from all parts of the Province, especially from the suburbs of the metropolis, where it has of late been causing fearful havoc, it has been surmised that, apart from all other attendant circumstances, it is mainly due to the impurity of the drinking water, wherein germs of poisonous matter are found to be infused. The municipal board of the Suburb, in their last meeting, Resolved either to buy pure water from the Calcutta Municipality, or, in the event of the latter not allowing it, to excavate fresh water tanks and to purify the water of the ponds already overgrown with weeds. Such a step, will, no doubt, be, to some extent, conducive to sanitation and hence the decrease of the disease. It is a pity that similar sanitary precaution has not as yet been adopted by the mofussil Municipalities, which are annually visited by such diseases as small-pox, malarious fever and cholera, the dangerous offsprings of impure, undrinkable water. Not even a year has elapsed since the tremendous ravages caused by cholera at Berhampore Khugra and in the suburban parts of city Moorshedabad. Needless to say that it was due to the unwholesome water of the river Bhagirati, passing by the places which becomes disconnected, from the main stream, at Sootec by extensive churs in the summer and winter seasons, thereby stopping the current as far down as Cutwa, the extreme North tide-point of the Hooghly. In places in Moorshedabad and Berhampore, it is wholly dried up so far as to put a stop to navigation, and where there is water of normal depth, it is overgrown with rank vegetation, accumulating debris &c., and rendered undrinkable by nauseous stench, produced from rotten plants and bones. It has recently been discovered, says a local journal, by chemical analysis, that the water below Sydadab has been found to contain animalculæ and decomposed elements of animal body, which may tell fatally upon human health. Is it impossible for the advocates and representatives of local self-government to discover a remedy to this? Are they thus to govern their people who are to pay and to suffer? Cannot this city and the Head-quarters which yet boast of Chhota Nazim and Nizamut, Nawabs, Begums, Khanums, Maharajas and Maharanis, Rajas and Ranis, Khan Bahadurs, Roy Bahadoors, Maulvis, Maulanas, Moonshis, Pundits, Vakeels, Mooktears and wealthy eunuchs, &c., afford to pay for the removal of the sand heads at Sootec, or for the excavation of tanks at suitable centres for the supply of fresh water, or the establishment of Water Works similar to those already opened at Dacca and Bhagalpore? Yes, it can: but where are the movers and men to accomplish the deed? Meeting managers, Resolution framers and passers and thank voters are not the persons, for such a laudable project. It needs men of no higher merit and position than those with perseverance, energy, sympathy, such as Babus Pran Kumar Das, Purna Chandra Mozoomdar and Jugeshwar Sircar. Not far distant is the ruin of this old historic capital of Bengal. The wealthy residents of this old metropolis with slight pretensions to Western knowledge are, as a rule, hankering after empty name and title, without feeling for a moment for the poor ratepayers; woe to the municipality of this place which lags behind others in point of sanitation, improvement, &c. Babu Pran Kumar Das is about to be transferred from here to succeed his father in the Excise Department under the Board of Revenue, as Deputy Commissioner, on higher pay. His transfer will be greatly felt by the people who are much indebted to him for the establishment of several institutions of public utility--such as Kumar Ranjit Singh's Victoria Jubilee Hall, Nawab Bahadur's Midwifery Institution, Jubilee Tank, Technical School and Jubilee School at Azimgunge. During his chairmanship here, the hooded cobras were all under constant check. The Lawyers' bull of the Berhampore bar having influenced the present chairman, got an increment for the medical officer of the Lalbagh Charitable Dispensary and the post of the present Jeagunge Assistant-Surgeon will be abolished very soon, to the great disadvantage of the poor patients of the locality. And one Madhoo Soodan Chakravati, a twice dismissed overseer of the Municipality, against whom some 20 charges stood, has been reappointed.

Several Commissioners are about to tender their resignation, if the work of the Municipality continues further as it does now. Mr. Livesay, the Executive Engineer, Nuddea Rivers Division, has already resigned his post as Municipal Commissioner and several others will follow suit sooner or later. People are much dissatisfied with the new chairman.

MONGHYR.

Jamalpore, the 16th April 1888.

About half a dozen cases of fires, breaking out in the environs of Jamalpore, have come to my notice, one of which is especially noticeable. A fire broke out in a thatched house in Kesubpore close to the station, where 2 young Beharee girls were asleep with closed doors. The parents and neighbours tried to extinguish the fire which was blazing furiously, being helped by the midday Westerly wind, but unfortunately could not manage to bring those young ones out in time to save them, the elder of the two meanwhile got her body thoroughly burnt and the other partially so. The former was immediately removed to the Hospital but expired on admission, and the latter the day after.

The cause of this constant fire taking place, especially at this time of the year annually, is ascribed to accidents and to incendiarism. I have reason to believe that it is more the latter than the former and wish that the Police kept a sharper look out for the offenders.

Mr. Editor, you can well imagine the fate of those unfortunates, who have been destined to live, of course through necessity, in this part of the Province, more especially during mid-summer.

The Monghyr public, after the example set by Jamalpore, is going to celebrate another Barwaree Poojah shortly.

The want of a shed for accommodation of dying patients close to the river bank at Monghyr was for some time past keenly felt by the Hindu public (both of Monghyr and Jamalpur) at large, and notwithstanding several representations made to the well-to-do Beharees of the place from time to time, nothing could be done in the matter. I am now able to inform you that the matter after all has taken a happy turn. Babu Raj Kissen Singh, a member of the well-known Dabepur Singh family, has gladly undertaken to defray the entire necessary cost of such a shed. This no doubt is a laudable undertaking and will remove a desideratum long felt by the native Hindu public, more especially the Bengalcees. The Babu deserves thanks for this act of public utility and charity. A petition has been made to the Commissioner of the Bhagalpore Division for a site for the proposed building for Gunga Jattrees on the river bank at Monghyr.

ASRUKANA

A Collection of poems in Bengali by
SRIMATI GIRINDRAMOHINY DASSY
(Author of Kabitahar, Bharat Kusum.)

Asrukana is a collection of poetical pieces of singular pathos and beauty of expression. It is a series of mournful songs that the reader is here presented with and they must touch a sympathetic cord in every heart that can feel. There is a singular appropriateness in the title of the work, and in its pious dedication to the memory of the husband of the fair writer.—The Indian Nation.

The authoress is not unknown to Bengali readers. She has already published two or three poems by which she is favourably known, but between these poems and this is a difference that hardly admits of being measured.

This is poetry in life

We have read Srimati Girindra Mohiny's poems in a reverential spirit. The poems are all of a lyrical description. The lyre is soft, sweet and tender, but awfully strong.

The tone of the poems is inexpressibly gentle, inexpressibly pure, and inexpressibly tender and affectionate. It is the tone of a world mother.

Bengal should be proud of this poem—The Calcutta Review.

THE OINTMENT

Is an infallible remedy for Bad Legs, Bad Breasts, Old Wounds, Sores, and Ulcers. It is famous for Gout and Rheumatism. For disorders of the Chest it has no equal.

For Sore Throats, Bronchitis, Coughs, Colds, Glandular Swellings and all Skin Diseases, it has no rival; and for contracted and stiff joints it acts like a charm.

Manufactured only at Professor HOLLOWAY'S Establishment

OXFORD STREET (late 533, Oxford St.,) LONDON.

Holloway's Ointment and Pills.—Old Wounds, Sores and Ulcers.—Daily experience confirms the fact which has triumphed over all opposition for more than forty years, viz., that no means are known equal to Holloway's remedies for curing bad legs, bad breasts, sores, wounds, diseases of the skin, erysipelas, abscesses, burns, scalds, and, in truth, all maladies where the skin is broken. To cure these infirmities quickly is of primary importance, as compulsory confinement indoors weakens the general health. The ready means of cure are found in Holloway's Ointment and Pills, which heal the sores and expel their cause. In the very worst cases the Ointment has succeeded in effecting a perfect cure after every other means had failed in giving adequate relief.

BEETHAM'S GLYCERINE - AND - CUCUMBER

OPINION OF THE PRESS.

It is many years since I first met, and some years since I last met, Dr. Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee, editor of the Reis and Rayyet (Prince and Peasant), and an author of high repute among the kindly, as well as acute and intellectual, people of Bengal. One of the real misfortunes of India was, and still is, Lord Macaulay's picture of the Bengalee. The picture, true perhaps as regards Nuncomar and many Bengalees, is not accurate as a representation of the people generally, taking them as an Englishman may find them if he looks fairly. If they had been unfaithful, the sad story of the Mutiny had been vastly sadder; and, apart from the Mutiny, many Englishmen could give individual instances of Bengalee faithfulness almost unique in history, taking all the circumstances of our relation to India into account. The Bengalee is generally eager for knowledge of all kinds, and is often both courageous in the expression of his opinions, and gifted to a remarkable degree with the power to express those opinions with force and precision. Mr. Fawcett once told me that an unprepared speech made, on his behalf, during an election, by a young Hindoo, surpassed, in force as well as eloquence, any unprepared speech he ever had heard made by any member of the House of Commons, if four or five members of the House were excepted.

Among these Bengalees there is a small body of men—small for that large province—who are, ironically or otherwise termed "Young Bengal." Some of them are no longer young, but grave and aged; some have, in the course of years, been highly distinguished for their public services and their scientific and other attainments. Some have at times been misrepresented, and their language misinterpreted, so that on its return to them it has amazed none more than themselves. Nothing of this has been done by the really great administrators of India. That it has been done, however, cannot be denied.

In the forefront of this little band is the author of this book of travels, Baboo Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee—a writer of high repute, as I have said, also an administrator, and the reader will see from the title-page to this book. A keener, yet a kindlier satirist, one might seek for and not find. His use of the English language has astonished many an educated Englishman; and the quality of his reading is shown by his marvellous power of quotation; not merely from authors like Shakespeare, and Milton, and Macaulay, and men eminent in science, but from out-of-the-way old ballads, and little-known old pamphlets, in the application of which he leaves one wondering—first, how he obtained the productions at all, and secondly, how, having obtained them, he learned to apply them so appositely to the subjects which he intends them to illustrate.

Passing from the author to his book, we shall, perhaps, first of all be attracted to the work of the administrator. He comes upon a milkman's village, on which he finds fastened the grip of a Court favourite. He unloosens the grip, and re-settles the village, in the double interest of Prince and Peasant. And all the time he sees everything. The poor people bathing on the rivers' banks, have his genial and kindly, if also at times, what a Scotchman would call, his "pawky" notice. A "fair mail of Sonargoan" attracts his attention by the gracefulness with which she carries a vessel of water from the river; and, though the fair maid and he are divided by race and faith (she is Mussulman), she has his full meed of praise. Indeed, it must be admitted—and he will not be offended with me for saying so—that he never meets with a fair face, without at least giving evidence of the fact that he has eyes to see and a heart to comprehend.

Of his wide and generous sympathies, much might be said, and still leave much more to say. He meets a missionary on the river, and evidently is inclined, in writing his notes, to pass a joke on the subject. He nips it, however, in the bud, and contents himself with saying, "So new is preaching here, that the simple people said the padre had been singing in the street." He meets Catholic and Protestant missionaries on shipboard, and chuckles over their disputes, while he astonishes them by his command of the English language, and even by his knowledge of the Bible—a knowledge, I may add, which is evident in many of his writings.

A parrot falls overboard, and is drowned in its cage, to his great distress, which is not however paraded. He says: [Extract.]

These are not the words of a Christian, but of a Hindoo.

Again, he has a faithful ugly dog, whose name is Tom, and whose glory it once was to bark, with a noble independence, at some very dignified Sahibs. Our author is compelled to leave Tom behind; and here is his farewell: [Extract.]

I think this is a very fine passage, and one that will draw the author very close to the great heart of humanity, wherever the words are read. Could anything be finer than the testimony to the two foreign "gentlemen," ending with the "Bengalee pariah, my poor Tom"? Not the pariah merely, but the pariah dog. The passage is worthy of the author, and of the great mercifulness of the land that bore him.

Whoever reads this book must be prepared further to find bold and manly language. The author is no flatterer of John Bull, though he gives John his due, and admits that India owes him a great debt. Here is one passage relating to foreign fruits: [Extract.]

Among the sketches of country—word-pictures—the reader will find some exceedingly pretty, and all the more valuable in that they are taken from a standground purely Indian; not English. Where an English artist's mind would be filled with European ideas, the mind of this gifted Eastern artist is filled with a class of ideas totally different, yet equally instructive and certainly not less subtle and far-reaching.

On the eve of one of his journeys, our author was placed in a dilemma of a kind not unknown to travellers in India, but not on that account the less stupid. He wished to go by a particular boat, and took time by the forelock for that purpose. The fare was at first stated as 90 rupees, to pay which he offered "a new crisp, fresh British India" note for 100 rupees. "It was," he adds, "fresh from the Currency Office, and had been received only the day before from another Government department." The rest of the story is thus told: [Extract.]

The humour of the little sketch is worth something. I can fancy the author laughing even in his dismay; for he can laugh well at others, and equally well at himself. I shall only venture on one more passage; and I give it as showing the spirit of the man who dares to call his newspaper Prince and Peasant. He desired to return to his home in Bengal, and to bid adieu, for a time at last, to Independent Tipperah, where he had been located "some two years." He received the Maharajah's permission to return home; but still he could not get away. [Extract.]

There is, I think, a sound lesson in this passage; the lesson of the immense value of courtesy and urbanity in the relations of rulers and ruled. There is a great deal in that sentence, "We serve flesh and blood." The best administrator in India is not always the ablest, the man whose plans are the wisest as plans; but the man who, with plans or without them, gives confidence to the people, and confidence not merely in his justice, but also in his considerateness and forbearance. A clever man once said that the art of success in India is the art of giving good dinners. It may be so; but the peril is great—the peril of debt; and in any case the art has its limits, and its natural collapse. Even dinners and champagne pall in the end. But there is one art that never fails—the art of true courtesy; of that courtesy which, being natural, is not affected by any whim or caprice, either of the person who possesses it, or of any one with whom he has relations.

In bidding farewell to this little book, I once more recall, as I easily and very vividly can, the author's kindly face and gentle voice, as known to me many years ago. I see him, as I see Baboo Kristo Das Pal, Dr. Mahendra Lal Sircar, and some others, including a much-abused editor of the Aurika Bazar Patrika; and I feel and say, with all earnestness and sincerity, that among these are men whom the Government of India would be wise in recognising and winning entirely to its side. They are men on whom no really generous word—true as well as generous—ever is thrown away. I have compared them at times with men of kindred occupations at home, and I think that they are as a rule by far the truer gentlemen in good manners, and often in very much more than mere manners. May the great God, whose sacred Name they use as that of the Father of all, guide them to a nobler destiny than any they yet have known, and with them, and by them, bless their native land!

TO FREDERICK III.

*Translated from the French of M. François Coppée's poem
"L'Empereur."*

Till when the end? Great Kaiser, who shall say
If in a year, a month, a week, a day

Thou wilt yield up thy breath?

Calm, thou hast faced, upon the battle plain,

As, calm, thou waitest on thy bed of pain,

The dread approach of death.

Mid Russia's steppes and Oural's peaks on high—

From Breton Capes—to Heaven ascends one cry,

One universal prayer.

All hearts are with thee, throbbing with thy throes;

From each goes up—e'en from thy bitterest foes,

"O! Lord, the Kaiser spare!"

France above all; thy sufferings assuage

Her long wept woes, her hatred and her rage,

In this thy fateful hour.

Fired by past wrongs, we arm for conflict dread;

But mid war's blades, uprears its heavenly head

Sweet pity's tender flower.

Though unavenged Sedan, Lorraine, Alsace,

Though still we mourn our sons, though yet the grass

Grows o'er their graves, scarce green,

In thee, no more the victor of Sedan—

In thee, the suffering husband, father, man,

Our tearful eyes have seen.

Sudden the scene is changed. Thy mighty sire

Yields to the victor, Death; his paling fire

Is quenched in endless night.

To thee he cedes his glory, power, and wealth,

And lo! we see thee, with reviving health,

Arise, and stand upright.

The new-made Monarch bids a fond adieu;

Forsakes the flowers, the sunshine and the blue,

Sought on a foreign strand:

Back to the house of mourning and of woe

He speeds across the tempest and the snow,

Home to his Fatherland.

Silent thy voice, O sire of kings to be,

Yet fell disease must yield its power o'er thee,

When thou tak'st up thy pen,

To bid the stir of war and conflict cease,

Tracing a message speaking words of peace—

Peace and goodwill to men.

We held thee true. We deem fair as a dove

The dying eagle with the pledge of love

Grasped in his outstretched claw.

We said "Sweet peace descends with heav'nly beam,"

And poet like I dreamed a lovely dream,

And this is what I saw:

I saw thee throned in majesty and might.

I heard thee say, "O! history, ere the night

Hides this vain world from me,

One page upon thy records I will trace,

Shall raise my memory mid the human race

To Immortality.

"Germans and French with frenzy are distraught.

Gold, science, labour, every act and thought,

On war are bent to-day.

And one chance shot—so fierce their passions burn—

May peaceful citizens to demons turn,

And men to beasts of prey.

"I, King and Emperor, forbid the fray!

To me there yet remains another day:

Men still obey my word.

Tear up the bond that wakes this dread alarm!

Restore the Provinces! both sides disarm!

Lay down the gun and sword.

"Germans, restore those lands: no more contend!

Deep in our side a deadly wound they rend,

That soon must bleed once more.

Restore Alsace! To France give peace again.

Why through those gaping pores your life-blood drain

Yourselves may heal the sore.

"Let my last words be words of peace and love,

Ere from this world to the blest realms above

I wing my upward way.

Your useless guns, to melt, together bring—

Too few to furnish statues of a king

Who reigned but for a day."

* * * * *

I heard, entranced. Alas! my dream is o'er

For thou art dying, soon to be no more,

"Beyond the surgeon's skill

Thou hast not torn the bond. Our friends, alas!

Thou still hold'st down in Lorraine and Alsace,

German against their will.

For ever? No! be battle first arrayed!

On both sides cast the gun and forge the blade!

Blow up the fires anew!

What though in battle meet five million men?

Germans and French in death grip locked? What then?

Millions! 'tis far too few!

This time be war fought to the bitter end,

Our last man to the slaughter we must send;

Eat our last loaf of bread;

France or the Empire sink in blood and fire;

The victor, too, perchance, himself expire,

Beside his brother dead.

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given, any other being unnecessary, and likely to cause confusion.

Must such thing really be? O! God, how long?
Great king, they call thee wise, and just, and strong.
Is this thy latest word?

Must those whose sorrows we so long have wept—
Lorraine and Alsace—be for ever kept
In bondage by the sword?

God speaks by me, in trumpet-tones, and clear,
In whose dread presence thou must soon appear,
Who says "Thou shalt not kill!"

How wilt thou meet His wrath, in that great day,
If thou two nations urge to burn and slay,
Against His holy will?

Calm and serene will be thy sleeping bed,
If o'er thee, dying, grateful tears are shed
In Alsace and Lorraine.

Calm and serene—as night succeeds to day—
Their prayers shall speed thee on thy heav'nward way,
Who shall not pray in vain.

NEWS AND COMMENTS.

It is said that a large island, Erbe, on the other side of Borneo, is missing. The master of the German brig Albert Reimann reports "that about eight A. M., on January 31, 1886, the position of the vessel being fixed by bearings of the Caroline Islands, he passed over the charted position of the island. The weather was clear and the sea smooth, but no trace of an island could be seen in the locality assigned to Erbe-Island."

ON the other hand, a submerged forest has been laid bare.

"During the late violent storms in the Channel the sea washed through a high and hard sand-bank near St. Malo, nearly four metres thick, laying bare a portion of an ancient forest which was already passing into the condition of coal. The forest at the beginning of our era covered an extensive tract of the coast; but with the sinking of the land it became submerged and covered up by the drifting sand. Mont Saint Michel once stood in the middle of it. The forest had quite disappeared by the middle of the tenth century. Occasionally, at very low tides after storms, remains of it are disclosed, just as at present. It is believed that some centuries ago the highest tides rose about 12 metres above the level of the lowest ebb. Now the high-water level is 15'5" metres above the lowest."

THE Pekin Oriental Society hints that the population of China never exceeded sixty millions. We should have thought as much. There were no reliable statistics when the old extravagant estimates were formed.

IN supersession of previous orders, it has been Gazetted that in future the tours of Sub-divisional officers shall not be shorter than 90 days, or still less in the small Sub-divisions such as Barrackpore, Dum-Dum or Uluberia.

A TELEGRAM from the Resident in Cashmir dated the 22nd instant reports that cholera is spreading in the city but not badly. The greatest number of cases was on the 19th instant when 39 fresh seizures were reported. Seventeen cases are said to have occurred up to 5 P. M. on the 21st. The death rate is small, being under 20 per cent. Cholera is not spreading in the valley but some cases have been reported from Uri amongst the workmen on the road. The Jamu and Banihal road is said to be free of the disease.—Press Commissioner.

THE visit to Europe has completely changed the Gaekwar of Baroda. He has been summering at the Nilgiris, but the blue mountains do not give him satisfaction. He must go to Europe again, to Switzerland for his health.

THERE will be a Levée at the "Viceregal Lodge," Simla, at 9-45, P. M., on Tuesday, the 22nd May, 1888.

MR. R. F. RAMPINI, Temporary Additional District Judge, 24-Per-gunnahs, and Mr. H. W. Gordon, District and Sessions Judge, Sarun, both of the Bengal Civil Service, are Gazetted to officiate as Puisne Judges of the Calcutta High Court.

THE Bethune Girl's School is affiliated to the Calcutta University in Arts up to the B. A. Standard.

THE next Criminal Sessions commences on Monday, the 7th May next. Nilmadhub has been committed for the murder of his father Khetter Mohun Mitter of Cornwallis-street. He has pleaded not guilty and has withdrawn his confession, and will be defended.

THE Half yearly Departmental Examination of Junior Civilians, Deputy Magistrates, &c., commences on the 7th of May.

THE Calcutta Medical College Session opens on the 23rd June.

FOURTEEN students have this time passed the first and nine the second L. M. S. examination. Of the first one is Bidhumukhi Basu and one Tha Do Oung.

BOMBAY had long since begun her protest against effete European medicine, when it started a Homœopathic Hospital with the help of our friend Mr. Jelovitz. Homœopathy too seems to have lost its first charm, and the protest has turned into a reaction in favour of indigenous methods. We learn that—

"On the invitation of Mr. Chaturbhooj Morarjee and others, a large gathering of the native community met in the bungalow of Mr. Damodar Thakursi Mulji, Beach Candy, when a paper was read by Bava Sahib, a celebrated native physician of Jamnagar, in Kattywar, recommending the Hindus of this city to establish a school and dispensary for giving instruction in the native system of medicine and for the sale of native medicines respectively—stating that the native system of treatment was most suitable to native constitutions. Mr. Damodar T. Mulji took the chair. Several speeches were delivered on the necessity for encouraging native medicines, and for the training of skilled native Doctors. On the motion of Mr. Shamji Raghooji, seconded by Mr. Khimji Jiva, a resolution was unanimously passed that steps should be taken for establishing a school and dispensary as suggested. An influential committee, including representatives of the various sections of the Hindu community, was appointed."

WHILE the pretensions of the British House of Lords have been challenged from within, a new and unexpected danger threatens it:—

"Lord Stamford, who a few years ago succeeded to the earldom of Stamford and Warrington, lives at Wynbeg, South Africa, in a wigwam of corrugated iron. At a period when his succession was very improbable, he married a black wife, and he now is the father of a very dusky daughter, Lady Mary Grey. Should he leave a son to succeed him, the chances are that he too may be many shades (physically) darker than his brother peers, for of course he would have a right to a seat in the House of Lords. Morally, he would doubtless be better than most, for Lady Stamford is a very good woman and devoted to her family."

As Dadabhi Nowroji is still active in England, and as Lal Mohan has not yet given up his dream, the Lower Chamber may any day be Babooised. But to incur the taint of Nigger blood in "our glorious nobility" and "our hereditary legislators"—the idea is too much to bear!

Native Opinion quotes from the Bombay Gazette a sentence of the Bombay Civilian Mr. H. E. M. James's Travels in Chinese Manturia, to wit:—

"I shall never regret having made it, not only because it was a real rest after prolonged desk work, but because travelling in China acts as a wholesome corrective to the somewhat despotic tone which service amongst Hindus is apt to impart to the Anglo-Indian."

SIR W. C. PLOWDEN, late of the Indian Civil Service, in which he was last in charge of the Census of India, lately took the chair at a meeting in London for hearing a paper on India read by an Indian. In the course of the discussion that followed the reading, one of the audience ventured to hint a suspicion against Indian loyalty. The Chairman gave a triumphant answer to the doubter. Said Sir Charles Plowden:—

"It has been proved over and over again that loyalty existed most largely in India. He would give an instance of native loyalty which had come under his own observation. At the time of the Mutiny a native Captain of Cavalry was with his squadron beleaguered in a fort in the Punjab, having with him three English officers. It happened that the man's brother had been hanged within a few miles of Delhi by one of our officers for disloyalty. The leader of the rebels who were besieging the party in the fort sent word to the Captain that his brother had been murdered by the English, and offered him substantial reward if he would surrender up the three English officers; he went to his commanding officer and told him what the rebels had offered him and said:—'I have eaten the Company's salt and I am loyal and faithful to you whatever may have happened to my brother.' He drove the rebels who were attacking them, and carried the English officers safe into Lahore. That was a conspicuous and not a solitary instance of the loyalty of which our fellow subjects in India are largely capable."

THE Lieutenant-Governor unveiled on Monday last the portrait of the retired Municipal Secretary Mr. Turnbull, subscribed for by his friends and painted by Mr. James Archer and hung at the Town Hall.

WE are afraid the writer of the Moorshedabad letter in our last has made a mistake, and in doing so caused pain in a respectable quarter. We have received a contradiction to his statement that, since the appointment of the new chairman, members have begun to resign beginning with Mr. Livesay, Executive Engineer, Nuddea Rivers Division. We are informed that the Chairman Kumar Banajit Sinha of Nashipur is on good terms with his colleagues, and that the Engineer member has not resigned, though, owing to his official duties, he has not been able to attend the meetings of late. We expect our correspondent to make the amende.

THE Doveton murder case has been committed to the Sessions.

THE Home remittances last week amounted to £340,900.

THE Lahore Correspondent of the Eastern Herald writes:—

"Some of the choicest animals and birds belonging to the late Nawab Wajid Ali Shah of Lucknow were brought here on their way to the Ameer of Cabul and there was a regular rush of visitors at the Lahore Station on Saturday last. It is said that the sale of platform tickets amounted to nearly Rs. 100."

We wonder if the Mirror finds any difficulty in identifying the "late Nawab" of Lucknow. That description is typical of Baboese, pure and simple, of Calcutta which our contemporary so well represents.

NOTES AND LEADERETTES.

THE Queen-Empress had been to Berlin on a visit to her son-in-law, the ailing emperor. Her Majesty has returned accompanied by Princess Beatrice and Prince Henry of Battenberg. The bulletins about the emperor's health are not so gloomy as in last week.

LORD DUNRAVEN has withdrawn his Bill for the Reform of the Constitution of the House of Lords, Lord Salisbury having undertaken to bring in a Bill to facilitate life-pepages.

MR. LABOUCHERE questioned in the House of Commons on the Hyderabad scandals. The Under-Secretary Sir John Gorst, not unknown at Hyderabad, replied that a Parliamentary enquiry into the conduct of the Nizamut ministers in regard to the Deccan mining Concession was not desirable, and that Her Majesty's Government could not interfere in the internal administration of Hyderabad. At the same time, if the Nizam asked for an enquiry, every assistance will be given him. Lord Randolph Churchill followed on the reply, pressing for a Committee on the London part of the business. The reply to his Lordship was reserved.

ANOTHER Minister of Native India has "bolted" after the French manner, so lately exemplified by General Boulanger. This time it is no "broth of a boy," however, but a venerable man. His Excellency Dewan Bahadoor Raghoo Nath Rao of Indore has come back to Madras. It is reported that he has neither resigned, nor been dismissed, nor has he received permission to leave Indore.

WE regret that our Central Indian contemporary the Eastern Herald was premature in announcing the retirement of Mr. Shyamaji Krishna Varma from Rutlam, on which our paragraph on the subject was based. His Excellency is still there. But the end cannot be far off, we fear. We hope the Maharaja will give him another chance.

WE are informed by telegraph that Mr. F. Henvey, the new Agent to the Governor-General in Central India, has reached Indore to take charge of the Agency from Sir Lepel Griffin. To-day Sir Lepel lays at Mhow the foundation-stone of Bhicajee Girls' School which Khan Bahadur Khory builds in memory of his late lamented wife. Mr. Khory also invests some money in Government security for scholarship to successful girls, styling it Sir Lepel Griffin's scholarship.

WHO is the mysterious magnate whom the Indian Spectator has unearthed under the name and style of "Maharajah Ajit Sing, the king of Marwarees and merchants of Khetri," and who, we are told, for the first time in his life, visited Bombay, and was received "by his subjects with loyal ovation"? If he has established a bank for poor agriculturists, he has done a right noble thing. If he advances money on agricultural improvements, he does even better. We hope our contemporary will procure particulars of these advances. They cannot, at any rate, be the myths that most of the remissions of lacs and lacs of revenue that we so often hear of and on the strength whereof many have secured titles and distinction, are. We are curious as to the rules and working of the bank.

The rest of the credits placed to his account, are complementary or complimentary. We hope infanticide had been effectually put down in Rajwara before Ajit Sing was born. The celebration of the Queen's Jubilee, in behalf whereof we are not aware of his having done anything in particular, was a matter of course. Not so the offer to the British Government of a subsidy of 500 men made during the Egyptian troubles. That bespeaks a loyal and ambitious chief. But has noble Ajit ignored the menace nearer home on the North-Western Frontier? Perhaps, his silence on this occasion, on which so many Princes and chiefs are vying with one another to show their loyalty for the Imperial Power, is meant for a protest against too much ado for nothing. That is an attitude which, even if it be not justified by the facts, is at once intelligible and intelligent, and not unworthy of a statesman. That a chief capable of it should advance the cause of civilisation, is nothing extraordinary.

But who is this valuable magnate? Is it the young Raja of Khetri in Rajputana? If so, how comes he in particular to be the "King of the Marwarees," even though he may loosely be allowed to be the king of the "merchants of Khetri"? If anybody is the King of the Marwarees, it is the Maharaja of Jodhpore. Jodhpore is another name for Marwar, where Marwarees most do congregate, though many are scattered about in more or less force in the neighbouring states. Even in a literary way, it is a misnomer to call the chief of Khetri the King of the merchants of Khetri. Khetri is no body in fact, even in Khetri itself—certainly, no King. He is himself a feudatory of Jeypore. We wonder how that Durbar regards the political activity of the sub-chiefship!

THE loan for the Hooghly bridge, connecting Calcutta and Howrah, having been paid off, it has been decided that the local tolls should be abolished and some terminal charges, namely on rice and grain, pulses of all sorts, seeds of all sorts and salt—be remitted. This relieves trade to the extent of Rs. 1,60,000, exclusive of Rs. 66,000 on wheat formerly remitted. There is a proposition also to make over 2 lacs from the surplus to the Calcutta Corporation, in aid of the proposed road from the bridge towards Sealda. To give effect to these recommendations, the Hon'ble Mr. Macaulay has obtained leave to introduce a bill in the local legislature to amend the Bridge Act IX of 1871.

MR. CHARLES DICKSON, late Inspector of Audit and Accounts, East Indian Railway, has failed in his suit against his employers. He claimed damages to the tune of three-quarters of a lac, and Mr. Justice Trevelyan does not consider him entitled to more than Rs. 350, one month's pay, which had been offered. To complete his misfortune, not only has his suit been dismissed, but he has been cast in costs. It amounts to a hint to resort to that unfailing Pain-killer the Bridge of Sighs.

THE Hindoo Patriot of this week opens its article on the Deputation to Sir Steuart Bayley regarding the Municipal Bill thus:—

"Sir Steuart Bayley's reply to the deputation, that waited on him on Tuesday last has been received by the native public with an intense feeling of disappointment. It offers them stone when they wanted bread. They sought for sympathy, and they have been treated to what they cannot take to be other than keen sarcasm. They sought for help, and they have met with unkind rebuff. His Honor began with a profession of regard for the deputation that waited on him, but he falsified the profession by showing that all their representations were utterly worthless. He condemned the deputation for being 'too late,' when he knew well that the case was otherwise. The meeting which sent the deputation was held by way of a protest against the action of the Legislative Council, and could not be held until the action was an accomplished fact. An appeal could scarcely be filed until after judgment had been delivered in the lower courts."

Et tu Brute? We thought that this staid sober journal at least would have the sense to see, and the candour to say, that, under the circumstances, specially at the time, the Lieutenant-Governor could not be expected to do more than he has done. The argument in vindication of delay takes one's breath away. According to it, the memorialists are self-convicted of being too early in the field. They ought to have waited for the passing of the Bill. But what shall we say of the strange misunderstanding of Sir S. Bayley's politeness?

THE East's Tangail correspondent relates an interesting case of conjugal fidelity and attachment in that Subdivision. A young girl, 14 or 15 years of age, by name Kamini, was the victim of a brutal attack with a large dao by her husband, a habitual ganja smoker, on account of some altercation between them. She was conveyed to the local Hospital for treatment, but the Doctor reporting her case precarious, the Sub-Divisional officer, Babu Girindra Nath Chatterjee, went to the hospital to take down her dying declaration. The ruling principle of a true Hindu wife was strong to the last. Her husband was still her god, here and hereafter, all vagaries of his notwithstanding. She rejected with scorn any proposition intended to do her justice by punishing the man. So far from complaining against her husband, she reproached herself for being the author of all their calamity. To the cautious questioning of Mr. Deputy Magistrate Girindra Nath Chatterjee, she answered—"I am come here not to bring a case against my husband but to get cured of my wounds. It is my own fault that I have been hurt. Oh! Do not give him any trouble; I so wish to see him!" The uninitiated reader has to be informed that it is by the third personal pronoun singular that a Hindu woman indicates her husband; it is highly improper for her to take her husband's name, or that of any of her relations of higher degree in both her father's and her father-in-law's families. The husband being brought before her, the poor suffering girl tenderly questioned him as to whether he had had his meals, and if so, what he had eaten and whether he had had any trouble or hardship to bear. Everybody was struck with the imposing grandeur of the situation—the nobleness of that country girl's demeanour and her stoical dutifulness to an worthy husband—and his hang-down head of late remorse. Here is a well-marked instance of the betterness of Simple faith than Norman blood.

Such steadfastness is the glory of the wife everywhere and is especially the virtue of the Hindu wife. No external polish will compensate for its loss. At the same time it correspondingly augments the responsibility of the males.

That little incident at Tangail is a subject worthy of the poet. The husband has been committed to the Sessions. Meanwhile, we are glad to note that the wife is improving under the care of the Native Assistant Surgeon.

THE annual boating match between the two great English Universities came off on the 24th March. After a long course of favoritism towards the older institution, the fickle goddess of fortune went over to the other side and has been as partial to it since as she had been to Oxford before. This year her partiality knew no bounds. There was no match, strictly speaking. The advantage was all on one side—that of Cambridge. The experts had all predicted for Cambridge an easy triumph, and the event proved them right. Cambridge won quietly and by a great length. Oxford had no chance. Her mallas were no match for the manjees of the Cam. They were excellent at the oar, having undergone infinite drill and practice in general. They too rowed 42 to the minute, but then their opponents were picked men whose strokes went farther.

MR. BRADLAUGH is getting on famously, all round. Now that he has conquered the obstinate prejudice against him of the House of Commons, the courts too show a disposition to do him justice. He has been seeking redress for foul libel against the St. Stephen's Review. The defendants unblushingly admitted that the statement complained of "was written with but one view, and that was to support the Conservative party at Deptford and elsewhere." That was a fine justification for 'falsely taking away a man's reputation! It is hard to believe that it was actually put forward as a plea in a British court. It looks like a plea collusive set up on purpose to damage the Conservatives. The court, we are glad to read, took a proper view of the defendants' conduct. Both the Judges of the Queen's Bench denounced the conduct of the offending journal and the cool cynicism of the apology for it offered.

THE bench of the grandest human tribunal has lost its head. Chief Justice Waite of the United States is dead. The Supreme Court of the great Republic is a unique institution, next to Congress in dignity and scarcely less in importance. It is the arbiter of the different States and the interpreter of the Constitution of the Union itself. As the authority that can disallow any State legislation, it naturally labors under a prejudice throughout the vast republic. Under this disadvantage, it has to keep the peace between, and to give satisfaction to, some forty ardent self-governing communities. Fortunately, law, like the rest of the liberal professions in the country, is well stocked with ability and learning, and the chief court of the land has been worthily filled. The names of Chief Justices Marshall and Chase are pronounced with the highest respect in all courts throughout the world. Waite was a worthy successor of these great men. A thorough patriot and Republican, his great eminence in the bar pointed him out as the fittest man to plead the American cause before the Geneva Arbitration. He had no easy task of it there, and he had to meet such antagonists as Sir Roundell Palmer. He acquitted himself so well that when, soon after, President Grant had to find a successor to Chief Justice Chase, all eyes turned to Morrison R. Waite as the fittest lawyer and citizen to uphold the dignity of the judicial throne in the Republic and, as we have said, grandest judicial office on the globe. For the last fourteen years, he filled the post with conspicuous ability and independence. In a country in which no office is above suspicion, he passed unscathed; no breath of calumny touched him. In a nation distinguished for able lawyers, there might be others as learned and acute, but in a land torn by political conflict and steeped in party bitterness, his impartiality was as rare as it was invaluable.

His career may be profitably studied by the indifferent lawyers and weak men who fill the benches of our High Courts. These courts have not only deteriorated in talent but also in spirit. The very incumbents are—aging or what we don't know, but distinctly declining on a lower plane. Some fine reputations are in jeopardy.

MERCY but murders, pardoning those that kill, and we have never spared the people of Santipur which has ever been torn by internal dissensions, thus justifying the description of it by one of the wisest, brightest, (and shall we add?) meanest of Indian Civilians, as "the mis-called city of peace." But we take this opportunity of confessing our lurking fondness for the place. Santipur is a classic seat, one of the most ancient places in Bengal, distinguished for art and culture and sanctity. It is still perhaps the largest and most populous of our rural towns not being official stations. It has men enough and to spare, only few—too few alas! of the right sort. Hence its decadence. We are right glad to observe signs of a little leaven being at last applied to leaven the whole mass. For once, the Santipurians have, it would seem, dismissed all baser counsels, sordid views and vengeful feelings, and have realized that there is no salvation in matters municipal! For once, we have gathered grapes of thorns and figs of thistles! Variety alone gives joy,

The sweetest meats the soonest cloy, and the Municipality having by degrees lost its youthful charms, the people of Santipur have sought a fresh field and pasture new. They have started a charitable society whose objects are to relieve the aged and the destitute and to provide for maintenance and education of pauper children without distinction of class or creed. Founded in 1883, the Bandhu Sabha—for such is the name of the society—has now for over four years ministered to the wants of the poor of the town—men whom the sun and moon do not light and to whom mother Earth is a step-dame.

When the Santipur people agree, their unanimity is wonderful, and the Sabha is, we are glad to see, a combination of the wealth, intelligence and education of the town. Indeed, we should not be very far from truth, were we to say that the Santipurian who is not a member of the society is no more a gentleman than the Nadiyaite, who does not own at least an acre of rent-free land being gift from Maharaja Krisna Chandra, is a Brahman. The Report shows that the income of the society, during the last year, derived from donations and subscriptions, amounted to Rs. 890-11-9 pies and the expenditure to Rs. 846-9-3 pies, besides it has Rs. 907-3-9 in the Savings Bank. That is a poor exchequer for such objects and at such a place, where there must be a good deal of misery. But anything for a beginning! Relief was administered last year to 88 persons, 34 of whom received monthly pensions. Of course, the demands upon the society are daily increasing, and the funds at its disposal must be enlarged.

* The Sabha is said to have in Babu Kirti Chunder Roy an excellent Honorary Secretary. Why don't we see the Saviour of Santipur—we mean Mathuara Babu, on the committee?

THERE is a regular Rakshasi in Japan—a juvenile giantess of twelve years of age, eight feet high and weighing 14 stone less one quarter. These waifs and strays from Brobdingnag must have great difficulty in finding in our diminutive world suitable partners in life. Here is an opportunity for poor Chung the Chinese giant, who sometime back had been the observed of all observers. There would be no fear of miscegenation or religious antagonism in the union of Jack Chinaman and Joan of Japan, while the eternal fitness of things will be maintained even to the verification of the proverb in the superiority of the grey mare over the horse.

MEXICO is more than in name New Spain. The conquistadors and colonists carried to the new world all their peculiarities and preferences. Indeed, the more barbarous customs which are gradually being discredited in the mother country, or are dragging a diminishing existence there, are mostly in high favour in Greater Spain beyond the Atlantic Main. Thus bull-fight—the domestic institution par excellence of the Spaniards—still flourishes in pristine vigour in Mexico. The fact is recalled to the civilised world by the news of a frightful calamity. So passionately fond are the people of the game, that, though orthodox Catholics, they do not scruple to have the bloody business on the Sabbath; it is indeed on Sundays that bull-fights are held. Perhaps a stronger proof of attachment is that the very prisoners in the state jails are humoured with the sight of the exhibition. The authorities meekly make arrangements for these unfortunates or enemies of society enjoying the spectacle, under proper custody. Such was the case on a recent Sunday, in the town of Celaya in Mexico, on the occasion of a bull-fight. It was a wooden house in which it was held, and the house was crowded to suffocation. One of the prisoners, in striking a match, set fire to the bull-ring. As usual, there was an immediate panic and a rush to the exits. The occupants of the higher galleries even jumped into the arena and hurt themselves, while a bull, bewildered by the novel scene, broke loose, attacked and impaled the unfortunates in the arena, on the horns of a pretty dilemma, completing the rout and confusion. Between the crush and the active hostility of Taurus, there were 18 killed, 68 badly wounded, some of whom are not expected to live, while over 150 escaped with simple hurt. When order was restored, the prisoners, from whom the fire originated, were nowhere. The astute rogues!

HYDERABAD.

WITH the suspension of Abdul Huq, there is at last a glimmering of dawn at Hyderabad. It was a very bold step that the young Nizam and his young Minister took between them. Of course, they have the fullest support of the Viceroy in what they have done. It is in fact the Governor-General's doing, so far as any measure of internal administration of a native State may, without invidiousness, be so described. Yet full credit must be given to Mr. Howell. It inaugurates a new era in the Residency. The days of obscurantism and jobbery and the noctes ambrosianæ, enlivened by Shiraz and Burgundy, and Anacreontics and Sapphics—in word and deed—have gone by, we hope never to return. There will now be not only possibility of work but of good work at Secunderabad. Mr. Howell has begun well, and we trust he will continue the same straightforward course, without fear or favour, regardless even of repulse or temporary defeat. These he must be prepared for. Those who are interested in the present confusion will not give up their game without a struggle, and great and even desperate efforts will be made to subdue the bear of a new Resident who means honest work. Meanwhile, we congratulate both Governments on the removal of an incubus which at once lowered British prestige and sacrificed Hyderabad. Great as the Governor-General is, his Agent in Native States is practically greater. If the Agent is obstinate, and able enough withal, he may virtually defy his principal. So long as Mr. Cordery remained in office at Hyderabad, there was little chance of a reform. At one time indeed there was hope, when the specific allegations of the Statesman's Correspondents, and our own representations, we may add, attracted the eye of Lord Ripon and he actually ordered the Resident up to Simla for trial as it were. That officer himself understood the full significance of the invitation. Awaking to his danger at last, he hastily dismissed of his entourage the worse lot that had most demoralised him, and began a change of personal habits before starting to meet the Great British Mogul in the mountains of the North. It was a superfluous caution, more due to a perturbed conscience than necessary for safety. There is no danger to a British Civil Servant in India, unless of a scratch. There is never a real fear of a fatal termination. A Civilian is like a cat with its nine lives. Mr. Cordery was at first received with coldness, but under the genial warmth of his classicism, and the influence of his plausibility and doubtless his friends' exertions, the viceregal sternness melted away. Everybody at Simla seemed to have been charmed. As if they had in the hills been all cultivating the sensuous side of Paganism—we mean Greek poetry and thought. Presumably, it was the effect of that fellow-feeling which makes us wondrous kind, and which is developed most in exile. In the enthusiasm of the unexpected symposia which "society" owed to the presence of so thorough a modern British Greek, the very logic of prima facie appearances was swamped. Not only were those who were in the Government of India talked over, and disarmed, but we ourself heard those who were out, declare their newborn trust in the male syren. These good men went so far as to commiserate him for the unkindness of Nature in giving false testimony against him.

Thus was Cordery whitewashed. He returned to Hyderabad, if not quite as the Conquering Hero, at any rate considerably relieved, with a simple warning, by way, we suppose, of justifying the call to account in propria persona.

Thus was crushed the only hope that Hyderabad or its friends had ever ventured to indulge during the régime of Lord Ripon. The Resident did not plunge back into his old ways, certainly not to anything like their old extravagance, but he was as careless as ever, leaving everything as before to his subordinates. Major Trevor remained almighty. It was this officer who would have quartered his brother on the State and, failing in the attempt, forked out from it a fabulous sum for him. It was he rather than his Chief, who encouraged the intrigues which resulted in the famous double-barrelled Boy Administration—which was a huge joke to us but which was a serious calamity to the Deccan. Having created an impossible arrangement, the Thor and Woden Holloway's Pills and Ointment.—Travellers to and from distant climes would do well to bear in mind that these changes and the altered diet and surroundings of their lives entail manifold risks to health. Occasions are sure to arise in which they will need a remedy such as these renowned Pills and Ointment, and no traveller by land or sea should ever fail to have a supply at hand. Then he may truly be said to have a physician always at his call for the various emergencies of travel. Chills and fevers should be promptly treated, and the printed directions should be carefully studied at the commencement of any illness, for Holloway's remedies can be safely used in all climates.

of Secunderabad did not take ordinary care to see it work. They did not simply leave it to die a natural death, but even hampered it so as to precipitate a violent end. They allowed the State to be fleeced, by all sorts of depredators. The juvenile minister was encouraged to enjoy the otium cum dignitate of an incorporeal hereditament—a family provision in reward for his father's services—rather than urged to fulfil the onerous duties of a most responsible and most difficult post. He was not restrained in his unworthy vulgar upstart ways. Nay, he was allowed to forget that he was not the master of the State, but only a servant occupying the highest office in it. He was not reminded of his duty to his Sovereign. It was the conduct of the Politicals—their openly demonstrated friendship for young Salar and their flattery of him at the expense of the Nizam, that inflamed the young spirit and turned the immature noddle of the premier employé, who regarded himself superior not only to the premier nobleman who had been his father's colleague in the administration, but also to the Nizam himself. He apparently thought that his Sovereign was Queen Victoria. He had formed European connections, notably with a great Parliamentary chief. So long as he maintained these, and so long as the Residency chiefs continued to break bread and drink champagne with him, he reckoned himself safe. Hence his atrocious behaviour to his master. While the Residency looked on, the breach between the two young friends, once so loving, went on widening. At last, the Nizam could endure the connection no more, and he complained to the Viceroy and asked to be relieved. Lord Dufferin listened with patient sympathy—it was the longest conference ever granted by a British functionary to any native Prince—and assured the Nizam that His Highness was master and Salar Jung was wholly at his mercy. At the same time, the British Government could not forget the services of Salar the father to both the Empire and the State. It was on this public ground, whatever the other forces at work, that Lord Ripon had raised the boy, at once as his father's heir and as representative of the Reform Party in Hyderabad, to the head of the Administration. Before leaving, Lord Ripon had expressed an earnest wish that young Jung might be supported. Lord Dufferin was naturally desirous to continue, so far as possible, his predecessor's policy, and carry out his wishes. Accordingly, the Nizam was requested to give him another trial. His Highness respectfully assented and loyally carried out his promise; but it was in vain. Although the minister was rebuked and warned to behave himself better in future, he practically gave no heed to the fatherly counsel. The differences between master and minister broke out afresh, while the administration drifted into the hands of the ambitious and the grasping, who made the most of their opportunities. The Sovereign could not look on like the Residency. He again strove to end the vicious régime. Still our Government's patience with their protégé had not been exhausted, and, at the instance of the Residency, as a last experiment, an English Private Secretary was given to the Nizam as the medium of communication between His Highness and the Minister. By procuring this arrangement, the Residency committed suicide, as it were. It was the introduction into the theatre of Deccan politics of a new and strange force with functions undefined and elastic, capable, at discretion or at any rate by indiscretion, of any expansion. It was a Frankenstein's monster which the politicals assisted to raise, but could not lay down. It was a smart device, creditable to the ingenuity of its originator, for postponing the evil day. In any other court, it might have some chance. But at Hyderabad, the disease had gone too far to the very poisoning of blood of the body politic and administrative, for a mere patching up of wounds to succeed. Above all, it had no pretence of bringing about an understanding between master and minister, without which it was not peace but only an armed neutrality. It simply invited an ally who gradually usurped everything. At first, the new Mayor of the Palace, called Private Secretary, was content to secure his own position. But soon he espied the nakedness of the land and made himself all in all. During his noviciate, great was the joy of the Mehdi Hasans and Abdul Huqs, whose tool he submitted to be, for now they would have all pleasures of power and pelf without incurring any share of responsibility. It was these dry-nurses of the Minister who reconciled him to the introduction of the new element as a great relief to him. But soon there came an awakening. Directly the new functionary acquired some experience in his situation, the ministers and understrappers, premier and politicals, all discovered, to their chagrin and surprise, that they had played themselves into the hands of a formidable enemy in the guise of a friend who had quietly superseded them all.

As soon as the Residency saw it, it made the best of a bad bargain, by identifying itself with the usurper and reaping what advantages it could. At first, the Nizam was humoured by being allowed to call the Minister to account for some of his acts. This drove the latter from his post, which he left without leave or notice, to seek counsel of his friends in Europe. This was an opportunity for aggrandisement. A new Minister was appointed in the person of an irreproachable nobleman who was then away in England. Instead of waiting for him, a whole administration was cast, down almost to ministerial agency, by the usurpers in the spot and imposed upon him, even before he came back. His very Private Secretary was appointed behind his back. But since its Mahomedan Sovereign had to submit to a European Private Secretary of others' choice, Hyderabad had lost its sense of the sanctity of that very particular office. As might be expected, soon the new Minister discovered what a cat's paw this precious intermediary was making of both himself and his master. To the Nizam, his magisterial Private Secretary became unsupportable. In order to maintain his hold, with or without the Nizam's good will, the Secretary and his allies hit upon a grand idea which must come to the business and bosom of not only the Viceroy, who had devoted himself to strengthen the defences of the Empire against foreign attacks, but of all Britons, here or in the mother-country. This was the famous offer, professedly emanating from the personal solicitude of the Nizam, and announced with all the accessories for dramatic effect, of sixty lacs of Rupees towards the cost of the imperial defences, which was the signal for all the Princes and Chiefs to come forward in the same behalf. This has become a delicate matter to comment upon. The Nizam ought to have done the thing if he did not. He has certainly acquired no small honor for it and Colonel Marshall no little praise. But latterly, the Viceroy had, we believe, some reason to suspect the complete genuineness and spontaneity of the famous message conveyed in person by the grand Private Secretary. The success of Sir Thomas Rumbold in draining the impoverished State of a large sum on a frivolous pretence to which we, along with the Statesman and the Pioneer, pointedly drew attention, still farther strengthened his Lordship's doubts as to the fidelity of these European officers in watching the Nizam's interests. Imagine the viceregal indignation when inquiry disclosed the disgraceful way in which "Our Faithful Ally" was being treated. The questions, as we have said, were too delicate for further stirring up, but, we believe, His Excellency was for a clean sweep of the leading characters in the drama. Finally, both narrowly escaped—Mr. Cordery by application for furlough. For Colonel Marshall, it was urged that his appointment was only temporary, limited to a year and a half, and as the term would be soon determined, any disturbance of the arrangement earlier would prejudice the Colonel unnecessarily, the more so, as after the high credit but recently given him, Government could not stultify itself by singing to a different tune. But, though he was spared for the moment, he was sternly warned, if we are truly informed, to take care and leave off his pranks, and, above all, never to forget that he is only the Nizam's servant. At the same time, Mr. Cordery was rated for his weakness in giving in to Colonel Marshall. He was enjoined to remember that he was the Resident and to allow no one to supersede him practically, not even the great Marshall. He was to confine himself strictly to his rôle of adviser and friend to the Nizam and his Government. But, under the peculiar circumstances of the creation of a European Private Secretary, he was to see that Colonel Marshall did not ill use the Nizam.

Thus we have given a succinct and true account of Hyderabad politics during the last five years, with the exception of one notable episode—the Abdul Huq scandal. That affair, after having these several years been kept alive by our contemporary of the Statesman, is now ablaze. Too long has this astute ex-Police-officer played such fantastic tricks before High Heaven as makes angels weep, all the while gathering his pagoda harvests for himself and his confederates, until the recent strong attitude taken by Lord Dufferin in Hyderabad matters, which has freed the Durbar from the usurped dictation of the despotic Private Secretary supported by a weak Residency. The retirement of Mr. Cordery and the accession to the Residency of Mr. Arthur Howell have completed the emancipation. The new Resident was not pledged to continue the old abuses of the British diplomatic camp at Secunderabad, nor had he any temptations against loyally carrying out the Viceroy's policy. There is accordingly a distinct departure in the Residency attitude since Mr. Howell has taken office. Emboldened by these favouring auguries, the Nizam and his minister made bold to bring the hitherto irresistible Child of Fortune Abdul Huq to book. He was called to account for the latest of his numerous Loots at the expense of the resources and credit and honour of the State. He was to explain how he came to make money by disposing of mining concessions obtained by him from his own State, and how he disobeyed express orders about the issue of certain shares in a projected company. He gave a lame reply to some of the points and treated the rest with contempt. He has been suspended with the full approval of the Viceroy.

Meanwhile, the fall of Abdul Huq exercises the House of Commons, as it doubtless draws the sympathy of many influential British men and women. Mr. Labouchere's question could be easily evaded, but Lord Randolph Churchill is not to be suppressed. In his Lordship's hands the Hyderabad scandal came in such a questionable shape that, for its own reputation, the Ministry must speak to it and speak to the point. Accordingly, Sir John Gorst took time to telegraph to the Viceroy. After receipt of answer, Mr. W. H. Smith announced to the House that Lord Dufferin had no objection to a Parliamentary inquiry. Suddenly Mr. Labouchere's motion revived. His demand for a Select Committee of the House for inquiry into the Mining Concession was accepted by the Ministry.

This is a most important victory. The Indian record of Parliament is an almost unbroken scroll of neglect and disappointment. The name of India is an abomination to British politicians. It acts as physic to the Houses in purging them of all their human contents. We do not remember if after Fawcett's Committee on Finance, the India Reformers have ever scored such a triumph. We hope the best use of it will be made by our friends. At the same time, it is but fair to remember that we owe it entirely to the Viceroy—the unspeakable diplomat Dufferin!

PRE-BRITISH INDIA.

BABER.

V.

KHUSROU SHAH, at this time, held the reins of Government in Bactria, which used to be the Government of a paternal uncle of Baber's. This Khusrou Shah had murdered his late master (Baber's uncle) and usurped the throne, but he did not feel very secure in his exalted position, and therefore was desirous of conciliating his late master's relatives. From this motive he endeavoured to win Baber's good will, and invited him into his territory. It was not long after Baber's arrival that the whole of the Moguls withdrew from the usurper's service and offered their services to him. They were soon followed by the whole army and even Khusrou's own brother came over to his side. The vicissitudes attending Baber's life are well illustrated by the circumstances that occurred to him here. When he approached the Bactrian frontier, he had between two and three hundred men, many of whom were only armed with clubs, and two tents, the best one of which was allotted for his mother's use. It was par excellence the camp and following of an adventurer. When shortly afterwards he left Bactria, and set out to invade Cabul, he was at the head of a regular and well-equipped army. Baber occupied Cabul almost without opposition. He afterwards lost Bactria, which was recovered by Khusrou Shah, and subsequently conquered by the Uzbegs. His connection with the country beyond the Mountains was thus entirely cut off. He was now King of Cabul, over which country he reigned for two and twenty years, before his conquest of India. An army from beyond the Hindoo Coosh, pursuing Baber's line of march, at the present time, would not find it so easy a march as he did; the conquest of Cabul bristles with difficulties. The conquest of India would offer almost insurmountable difficulties, except if Afghanistan were in alliance with the invader, and even then, if internal insurrection could be avoided, the probabilities are the invading army would almost be annihilated. But the question is, Could internal insurrection be avoided? Many fear it could not be, and their reasons for supposing so are not chimerical. If internal insurrection is not a factor to be considered, India may laugh to scorn the threats of the Northern Bear; she may snap her fingers at an unfriendly or inimical Afghanistan. The whole question of warfare has not only completely altered since Baber's days, but the change within the past thirty years has been so marked, that to-day the entire question has to be discussed on a different basis, and from different data, to those even of a quarter of a century ago.

Baber though King at Cabul, had not yet attained to a state of repose. He was still surrounded by toils and perils, though they had assumed a different form and character. His title was defective and doubtful; he had no minister in whom he could place his full confidence and trust; his brother Jehangir had but lately joined him after being long in rebellion, and his presence was cause for disquiet in a newly-conquered country ; and the last and most portentous of his troubles was his army, which was only an assemblage of adventurers, who were strangers to him, and most of whom had been traitors to their former masters.

During the first years of his reign, he conquered Candahar ; made expeditions into the mountains of the Afghans and Hazaras ; and a dangerous journey to Herat. On these campaigns, he ran the usual risks, and bore more than the usual hardships of war incidental to the common soldier, and once nearly perished in the snow, during a winter march through the mountains of the Hazaras. To add to his causes for disquietude, his brother Jehangir again rebelled, but was subdued and pardoned : his Mogul troops, while he was at Herat, broke into insurrection and set up one of his cousins as king ; this cousin was also defeated and pardoned ; but the climax of these troubles was reached when he returned to Cabul, and he was brought to the brink of ruin in that city. The Moguls who had come over to him from Khusrou Shah's army, tried to seize his person, and thus showed the first signs of disaffection. These mutinous Moguls failed in their attempt, but Baber was obliged to fly from Cabul, attended only by about 500 men who had remained faithful to him. On his flight, the rebels called in his cousin Abdur Ruzzak and placed him on the throne.

Now all seemed lost, and this was probably the darkest moment in Baber's life, a moment's despondency, or the slightest hesitation, at such a crisis, would have been fatal. But Baber rose to the occasion and showed himself equal to the circumstances. He led his diminutive army again and again to encounters, during which he exposed himself in the hottest of the fight ; he made up for his small force by the boldness and activity of his enterprises ; and at last retrieved his affairs, almost entirely by his personal courage and exertion.

Baber was unfortunately induced, owing to internal troubles, to attempt again the conquest of his former possessions. He occupied Bactria, made an alliance with Shah Ismail, and, with the aid of a Persian force, took Bokhara, and again obtained possession of Sumarcand. The Uzbegs, however, soon drove him out, and ultimately he suffered a total defeat and lost all his acquisitions except Bactria. We now come to the time in the life of Baber, when he turned his attention to India, and began those enterprises, which led to the founding of his great dynasty.

VI.

Baber burst into India at the head of a body of veteran troops, and his advance was like a forcible storm, sweeping all opposition out of his path, till he reached Agra, of which city he soon became master. Of the spoils of the conquest, he made singular use. He not only, as is usual on such occasions, distributed the treasures among his followers, but also thought of his subjects at Cabul. To every man, woman and child, whether slave or free, he sent a present, derived from the same source. Baber had ever an open hand.

Baber probably believed that his conquest of India was achieved through his possession of the capital, but he was soon undeceived with regard to this opinion. The people of India soon let him know de facto, how far his power extended, that is to say, only over a portion to the northwest of Delhi and the narrow tract along the Jumna to Agra ; and these he was in actual possession of. The whole of the rest of the country displayed a hostile disposition, nor did the Rajahs and Chiefs of those days remain long content to manifest passive opposition, but organized a combination for active resistance, which combination soon arrayed in the field a host against the invader. And this was not the only unpleasant awakening Baber had, for at this critical period, his veteran troops, men who had followed him uncomplainingly through all sorts of dangers and hazards, and shared with him the severe hardships of a soldier's life, now began to murmur in a mutinous way. As the children of Israel, under the pressure of the hardships of desert travel, murmured and arose against Moses, as they longingly looked back to the dainties of Egypt, so these men, suffering under the extreme inflictions of an exceptional Indian summer, looked back to their cold native land with longing desire ; and as the summer advanced so did the sufferings of these men increase, till their desire for their native land became so strong that they clamourously asked to be led back. Baber, though surprised by the manifestation of such a spirit, nevertheless did not lose his presence of mind ; he acted with much tact ; he touched the right chords to obtain the response he wanted—he placed a mental picture before these men, so that the contemplation of it might so fill their minds as to leave no room for thoughts about, or cognizance of, their present trials.

Baber assembled his officers, and addressed them in spirited terms. He pointed out that the conquest of India was the object that had brought them there ; to go back now would cover them with shame and dishonour ; he would not move a single step back ; yet he would coerce none to remain ; if honour was not a sufficient inducement to keep them in India, all were free to go back. When Baber finished his appeal, his audience had so caught the infection of his spirit, that nearly all elected to remain. A few, however, adhered to their original resolution and asked for leave to go back. Among those was Khaja Kilan, one of his best officers. Baber showed no resentment at their resolve, but dismissed them honourably, appointing Khaja Kilan to a Government beyond the Indus.

From this period we find that success followed success, in Baber's career of conquest in India. Biana, Dhulpore, Chambal, and Gwalior soon submitted. These successes stirred up the combination of native princes that had been formed against him, to active operations, and an army marched on Agra, to give him battle. Twenty miles from Agra, at Sicri, the battle was fought, and Baber gained a great victory. A curious story is told regarding this battle. It is said that before the battle Baber's troops showed manifest signs of nervousness, which tendency was increased, till an absolute panic was produced among them, and this was accomplished through something worse than the stupidity of a certain Dervish from Cabul, who proclaimed aloud to the assembled troops that certain defeat awaited them that day. The man uttered this prediction with such assurance, that even the officers became infected with an undefinable feeling of fear, and could not maintain even an appearance of composure or firmness before their men. Baber seeing how unfitted his men were to be led into action, adopted the plan of addressing them, through their officers, in a few stirring words. He appealed directly to their sense of manliness and honour, and so well chosen were the words he used, in rousing their enthusiasm and producing a reaction in the mind, that the whole assemblage answered him with acclamation and an oath on the Koran to conquer or die. It was because of this crisis in his life's history, that Baber felt called upon to make some sacrifice, and accordingly he registered a vow to the God of Heaven, that should he gain the victory in the impending battle, he would, among other laudable acts, for ever forswear the use of wine. And he kept his pledge.

After the victory was gained, the audacious Dervish came before Baber to offer his congratulations thereon. Baber rated him soundly, and relieved his heart of anger, by pouring a torrent of abuse on the head of this, not only false, but mischievous prophet of ill. Baber called him a perverse, conceited, and insufferable evil-speaker. After delivering this tirade, Baber made the man a liberal present, but intimated to him that his future residence should be beyond the limits of his kingdom. We find that throughout his career Baber acted in a forgiving spirit, even when the offences against himself, or his rule, were grave. Hence we are the more puzzled to account for his feelings of aversion towards the Moguls, because it was at the hands of a Mogul that he received the greatest kindnesses that his life knew. It was his Mogul uncle who was always his friend in times of need. Baber continued from this point, to follow the tide of conquest till he had reduced Behar.

Baber was not yet fifty years old, yet doubtless his constitution had been sapped, through the exposure and hardships of his eventful life, for we find that he suffered from ill-health during the last fifteen months of his life. His diary has no entries for this period, and this indicates diminished activity, likewise interest in the affairs of life. This ill-health and listlessness pointed to the nearness of the end. Eastern tradition, however, assigns a different reason for his death. Tradition says he died because he substituted himself for his son. As has been shown, Baber had a most affectionate heart. Prince Humayun had become at this time very ill, and at last the physicians gave no hope of his recovery. Then the father took the desperate resolution of bearing away, on his own person, his son's illness, which he did in this way. He walked slowly and sadly, according to the prescribed mode, three times round the dying prince's bed, and then spent a little while in earnest prayer to God, when it is supposed he felt assured in his heart, that his prayer was heard, and his vicarious offering accepted, and his son's disease borne away, for he exclaimed repeatedly, "I have borne it away," "I have borne it away." Could Baber have foreseen the manifold trials and sufferings that would encompass Humayun's life, his most earnest prayer to God would have been that the prince might die. How often does man in prayer thus blindly ask for those things which are but the seed of great future sorrows.

Strange as it may appear, Humayun forthwith began to recover, and Baber, who was already ill, began visibly to decline, and it soon became apparent that his end was nigh. But before the end came, he called his sons and his ministers around him, explained to them his dying wishes, enjoining them to live in concord, and particularly requesting his sons to bear one another a steadfast fraternal affection. Baber died at Agra in the fiftieth year of his age. His body at his own desire was buried at Cabul. Baber displayed admirable traits of character, both as a man and a king. He was certainly the most powerful prince of his time, yet probably the most affable and kindly in his manners. Baber had achieved his high station, through personal merit alone, and under the most trying circumstances. The obstacles in his path were always crucial difficulties.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

MOFFUSSIL MUNICIPALITIES.

SIR,—The vagaries of the local Municipal Committee have at last blasted all hopes of the native gentry here. Rules too strict and stiff, are, it is said, going to be introduced. Left the natives as they are in the palpable obscurity from the light of all the municipal advantages since many years past with all the taxes paid by them and often rewarded with fines on the least ground, the Chairman or the Municipal Commissioners deem it a burden for them, perhaps, to look to the interests of the native ratepayers. Formerly, the filthy water of every house was removed at the occupier's cost, when the Municipal authorities introduced a rule disallowing the filthy water to be dried up in the drain itself. From October last, the local Municipality has taken charge of the removal of filthy water from the vats adjoining the houses, &c. Objections having been raised for the stench these waters effuse, quite injurious to the health of surrounding inhabitants, the Municipal authorities have come to the wise conclusion of increasing the taxes, provided the English quarter be excluded and low classes of people be excepted. Taxes should be levied upon the measurement of the vat. A Bengalee has to pay a monthly tax of from Re. 1-4 as. to Rs. 2-4 as. or yearly from Rs. 15 to Rs. 27 besides other taxes. Further we have been told, that it has been proposed, that three roads in the English quarter would be repaired, whereas the roads in the native quarters which are in the worst state imaginable will be left out. Sound discretion no doubt.

TRUTH.

Jamalpur, 23rd April, 1888.

Of what impertinence are not little men dressed in brief authority capable? Courtesy is a commodity which costs us nothing, and yet there are not a few Indian Civilians who are provokingly niggardly in the use of so inexpensive a thing. A letter recently written to the Commissioners of one of the oldest and most considerable Municipalities in a Metropolitan District by the Magistrate, leads me to the above remark. The note in question runs as follows: "I think, however, that the Municipal Commissioners were foolish and weak in giving rewards to their Amlas for duties for which they are paid."

The Corporators written to as above are not wood, nor stones, but men, and since the smallest worm would turn being trod upon, it need hardly be said, that the foul language held to them by the Magistrate has outraged their sense of honor and self-respect. Injurious, Mr. Editor, may be forgiven but insult never. But I am ashamed to say that there are not a few lickspittles among my colleagues who are more Christian than Christians and who would be only too glad to turn their left cheeks to the smiter of their right ones. These gentlemen are for peace at any price, peace even with dishonor: They would rather bite off their tongues than bandy words with a Pasha. They say that hard words do not break bones, nay, are innocent as the passing breeze. But are they, Mr. Editor, becoming the representatives of Her Gracious Majesty, particularly when the premises on which they are based do not justify them? The fact that has been made a peg on which to hang a tirade against the Commissioners is that we abolished the appointment of Cart-registrar for 6 months, effecting thereby a saving of Rs. 60 out of which the sum of Rs. 30 was paid to two clerks who so satisfactorily discharged the duties of the Registrar in addition to their own that the income of the Municipality from Cart registration fees was increased by Rs. 130, and instead of saying a good word for the Commissioners, the Magistrate plays the billingsgate fish-fag! I for one do not demur to the criticism of a District Officer; when honest and honorable, it never fails to produce a wholesome effect. But to use the language held by Sir Rivers Thompson to the late Hon'ble K. D. Pal, "can any criticism be conceived which is more dishonest and dishonorable" than the above? If I speak somewhat strongly, I feel very deeply.

There are two things which always test a man—a crucial test of his nature—power on the one hand, dependence on the other, how he employs the one, how he uses the other. But to this test, the gentleman who is the subject of these few lines will be found sadly wanting, for he gets on well neither with his superiors nor with his subordinates whose lives he has managed to render not worth a day's purchase. Civil Service like charity covers a multitude of sins, still he has, if I mistake not, more than once been sumjood, snubbed, nay, made to eat the humble pie by his superiors for his cantankerousness and self-sufficiency. But what is bred in the bone will stick to the flesh. After all this who will have the hardihood to deny that Local Self-Government, which has consigned us to the tender mercies of meddling Magistrates and made it possible for them to abuse our good men and true like pick pockets, is the veritable dead sea apple which is ashes to the taste. After the memorable Bankipore speech of that staunch friend of Local Self-Government Sir Steuart Bayley, under whose fostering care we have every reason to hope Municipal Government will thrive, you may have thought that the District Officers will take their cue from their master, but you may as well have expected to gather figs from thistles.

Diseases, desperate grown,
By desperate appliance are relieved,
Or not at all.

And unless Sir Steuart Bayley is pleased to make an example of his erratic brothers, it would be hoping against hope to "expect a District Officer to be as proud of the success of his own local bodies as of his own local administration." As for my colleagues who have sense enough to feel insulted, I will say to them,

Why, man, he doth bestride the narrow world
Like a Colossus, and we petty men
Walk under his huge legs, and keep about.

Men at some time are masters of their fates,
The fault, dear friends, is not in our stars,
But in ourselves, that we are aldermen.

AN INDIGNANT CORPORATOR.

SIR,—It is high time now that I should put in a good word for poor Mr. Surrender Not, who has become of late—even with a portion of "Young Calcutta," whom you described the other day with a singularly felicitous phrase, the "juvenile mobocracy"—what our Hindu ladies call chhai failiê bhângâ kul. That Mr. Surrender Not has become the butt of every skilful and unskilful archer's shafts cannot be gainsaid. Surrender Not, indeed, as your correspondent, whom I should like to call Sir Blunt, points out, has Fallen, fallen, fallen, fallen,

Fallen from his high state.

For he tried to build his edifice of fame upon the driving sand of schoolboys' praise.

Since nobody has stepped in to rescue Surrender Not, we would willingly stretch our helping hand to him. Who would not weep for Surrender Not, brave Surrender Not, Surrender Not who has no peer? For our part we would weep our eyes out, for is not Surrender Not the high-priest of a new political dispensation—and our age is rich in all sorts of dispensation—a political dispensation, which, to the thinking of the majority of "Young Calcutta," has opened boundless hopes to the down-trodden millions of India and which will, they believe, hand his name down to generations yet unborn. Be it so. Who can muster courage to argue the point with omniscient "Young Calcutta?"

Surrender Not is we are not and cannot be, but we are in full possession of most of the articles of the political faith professed by the Surrender Not is. Some of these articles of their faith we purpose to lay down for the benefit of our readers. But for a few moments we take leave of Surrender Not and turn our attention to Sir Blunt, a Knight of the Most Exalted Order of the perpetrators of gross sins against Dame Grammar. Sir Blunt, they say, was ushered into the world "with a learned lumber in his head." Sir Blunt's education commenced under the most auspicious circumstances. He first signalled himself and has been since signalling himself by a total neglect of Dame Grammar. Ah! She dear old maid who in our younger days dandled every one of us, we know not how oft. Sir Blunt had no one to instil into his youthful heart that precept, which is of supreme importance to a child, a precept which every one of us was solemnly taught to treasure up in our memory, namely, that Dame Grammar never did betray the child that loved her.

Wordsworth's famous line, "The child is father of the man" is amply verified in Sir Blunt's case: for he, who was afterwards to be the conqueror of Surrender Not signalled his childhood by being nothing daunted at the frowns of an old maid, Dame Grammar. Thus without having anything to do with Dame Grammar he flew unfledged to Shakespeare.

Would to God Sir Blunt were marriageable or which is synonymous with marketable, for in these days of bridegroom-scarcity in Bengal Sir Blunt backed by his grandiose style would fetch a high price in the hymeneal market. But stop. I am suddenly reminded of the ancient who "danced away" his marriage and my anxiety is lest Sir Blunt should "write away" his. But some might say it were to consider too cursorily to consider so. Be that as it may, this much at least is certain that Sir Blunt has, to quote a beautiful expression of Sir W. Scott, fairly written himself out.

The Shakespearian part of Sir Blunt's learning, which he considers his forte is at times seriously at fault. We quote a sentence of Sir Blunt's in which he calls in the aid of the immortal Bard of Avon--be it noted that it is Sir Blunt's way now to "unsphere the soul of Plato" and then to call in "Alliteration's artful aid" to embellish his productions:

"Dressed in little brief authority Surendra Nath would develop a variety of unamiable qualities, play such fantastic tricks before high heaven as make the angels weep--nay, pose as a Caesar till the people were provoked to cry,

Why, man, he doth bestride the narrow world, &c.

The italics are our own. We do not clearly see what the latter part of the sentence means. The words "why, man, he doth, &c," if we mistake not, were uttered by Cassius and not by the provoked people as Sir Blunt would have it. "Demagogues are despots in posse," says Sir Blunt, and he points a moral, "add to this, power, you know, pollutes whatever it touches, &c." In spite of the lofty moral it teaches, the above sentence, we are compelled to say, is at best awkwardly constructed. One or two more such instances and--to use Sir Blunt's language--"I am done." Sir Blunt writes: "Unlike merciful Heaven who with his sharpened and sulphurous bolt splits the unwedgable and gnarled oak rather than the soft myrtle, they would fight shy of the big swells and hurl their bolts on the devoted head of the weak and helpless." Sir Blunt has preached a noble sermon. One might almost say without much apology that the Sermon on the Mount seems improved upon here. I am tempted to exclaim in spite of myself, Thou noble philosopher, who would undertake to gauge thy soul's immensity! At any rate, not I, "for in tasks so bold can little men engage!"

Faith would I soar to elegise Sir Blunt but "Thou sweet poetry thou loveliest maid," between thee and me a whole ocean rolls. And moreover Sir Blunt has little need. Elegise him, we may or may not, Sir B-----is Sir B-----"for a'that."

Unwedgable, by the way, is spelt without an e. But a Shakespeare scholar like Sir B-----may with perfect impunity bid defiance to poor orthography.

Cart-loads of obsolete and vulgar words and phrases have been pressed into Sir B's service.

Hearing the above sermon Surrender Not may well say with the poor Negro: "If preachy, preachy; if floggy, floggy: but not preachy and floggy too, Massa."

This much for to-day. We would resume our task hereafter and give in detail the articles of the political faith of the Surrender-Notians for which we stand pledged to our readers.

OPINION OF THE PRESS.

It is many years since I first met, and some years since I last met, Dr. Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee, editor of the Reis and Rayyet (Prince and Peasant), and an author of high repute among the kindly, as well as acute and intellectual, people of Bengal. One of the real misfortunes of India was, and still is, Lord Macaulay's picture of the Bengalee. The picture, true perhaps as regards Nuncomar and many Bengalees, is not accurate as a representation of the people generally, taking them as an Englishman may find them if he looks fairly. If they had been unfaithful, the sad story of the Mutiny had been vastly sadder; and, apart from the Mutiny, many Englishmen could give individual instances of Bengalee faithfulness almost unique in history, taking all the circumstances of our relation to India into account. The Bengalee is generally eager for knowledge of all kinds, and is often both courageous in the expression of his opinions, and gifted to a remarkable degree with the power to express those opinions with force and precision. Mr. Fawcett once told me that an unprepared speech made, on his behalf, during an election, by a young Hindoo, surpassed, in force as well as in eloquence, any unprepared speech he ever heard made by any member of the House of Commons, if four or five members of the House were excepted.

Among the Bengalees there is a small body of men—smaller than that large province—who are, ironically, otherwise termed "Young Bengal." Some of them are no longer young, but generally aged; some have, in the course of years, been highly distinguished for their public services and their scientific and other attainments. Some have at times been misrepresented, and their language misinterpreted, so that on its return to them it has amazed none more than themselves. Nothing of this has been done by the really great administrators of India. That it has been done, however, cannot be denied.

In the forefront of this little band is the author of this book of travels, Baboo Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee—a writer of high repute, as I have said, also an administrator, as the reader will see from the title-page to this book. A keener, yet a kindlier satirist, one might seek for and not find. His use of the English language has astonished many an educated Englishman; and the quality of his reading is shown by his marvellous power of quotation; not merely from authors like Shakespeare, and Milton, and Macaulay, and men eminent in science, but from out-of-the-way old ballads, and little-known old pamphlets, in the application of which he leaves one wondering—first, how he obtained the productions at all, and secondly, how, having obtained them, he learned to apply them so appositely to the subjects which he intends them to illustrate.

Passing from the author to his book, we shall, perhaps, first of all be attracted to the work of the administrator. He comes upon a milkman's village, on which he finds fastened the grip of a Court favourite. He unloosens the grip, and re-settles the village, in the double interest of Prince and Peasant. And all the time he sees everything. The poor people bathing on the rivers' banks, have his genial and kindly, if also at times, what a Scotchman would call, his "pawky" notice. A "fair maid of Sonargoan" attracts his attention by the gracefulness with which she carries a vessel of water from the river; and, though the fair maid and he are divided by race and faith (she is Mussulman), she has his full meed of praise. Indeed, it must be admitted—and he will not be offended with me for saying so—that he never meets with a fair face, without at least giving evidence of the fact that he has eyes to see and a heart to comprehend.

Of his wide and generous sympathies, much might be said, and still leave much more to say. He meets a missionary on the river, and evidently is inclined, in writing his notes, to pass a joke on the subject. He nips it, however, in the bud, and contents himself with saying, "So new is preaching here, that the simple people said the padre had been singing in the street." He meets Catholic and Protestant missionaries on shipboard, and chuckles over their disputes, while he astonishes them by his command of the English language, and even by his knowledge of the Bible—a knowledge, I may add, which is evident in many of his writings.

A parrot falls overboard, and is drowned in its cage, to his great distress, which is not however paraded. He says: [Extract.]

These are not the words of a Christian, but of a Hindoo.

Again, he has a faithful ugly dog, whose name is Tom, and whose glory it once was to bark, with a noble independence, at some very dignified Sahibs. Our author is compelled to leave Tom behind; and here is his farewell: [Extract.]

I think this is a very fine passage, and one that will draw the author very close to the great heart of humanity, wherever the words are read. Could anything be finer than the testimony to the two foreign "gentlemen," ending with the "Bengalee pariah, my poor Tom"? Not the pariah merely, but the pariah dog. The passage is worthy of the author, and of the great mercifulness of the land that bore him.

Whoever reads this book must be prepared further to find bold and manly language. The author is no flatterer of John Bull, though he gives John his due, and admits that India owes him a great debt. Here is one passage relating to foreign fruits: [Extract.]

Among the sketches of country—word-pictures—the reader will find some exceedingly pretty, and all the more valuable in that they are taken from a standpoint purely Indian; not English. Where an English artist's mind would be filled with European ideas, the mind of this gifted Eastern artist is filled with a class of ideas totally different, yet equally instructive and certainly not less subtle and far-reaching.

On the eve of one of his journeys, our author was placed in a dilemma of a kind not unknown to travellers in India, but not on that account the less stupid. He wished to go by a particular boat, and took time by the forelock for that purpose. The fare was at first stated as 90 rupees, to pay which he offered "a new crisp, fresh British India" note for 100 rupees. "It was," he adds, "fresh from the Currency Office, and had been received only the day before from another Government department." The rest of the story is thus told: [Extract.]

The humour of the little sketch is worth something. I can fancy the author laughing even in his dismay; for he can laugh well at others, and equally well at himself. I shall only venture on one more passage; and I give it as showing the spirit of the man who dares to call his newspaper Prince and Peasant. He desired to return to his home in Bengal, and to bid adieu, for a time at last, to Independent Tipperah, where he had been located "some two years." He received the Maharajah's permission to return home; but still he could not get away. [Extract.]

There is, I think, a sound lesson in this passage; the lesson of the immense value of courtesy and urbanity in the relations of rulers and ruled. There is a great deal in that sentence, "He serve flesh and blood." The best administrator in India is not always the ablest, the man whose plans are the wisest as plans; but the man who, with plans or without them, gives confidence to the people, and confidence not merely in his justice, but also in his considerateness and forbearance. A clever man once said that the art of success in India is the art of giving good dinners. It may be so; but the peril is great—the peril of debt; and in any case the art has its limits, and its natural collapse. Even dinner and champagne pall in the end. But there is one art that never fails—the art of true courtesy; of that courtesy which, being natural, is not affected by any whim or caprice, either of the person who possesses it, or of any one with whom he has relations.

In bidding farewell to this little book, I once more recall, as I easily and very vividly can, the author's kindly face and gentle voice, as known to me many years ago. I see him, as I see Baboo Kristo Das Pal, Dr. Mahendra Lal Sircar, and some others, including a much-abused editor of the Amrita Bazar Patrika; and I feel and say, with all earnestness and sincerity, that among these are men whom the Government of India would be wise in recognising and winning entirely to its side. They are men on whom no really generous word—true as well as generous—ever is thrown away. I have compared them at times with men of kindred occupations at home, and I think that they are as a rule by far the truer gentlemen in good manners, and often in very much more than mere manners. May the great God, whose sacred Name they use as that of the Father of all, guide them to a nobler destiny than any they yet have known, and with them, and by them, bless their native land!

ASRUKANA

A Collection of poems in Bengali by
 SRIMATI GIRINDRAMOHINY DASSY
 (Author of Kabirahar, Bharat Kusum.)

Asrukana is a collection of poetical pieces of singular pathos and beauty of expression * *
 It is a series of mournful songs that the reader is here presented with and they must touch a sympathetic cord in every heart that can feel. There is a singular appropriateness in the title of the work, and in its pious dedication to the memory of the husband of the fair writer.—The Indian Nation.

The authoress is not unknown to Bengali readers. She has already published two or three poems by which she is favourably known, but between these poems and this is a difference that hardly admits of being measured.

This is poetry in life

We have read Srimati Girindra Mohiny's poems in a reverential spirit. The poems are all of a lyrical description. The lyre is soft, sweet and tender, but awfully strong.

The tone of the poems is inexpressibly gentle, inexpressibly pure, and inexpressibly tender and affectionate. It is the tone of a world mother.

Bengal should be proud of this poem—The Calcutta Review.

CONTEMPORARY LYRICS.

THE LATE MATTHEW ARNOLD.

BORN DECEMBER 24, 1822. DIED APRIL 15, 1888.

Past in a moment ; passed away,
The finest spirit of the day,
Past in the full meridian sense
Of masterful intelligence :
The thought that struck—the wit that played
With measured aim—with tempered blade—
The hand that with new laurels hung
The temple of the Mother-Tongue,
The soul that nursed from the inner fire
Which radiates from Apollo's lyre,
And crowns his favourites, now as then,
Among the foremost sons of men ;
And through, above, and o'er them all
The heart that only friends recall,
Though his the memory that lends
To all who knew him, touch of friend's !
Of open brow and cheery mien,
Earnest and playful and serene,
Brightest—where duller man may roam—
In the divine repose of Home,
Even as he lived, he passed from sight,
In all the fullness of the light ;
And, never crossed by twilight ray,
The radiant spirit flashed away.

“ Call no man happy till he die ! ”

Thrice happy he, then, we reply :

Even here on earth this mortal gone

His immortality puts on ;

For far beyond, and far behind,

Shall live his legacy of Mind,

A throbbing pulse of English thought,

Quick with the lessons that he taught.

Thrice happy he, whose buoyant youth

In light of Beauty sought for Truth,

Showed stars that guide to eyes that shine,

High-priest of Beauty's inmost shrine,

And—wheresoe'er new worships tend—

Ensued his goddess to the end !

Hard pleaded he for those hard bound

In Life's dull places' dearest round,

And to the longing listener showed

How Beauty decks the ugliest road ;

For ever, in the rushing race,

He claimed for her, her quiet place,

Bade Science, on her march of pride,

Yet list the scholar at her side,

And grasping all, her world to be,

Pause at the fount of Castaly.

His was the gift, nor sting nor smart
To lend to Raillery's keenest dart ;
Since on his cradle Humour smiled,
He played with Humour like a child,
Yet, to a great soul's instinct true,
Taught greater lessons than he knew.
How were his high imaginings
Impatient of all meaner things,
Petty words and petty deeds,
And petty creeds of kindred creeds,
Rich, d'ne counsel for a name,
All un- same,— Jars a stirred the clear
To seek beyond some worldless sun
The One in All—the All in One !
Was this unfaith? Not he who erst
His walk with God on Rydal nursed,
And votary-wise young Arnold won,
Would for such doubt disclaim his son.
High quest can ask no nobler lot ;
What ardent nature questions not ?

So, softly on the closing time
Scarce died away Sunday chime,
And on the brave overpast
The quiet church-d closed the last !
Truth's good and faithful servant, thou,
And Love thine on mystery now.

HERMAN MERIVALE.

Wimbledon, April, 1888.

NEWS AND COMMENTS.

LORD DUFFERIN is anxious to deal personally with the question of the poverty of its masses before he leaves India, and a circular has been issued calling on the local administrators to submit their reports punctually by the first of June.

THE Lucknow Advocate complains of the partizanship of the Allyghur Institute Gazette, and calls upon the Director of Public Instruction to stop the scandal. Yes, the old Syud the schoolmaster, who at his beck spins out his yarn by the yard, should confine themselves to the congenial columns of the Pioneer.

WE see that the new Sind paper with the queer name of “Everybody's Paper,” which we criticised sometime back, has found it expedient to abandon its designation. It has been rechristened the Karachi Chronicle. It is much more than a mere advertiser. In fact, it is daily looking up.

SOME magistrates—occasionally respectable ones too—are reproached with making a bear-garden of their courts. Here is a court converted into a fighting ring ! The other day, at Mirzapore, in the court of the Deputy Collector Pandit Madho Pandit, while the presiding officer was going on with the case of some characters, the prisoners in the dock fell upon one another and were mutual fisticuffing, leaving three men hors de combat.

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given, any other being unnecessary, and likely to cause confusion.

WE are glad enough to learn that the Salem municipality have elected to the chair a Mahomedan Commissioner. But we confess the following argument is beyond us:—

"That the Hindu Municipal Commissioners of the town of Salem, which only a few years ago was a scene of a great religious squabble between Hindus and Mohmmadans, have elected a Mohmmadan as their Chairman conclusively proves that the whole cry against the representative government is based on sentiment rather than on real grounds."

PANDIT Shyamji Krishna Varma, Dewan Bahadur, who was reported to have left Rutlam bag and baggage, and was next reported to be staying and to mean to stay, has, after all, gone on two months' leave, preparatory to his retirement. In the meantime, the Nab Dewan Baboo N. C. Rajwats as Dewan.

RAJA RAMESHWARA SINGH Bahadur, brother of the Maharaja of Durbhanga, has been exempted from personal attendance in Civil Courts.

It appears that the Chota Maharani of Bulrampore (Jaipal Koer) sent her Indian counsel, Mr. F. T. Forbes, a Lucknow barrister, to England to represent her in the Privy Council. The judgment of the Judicial Committee in the great Bulrampore Appeal having been published, Mr. Forbes, who went home last August, has returned to India.

THE widow of Maharaja made peace with all things even to the law and religion.

The burden of her new position as the royal mother preyed for her, and she succumbed to the malady that had been preying upon her for some time.

THE American savant, Professor Hugo Blanck, has come to the conclusion that an electric current through water purifies it, by killing, of all the germs of disease therein. Here is a hint to our Health Officer. Can not the Calcutta ponds be improved thereby instead of being filled up?

A BRUTAL murder of love is reported in Venice:—
 "One of the most brutal murders committed last week in Venice, a city singularly revolting kind. Giovanni seems, fallen desperately in love with Giustina. As the girl steadily repels his absorbing passion, he left Venice to find work there. In this apparent return to Venice, sending his wife to that occupied by her sister Anna, he crept up and found her on the floor. He had gone to a room upon her balcony, where he lay lifeless on the stones, he fired a revolver and then in a frenzy of rage threw on to her body a knife which he had cut out his brains with the cut open the veins of the blood streamed from his sangue mio! Before the police could arrive he was a dead man. The murder was a dishonourable passion for his beautiful sister-in-law, who had invariably treated him with coldness and disdain."

WE read in the Lucknow Advocate:—
 "We are glad to hear that the Edinburgh University has conferred the title of D. D. on Mr. Mortimer Sloper Howell, Judge of Aligarh and the author of an excellent Arabic grammar."

We are unable to sympathise with the writer—we are not sure we quite understand him. What is there for gratulation in this high nonsense? What do the dons of Edinburgh care about Oriental literature, and why should they single out for honour an Indian District Judge whose only contribution to learning is a grammar of an Eastern tongue? Above all, the idea of the Edinburgh University making an Indian Civil Servant a Doctor of Divinity in reward for an Arabic grammar, is rich!

Of course, we can believe that Mr. Howell has got some other title from the University, at the instance of Principal Muir, formerly Lieutenant-Governor of the N. W. Provinces of Bengal, himself a ripe Arabic scholar.

BISMARCK'S crusade against the spirit of anarchy and social revolution is proceeding vigorously. The powers he has obtained from the legislature, are not by any means left unused. Bismarck's laws are things indeed.

"Since the proclamation in Germany of the law against the Socialists, 3,948 papers and documents have been prohibited, 383 newspapers appearing in that country has been attempted, and 141 foreign newspapers have been suppressed, 296 newspapers have been suppressed, inland as well as abroad."

After that, the relentless barbarity with which we are enforcing the Crimes Act in Ireland, is a positive weakness!

Would that those of our countrymen who abuse the boon of freedom conferred on us by Britain, might learn from the above quotation!

WE read:—

"The imports of paper, pasteboard, books, and engravings into France during 1886 amounted to 31,000,000fr., against 31½ millions in 1885. The exports from that country of paper, &c., reached 45 millions, against 44½ millions of francs in 1885. Germany alone supplied some 2,490 tons of paper, pasteboards, books, and engravings, valued at 13,375,007f., whereas France exported to Germany only some 590 tons of the value of 4,308,904f."

THE minor son and nephew of a dismissed Deputy Magistrate were observable at the Government Parties of the last season, both at Government House and at Belvedere. We are not aware of their having been presented at the Levee, the son being still a schoolboy. The ex-Deputy was discreet enough not to shew himself.

TELEGRAMS about Emperor Frederick's health this week are satisfactory. His Imperial Majesty is much better. On the 16th inst. he was able to take an hour's drive in the Park. The tracheal discharge, moreover, is free from any cancerous matter.

THE Government of India has not received intelligence from Herat confirming what has been telegraphed to India of the Jamshedis declaring for Russia. But news was lately received of movements of Sariks on the boundary requiring the presence of Alikhanoff. It is probable that his departure from Panjeh in connection with the Sariks has given rise to the report about the Jamshedis.

KURRACHEE 11th. The ladies, families and remaining followers of Ayub's party numbering 454 persons left for Rawalpindi by special train this morning.

SRINAGAR 11th. Cholera slightly less. 127 new cases and 63 deaths in Srinagar during the last 23 hours.

THE Calcutta Gazette of the 16th May publishes the rules relating to money-orders other than revenue money-orders in favor of the Magistrate, Collector, (or Deputy Commissioner), Chairman of the District Board, and officers in charge of departments under the Magistrate or Collector, as also the Revised Rules for the grant of tea and arable Leases.

THE Lieutenant-Governor left Calcutta for Darjeeling yesterday.

THE Home Remittances last week amounted to £308,100.

THERE is no love lost between the Bombay Gazette and the Advocate of India. The former was wont to despise the latter as an "obscure journal," not worth the notice of people with a "reputation to lose." The most unkindest cut of all at last came with the Gazette announcing with a chuckle that the Advocate "was in the market." It was true—the Advocate advertising itself as for sale—but so much the worse for it! No wonder that the Advocate wallah returned the compliment as soon as it could informing the world that, like most unmarried ladies, the Gazette too was open to an offer. This was afterwards followed up with the positive assertion that Abdul Huq of Hyderabad had purchased the Gazette. And the attitude of the paper on the Hyderabad scandal seemed to favor the notice. These statements have, however, been contradicted, and the Gazette by its conduct is further clinching the contradiction. The Advocate is far too respectable not to bow to correction, but it maintains its undying spirit of ssness towards the other print, and manages to convert its miture into a triumph almost. Says our contemporary :—

We unhesitatingly accept the telegraphic contradiction of which we have been advised, at least as far as concerns the ownership of the Advocate, but we cannot refrain from expressing disappointment that the Advocate has not actually changed hands. There is now no hope of any vement in its tone or appearance."

generalship that, inflicting in the very act of retiring from an ble position a deadly blow on the enemy. Certainly, a neater on the disagreeable obligation—clearly incurred—of tendering on is not known for many a day.

Commissioners in the Larpent Enquiry in connection with the Punjab University, have submitted a long report. It has not yet been made public.

THE latest report dated the 14th from Srinagar is that Cholera has slightly increased again during the last two days. The number of new cases in Srinagar in the last 54 hours is 105 and total deaths 55, compared with 88 cases and 45 deaths on the 12th May.

IN aid of its Funds, there will be a series of entertainments at the Calcutta Free School, on Monday, the 4th June. The admission will be by tickets priced at only Re. 1. The programme ought to draw. It consists of Jarley's Wax Works, Cinderella (Pantomime), Christy Minstrels by popular amateurs, Popular Ballad Concert, Grand Illuminations and Display of Fireworks. For the series, if well carried out, the price for admission is but a trifle. Besides, the collection will be for a deserving object of charity.

THE Birthday of Her Majesty will be kept in India on Thursday, the 24th May 1888. The Viceroy holds a levee at Simla. The Chairman of the Calcutta Corporation has issued his usual invitation for a Garden Party.—The Indian Mirror, as usual, has misapprehended the Gazette.

A STANDING Congress Committee has been established for the District of Meerut, consisting of the following gentlemen, with power to add to their number :—

Syed Akbar Ali Shah ; Nawab Ahmed Shah, Reis, Sirdhana ; Lala Kishan Sahai, Rai Bahadur ; Syed Meer Khan, Sirdar Bahadur, Reis, Khanpur ; Mr. Pyare Lal, Barrister-at-law ; Lala Gobind Pershad, Pleader ; Pundit Gobinddat, Secretary, Deonagri Sabha ; Babu Rughbur Saran, Pleader and Reis, Hapar ; Prahlad Singh, Wakil, &c. ; Pandit Ram Pershad, M.A. ; Lala Badri Pershad ; Babu Mallu Mal ; Chowdhri Durga Singh, Zemindar, Asora ; Chowdhri Labu Singh ; Chowdhri Radhe Lal ; Lala Anand Sarup, Reis and Municipal Member ; Lala Diwan Singh, Reis, Sadder Bazar.

THE juvenile mutiny at Madras has ended satisfactorily. The boy who had been prepared for the light—of Christianity—has been sent back to his parents unbaptised. The other students have rejoined, and been accepted in, their respective classes, the ringleaders being punished by fine or rustication.

NOTES AND LEADERETTES.

THE Economist and calculator, like the woman, will be out. Lord Reay has taken a distinctly doctrinaire move. The Mehmabad Municipality in Gujerat has been suspended for a year—for its obstinacy in sticking to octroi as a source of revenue. The Lombay Government had recommended the house tax in preference to the octroi, which, they believed, seriously hampered trade. Are there not two sides to the question? And what of Bombay? The Statesman to the rescue!

THE Registrar of the Calcutta University has not been as good as his word. To personal enquiries he gave his friends to understand that the result of the Entrance Examination would be published in the Gazette this day. The Gazette of India to-day is as innocent as we of the fate of the "innocents."

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said in the House of Commons, the following reply from the Under Secretary Baron H. de Worms for the Colonies :—

"A great part of the revenue of Mauritius is derived from Customs and licences. The Indians, forming more than two thirds of the population, no doubt contribute largely to the revenue from these sources. At the present time, the elected members and the nominated members, who are not public officers, constitute the majority of the council of government. The Crown is therefore unable to exercise a preponderating influence. At the only election which has yet been held under the new constitution, very few Indians voted. One of the nominated members of the Council is an Indian. The Secretary of State will do all in his power to obtain more adequate provision for the elementary education of the Indians."

The Indians and other Asiatics and Africans in Mauritius are the victims of one of the worst forms of class tyranny in the world. If they now receive any relief, they will owe it to the justice and humanity of Governor Pope Hennessy and the cruel persecution to which he was subjected by the Colonist party in the island headed by the local Civil Service. Our native politicians in India strangely neglect their exiled brethren and their descendants. If any of our Associations or public men or publicists care to inquire into the subject, we can place before them authentic documents which will open their eyes to a revolting system which is a disgrace to the Queen's Government and Christendom.

IN a letter received lately from Jeddah, our Consul at that port gives examples of some of the disagreeable consequences which may ensue upon landing cargo at Turkish custom houses when any errors or omissions exist in the ship's manifest. If anything entered in the manifest is found deficient in the cargo, duty is charged on it just as though it was landed ; and if any goods are found on board which are omitted from the manifest, a double duty is charged on them. A wrong entry at the custom house leads to a demand for customs upon what is entered, and a demand for duties upon what is actually present. Shippers in India must be most careful in their entries, and manifests of cargo for Turkish ports are accurate. Evidence from bills of lading or such documents appears to be accepted in proof of good faith. Of course, so much smuggling is practised even by respectable shippers that fiscal officers have need to be most careful. They should, no doubt, be open to reason, and admit the evidence of their senses. But then it is impossible to make a thorough judicial investigation in every particular.

ABDUL HUQ is master of the following properties in Bombay—

"The Sirdar's first purchase was the Government Central Press, in the heart of the Fort—a building which, as former Government House, and subsequently the Secretariat, possesses much historical interest. By many the sale of this building was regarded as a piece of vandalism ; but what was considered to be most objectionable was the fact that the building, which occupies one of the best sites in the Fort, was sold by private treaty by the Collector. No one knew that the old Secretariat was in the market until the purchase had been made by Abdul Huq. Among some of his other purchases are the Esplanade Hotel and Grant's Buildings, for each of which he is understood to have given more than five lakhs. Then, besides these, there are some other buildings he has been building at the Apollo Bunder, immediately facing the Yacht Club, and covering a large area, which are now approaching completion, and will be fit for occupation before the monsoon begins."

The Hyderabad Government is anxious, if it is allowable under the law, to attach these, to recoup itself of the fraudulent loss of money occasioned by Abdul Huq. The Sirdar, however, is willing to refund the money invested in the Deccan mining scheme on behalf of the Hyderabad Durbar, provided he is no more punished nor the concession cancelled. The Nizam, it is also said, has repaid the money, for the terms attached.

THE accomplices of Abdul Huq in England have produced a letter to him from Nawab Salar Jung the son purporting to ratify the Huq arrangements, for which the late Minister has made a lame apology. A still more serious attempt has been made to implicate the late Minister's illustrious father. The following letter from the late Salar Jung to Abdul Huq has been produced in London :—

"My dear Syed Abdul Huq,—I have no doubt the Nizam's Government will appreciate at their full value the services you have rendered in originating and maturing the Chanda Railway scheme, if it is carried through. But as the work you are doing is outside your official capacity and your services to the promoters of the scheme will have been just as valuable to the Nizam's Government in case of the scheme being carried through, I write a line to assure you that I shall have no objection to your receiving any remuneration on the railway and mining schemes with which they may reward your services, and that I shall consider whatever you may receive from them as only your own."

The genuin... has been doubted. A strong... Rizam to England, headed

Committee generally.

THE Police are still at their... resting hackney carriages for excess passengers. We... the authority of the Police in our issue of the 14th April last. Since then we have not seen any justification attempted anywhere for this troublesome interference, specially annoying when the human freight happens to be pardanashin.
Only recently, there was an arrest in the presence of the Police Court, and the carriage and fare including zenana ladies, were all taken to the police station. We must do the arresting policeman the justice to say that he tried to secure another carriage specially for the softer species, but the Police have the reputation of not paying for work done, and each cabby that was hailed, drove away. The arresting officer would not be appeased, if the fare were reduced to the licensed number, but driver and all—evidence of breach of law—must be booked at the Thana for the case before the Magistrate next day. We do not know how... ended, or to what further exposure the adies were... Hackney Carriage law is no part of the Police Act, and the offences or occasions for which arrest or seizure can be made, are specified in the Act itself. Indeed, the Hackney Carriage Act empowers the Magistrate to call upon the owner to produce the driver under a penalty. The working of the Hackney Carriage law is not left to the Police. The function of the Police in connection therewith is limited and detailed in the Act itself.

SIR HENRY HARRISON may well congratulate himself on having carried his drastic measure of municipal reform through, amendments and protests notwithstanding, in and outside... of the there has surely been... question. An earnest and vigorous proposed by the Council, nor cavalierly dealt... Sir Richard Temple forced on his Council the elective principle of the present law, even after the Select Committee had formally reported against it, when the Bill without it was about to pass. We of the Indian League did it all.

In the teeth of the entire Council—against the combined opposition of the old Corporation of the Justices of the Peace, the British Indian Association, the Civil Service, the European mercantile community, the Hindoo Patriot and the Indian Mirror, and, last not least, Sir Stuart Hogg, the head of the Municipal and the town Police—the then just started Indian League gave... the general dissatisfaction of the unrepresented classes of the population with the existing

THE world still... as ever, and cases continually crop up, sometimes... frequently in unexpected, quarters.
Unfortunately, the... of life is usually far from pleasant. Even that charming illustration at Tangail of Indian wifely fidelity unto death, under repealed insult and wrong, culminating in murderous violence, reported by us a month ago, is painful to contemplate. We present to the reader a far more harrowing account of a long career of unmerited suffering. Here is as distressing a narrative of wrong as ever book-wright invented, communicated by a Hyderabad Correspondent of the Jam-i-Jamshed of Bombay. Charming as was that picture of idyllic faith and tenderness, the following is richer in variety of incident and in dramatic situations.

"Mr. Hormusji Dorabji Bangalee, a coach-builder of this city (Sik-andrabad) went a few days ago to pay a visit to a Mussulman gentleman of the same place. To his astonishment he found the groom of this Mussulman to be a Parsee. On enquiry he was informed that the name of this stable boy was Pestonji Burjorji Sukhadwalla. The witness of his condition that he had to jump at... a groom. Mr. Bangalee took pity on his caste-brother... to his place, where the miserable man told his tale. According to his statement, about 34 years ago he was an inhabitant of Bourbon, where he followed the profession of a buggy-driver. Once a French... hired his buggy and engaged his vehicle for a month...

grew up between them an intimacy which cost the poor...
thing that is dearest to a mortal in this world namely... one occasion the French Captain offered him the post of...
if he went with him to Mauritius. The offer was too...
the man succumbed to the trap that was laid for him...
tried hard to dissuade him from the step...
accompanying the Captain to his ship the *Da... not the only man whose services had been...
were about sixty men—some Hindoos and...
these men he had some cargo and some...
the ship arrived at Mauritius and anchored...
harbour, some boats approached it, and... some horses and a part of the cargo. Imagine... less men, when the ship again put to sea...
them. The ship again anchored at a port...
arrived and after examining them, gave each...
now threw round the neck of each a ring of... prepared for their sale. At this they began to bewail their fate and the ship became a scene of misery and lamentations. It was a French island, known among the French by the name of Bourbon. The unhappy men, none of whom was more than thirty years of age, were brought under the hammer and the subject of our account was knocked down for 100 rupees. Being separated from his country for more than 30 years this Parsee has forgotten his native tongue, while he speaks French and Arabic with fluency. This miserable man when taken away to be a slave, was twenty, and the event occurred 34 years ago. According to his statement, the Island of Bourbon has now come under the British sway, and hence his liberation. This Pestonji is now brought to Bombay. The meeting between this man and his mother who had given her son up and who is at present confined to bed, beggars all description."*

We have no reason to suppose that Pestonji speaks false. Whether he went out as a coachman to the Mauritius may be ascertained from his family and friends at Bombay. The rest of his story is vraisemblant, till he comes to his release. That is unaccountable. His ignorant notion is that the island of Bourbon passed under the hands of the British who freed all the men detained in captivity. We hope some of our public men in the West will look into the matter.

NAWAB Dilruba Mahal, whom the late king Wajid Ali Shah took to wife while he was heir-apparent to the throne of Oudh, died of cholera, at her residence in Ekbalpore, near Kidderpore, in the morning of Wednesday the 9th instant. She held a jaghir near Lucknow.

THE same morning also died, of child-birth, Nazeer Arra Begum, granddaughter of Nawab Ali Nakee Khan, first married to the late Prince Faridoon Kadr and after his death to his brother Mirza Jamjah Ali.
The child—male—was born on Sunday, and is well.

CONTINUITY of policy is all very well when there is ethnic homogeneity in the personnel of succession of office. Where there is a break in this, the rule vanishes. A native succeeding a European, may regard it proper to make no violent change in the order he finds in vogue. But a European coming after a native, is not always restrained by similar scruple from disturbing his predecessor's arrangements. The rampant British Huzzoor might even take a positive delight to make a clean sweep of all the landmarks of the dark age. Such a discipline it is now the fortune of a neighbouring District to experience. The prefecture has changed hands, the Baboo who was in charge having gone home to marry his children, a European has come in. He is represented to be afflicted with a violent antipathy towards all natives, specially of the true genus "Baboo." Such a man would be naturally disposed to regard Baboo Mohendro as the embodiment of the Baboo nuisance. He would see the Arch Baboo's arrangements as well as countrymen sent to a yet hotter place than Bengal. He is a hero, our prefect, of the type of Mr. Cook of the Financial Department, and he inaugurated his entrance into the present office by a raid on the hubble hubbles—as formidable a foe to British prestige and imports from the Phillipines and the West Indies as the historical "ferocious doolies." He left twenty of them hors de combat and routed many more. He is said to have already become the terror of the poor natives of the Baboo class.
We wonder whether our prefect has a personal grudge against the class. Had he been actually licked, or only figuratively kicked? Had any audacious Baboo demanded repayment of a loan, or refused him the pleasure to disable his favorite elephant?

After an encounter with a Classical Baboo, in which he came off second best, a well-known Magistrate of Allahabad, since retired, went next morning to a Police station where he complained of the inefficiency of the constabulary and the officers, seeing that no Baboos were ever sent up. The Inspector with joined palms represented to his Ministerial Majesty that the Bengalis in the Upper Provinces were a picked class—Baboos in fact, that is, gentlemen by birth or position, who could scarcely be expected to furnish work for Police or any other purpose. He was rebuked for his stupidity. He was reminded that Baboos must furnish cases of drunkenness and disturbance and disorder. He ventured to submit that the Baboos were wellknown for their love of peace. But the Saheb will none of it. Chort né some káhini. He alternately stormed and argued and bullied, and finally ordered the Police station the prime duty of persecuting Baboos. At very evening the Police took counsel with themselves as to the best way of satisfying the magistrate, and decided to lie in wait for unwary Baboos, for the purpose of dragging them before the magistrate. But, luckily for them and their meditated victims alike, the next day the magistrate himself was promoted to a judgeship in another district. He declined the promotion, but in a few days he was compelled to join his new office.

Cannot the new broom of a prefect be promoted to the Andamans—we mean as Superintendent of the interesting islanders?

ANOTHER batch of Honorary Magistrates for Calcutta has been added to the list. They are—Rai Ramshunker Sen Bahadour, Baboo Obhoy Chunder Dass, Mr. A. D'B. Gomess, Mr. R. D. Mehta, Kumar Kristo Dass Law, Kumar Reshee Case Law, Baboo Sita Nath Roy, Syud Tujummool Hossein, Baboo Sreenath Chunder, Baboo Opendronath Mitra, Baboo Opoorbo Coomar Gangooly, and Baboo Bihari Lal Pal. A strong batch. The first three are retired Deputies, the first two well-known for ability and wide experience in the Service. Mr. Mehta is the Parsee mercantile man, whose public activity is well-known. He has lately been appointed on the Port Commission. His worth may also be presumed from the persistent detraction of the Indian Mirror and its myrmidon of a Parsee badmash, whom he had had the rashness to befriend. The Lawlings are, of course, a compliment to our worthy townsman Raja Doorga Charan, and will doubtless prove chips of the old block. The next name is that of the Secretary to the Native Chamber of Commerce, and is a compliment to Hatkhola. The appointment unfortunately will recall the disgrace of his better-known and more energetic brother, who would else have himself got it long since. The next is a political appointment, but surely there are more respectable men in the Mahomedan community than the Ahmeds and such like whom Government delights to honor. The remaining gentlemen are all respectable men and lawyers experienced in courts.

THE dogs of war are no mere figure of speech, thanks to the combativeness of Christendom and the development, in these times of progress, of the bump of destructiveness of the Western nations! In France, at any rate, war hounds form a recognised institution in the army. As yet, they are not used to any bloody purpose. But we all know the part played by blood-hounds in pursuit of fugitive slaves in the American swamps, and, as rival nations stick at nothing in prosecution of their international enmities, we may well be prepared for a canine departure of Christian warfare. Specially is this to be feared against the despised Heathen. But enough for the day is the evil thereof. It is a relief to know that just now our noble fellow-creature, the dog, is put to no base use. An establishment of dogs is maintained for the peaceful employment of messengers in war. The animals are trained to carry despatches with celerity. Horsemen also and bicyclists, are employed for the same purpose. The other day, the Minister of War held under his eye a trial at Tours of the relative efficiency and speed of these several kinds of couriers. All three sets were ridden four miles (6 kilometres) with a despatch. From the first, the dogs left the others behind, but they proved themselves only dogs in the end, notwithstanding. For, in the course of the race, one of them, seeing a piece of water, stopped for a drink and his fellow canines seeing it stopped likewise and did the same, causing 30 seconds' delay which enabled the bicyclist to come up and be the first to arrive at destination. The result of several trials, however, showed the superiority of the dogs, whose average time in reaching the goal was 14 minutes less 5 seconds, while the bicyclists made it at an average of a full quarter of an hour. The lumbering horse was nowhere, taking 24 minutes to do the distance. A four mile heat is an awful strain for man and beast, however. A 2 mile race was held with the same general competitive result, the dog still asserting his superiority, to the heavier discomfiture of Centaur. The dogs ran the ground in 7 minutes, the bicyclists in 9, and the horsemen in 15.

EARLY in the year 1887 Munshi Newal Kishore of Lucknow offered a prize for the best essay on the National Association for Supplying Female Medical aid to the women of India, comprising its aims and a resumé of the work done by the Central Committee, and those of the various branches. The essay was open to female competition, either European or Native, and the one written by Mrs. Knox won the prize. In a little brochure of 57 pages, Mrs. Knox gives a concise but comprehensive account of the institution—its origin, aims, the work done and its needs. The objects which the association has been formed to promote are, as is wellknown, to teach and train in India women as doctors, hospital assistants, nurses and midwives, to establish under female superintendence dispensaries and college hospitals for the treatment of women, and to supply trained female nurses and midwives for women and children in hospitals and private houses. It is written, whatsoever the hand findeth to do, do with thy whole might, and the philanthropic President Founder has been heart and soul in the truly large undertaking which will constitute an imperishable monument of her name and fame. It goes without saying that her benevolent and unwearied exertions to alleviate the sufferings of Indian women have been attended with success beyond the most sanguine expectations. The grain of mustard cast into a congenial soil has already grown into a mighty tree! Branch associations and hospitals and dispensaries and training institutions—for nurses and midwives—have sprung up in Bengal, Behar, Burma, Bombay, Berar, N. W. Provinces, Madras, Mysore, Central Provinces and Rajputana. The object of the association has been to bring the subject, to bring medical relief and medical knowledge to the women of India, and as such a simple comprehensive account of it, written for women, was a want which has been partly removed by the pamphlet under notice. Public opinion in India is as yet but public ignorance, and it ought to be, as far as possible, instructed. We would recommend the Central Committee to have the essay translated into the different Indian vernaculars and distribute it as copiously and extensively as possible.

THERE are Huqs in British India as in Native Deccan. A few years back, an Assistant Secretary and a Registrar in the Foreign Department attracted notice by the uncountable possession of property far in excess of their known means. On inquiry they were turned out. One of them who was on leave was discovered lurking in Bhopal, intriguing with the Begum's husband, ex-Nawab Siddiq Hasan, and selling him secret documents. Another low European who got into a considerable office in Calcutta, simply lending himself to the vice of high officials, has drawn on him an unpleasant scrutiny. He has within his own jurisdiction become the owner of valuable houses. He has been levying black mail of 80,000 a year on a single ward. He will go, of course, the matter is too dirty and glaring. But we demand a public inquiry.

WE have received the following letter from Dacca—
 "Within the last week one Kamini Kumari brought a charge of theft of a document against Baboos Rajan Choudry and Sarat Chandra Bosu, vakeels, practising in the District Court of Dacca. The witnesses named are Babu Purna Chandra, 2nd Sub-Judge, Babu Trailokya Natha Bose, M. A., B. L., Vakeel, B. Mahendra Kumar Ghose, M. A., B. L., and other very respectable persons. The Magistrate transferred the case to the file of Babu Chandra Kumar Datta, Deputy Magistrate, who sat this day (13th) at the residence of Babu Purna Chandra Shom, 2nd Sub-Judge, and called the accused and some witnesses and Babu Pratap Chandra Dass. There, instead of holding any enquiry as we were given to understand, to our surprise the case is said to have been compounded."

It is stated, on the authority of a telegram from Cashmere, that the Maharaja of Cashmere has submitted to the Resident two names—Surajbal and Nilambar Mookerjee—as those of suitable men for the office of Minister, but Mr. Plowden will have neither. It is a pity that our native sovereigns do not appoint their own men without reference to the Residency, but if they do pay the representative of our Government the compliment to take him into their confidence, it is a sorry return from him to thwart them in their dearest wishes and objects. It is no business of Mr. Plowden's whom the Maharaja appoints. We are sure the will not permit this interference. Lord Dufferin is too old a to be bewitched by the Plowden fascination.

SATURDAY, MAY 19, 1888.

THE PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION— A DISAPPOINTMENT.

THE Report of the Public Service Commission has elicited little public discussion, to say nothing of enthusiasm. It has almost fallen flat upon the Indian public. And yet is there a subject in which they are more interested, or more apt to express their interest by loud agitation? What, then, is the meaning of the apathy with which the deliverance of the Service Commission has been received? Not that the recommendations of the Commission are not many of them good, so far as they go. Not that the cause of the Indian people will not be somewhat advanced, if all those recommendations were fully adopted and faithfully carried out. Many appointments hitherto in the monopoly of European Covenanted Servants have been proposed to be thrown open to the natives. A large number of what are known as the Scheduled Appointments have been recommended to be excluded from the Service Commission's jurisdiction of widening the area of competition to all aspirants. Indeed, the Commission has recommended some of the Covenanted Servants to be broken, apparently as a means of breaking down the traditional caste distinctions of the white Brahmans in India, and pave the way for placing the public service on a more equal and equitable basis, as regards the claims of natives and foreigners. An Imperial Service will replace the Covenanted Service, though it will still be recruited, like the latter, by competition in England. The number of appointments, however, in the Imperial Service will be reduced, with the object of widening the Provincial Service for more adequately meeting native wants. The multiplication of openings to native talent and ambition is likewise proposed to be effected by other means. The vexed question of the re-organization of Districts has been decided in favor of native talent. All the chiefships of Departments and other high offices excepted, the next superior appointments hitherto reserved only to members of the Civil Service are recommended to be brought within reach of native talent. If, in regard to the Imperial Service competition, the Commission has not seen fit to recommend a simultaneous examination in India, it has done the next best thing in affirming the Indian prayer for raising the Indian candidates at the London competition. This is one of the important achievements of the Public Service Commission for which it deserves the highest praise. Nevertheless, there has been hardly an expression of satisfaction on the part of the native press with its work now that its Report has been published about three months. Does not this look like an anomaly?

The truth is, that the Report, favorable to Indian interests as it is in several respects, is a disappointment on fundamentals. Whatever of satisfaction might naturally be felt at some parts of the Report, is obviously checked by the reflection that the final decision of the matters at issue is yet far off. Above all, the findings of the Commission on important questions of principle are very far from satisfactory. The country had indulged much higher hopes: it had certainly some reason to expect more than it has got. A body constituted on so wide a basis composed of great lieutenants of the Victorian age, officers of state, and representatives of all departments, races, and interests concerned—a very respectable Parliament, as it were, with ample powers for deciding once for all on great issues, might be expected to produce a mere compromise—merely a temporary final solution indefinitely. The Government could to give the Commission a thoroughly representative character as well as weight and influence. Not only, however, the Government should have known where to find the best men. Wherever we make allusions, we cannot but place our own opinion that if there were men able to represent native interests—men not merely holding official or non-official positions whom the Government knew, but those really able to hold their own against powerful European colleagues and clearly and forcibly to present the real Indian view of the subject, the decision of the Commission on some of the more important points might well take a different turn. Talking of the personnel of the Commission, we may as well add, without mincing matters, that it was a blunder to have consigned the presidency of a body that was to adjudicate between Old and New India—between the conservative feelings on the one hand of ancient families and great races that have not taken kindly to an alien system and to alien ways, but whose influence, nevertheless, it is desirable to retain in the administration, and on the other, the radical aspirations of newly risen communities and classes—to a man like Sir Charles Aitchison, who whatever his sympathies for the people of the country, was hopelessly handicapped by his personal antecedents or rather accidents for the great office assigned to him. Nor was the vice-presidency given to Sir Charles Turner a happier hit. We yield to none in our appreciation of the great services of Sir Charles Aitchison or of the learning and experience of the former Chief Justice of Madras. They are both men of liberal views and of kindly sentiments towards the people. But a broader statesmanship than was needed for the delicate duty of striking a just balance between the claims of those rival classes in this country.

It is nothing short of a calamity to the country that it is no longer reserved to us even to regard the question of a simultaneous Civil Service competition in India as an open one. But here summarily is this question of questions disposed of in the Commission's report! There is not even an allusion in it to the nation's demand for an Indian competition, made as a matter of right and recommended by every consideration of political expediency as well as social justice. This demand has been repeated times without number ever since the Home Government, in deference to the English public, threw open the competition in 1853 to the natural-born subjects of Her Majesty. In deference to the English public, we say, because the benefits of open competition could not in the then stage of Indian education be imagined as likely to fall within the grasp of Her Majesty's Indian subjects. The injustice of the principle, however, of confining the examination in England, did not fail to attract attention even then, and Indian politicians were not slow to claim that it should be removed by providing another examination in this country.

Indeed, the history of this controversy is one which reflects great discredit on the English Government. The demand for a fair competition in India is as natural as it is just. The compulsory denationalization of Indians which has been the consequence of the present state of the law has been a source of infinite evil. If on their return, they were received into their former society, as they might if on their own part they showed a cordial desire of being so received, the thing would have been different by this time. As it is, there is no understanding between the two classes, and the influence exercised by Indian officers thus formed into a distinct and despised community by themselves, can be the good of the country. The experience of the existing system should by this have suggested its abandonment. But that is not to be. Not only was the old demand for an examination in India left unheeded, but since the advance of English education in India led a few enterprising Indian students to compete on equal terms with their English fellow-subjects, the administrations at Home set about how they might frustrate the ambition of these Eastern interlopers, without disturbing the Statute of 1853. They hit upon the device of lowering the age of candidates, which accordingly was reduced successively from 23 to 22, from 22 to 21, and from 21 to 19, as well as reducing the marks assigned to Oriental classics. Such are some of the incidents of the Civil Service question, at any rate as viewed by men in this country, whom they have injuriously affected. What might be the political objects of the English Government in so jealously excluding the Indian people from a fair and unrestricted participation in the Civil Service of their own country, must be best known to itself. It is a record of national selfishness over which one would rather like to draw a veil. Viewed in the light of this record, the refusal of the present Commission even so much as to fairly argue the question of another examination being provided for in India, cannot but look suspicious. This question is scarcely touched in the following passage in the Report which simply expresses the determination of the Commission that the competition shall continue as hitherto in England only.

"On a review of all the evidence before it, the Commission has come to the conclusion that, in the present circumstances of the country, the claims of Natives of India to higher and more extensive employment in the public service and the admission of competent Natives of each Province of India to a due proportion of the posts heretofore reserved for the Covenanted Civil Service, can be best provided for by reducing the strength of the Covenanted Civil Service and transferring a corresponding number of appointments to a local service to be separately recruited in each Province of India. Under this arrangement the Covenanted Civil Service, reduced to a corps d'élite, and its numbers limited to what is necessary to fill the chief administrative appointments of the Government and such a number of the smaller appointments as will ensure a complete course of training for junior Civilians, will continue, as hitherto, to be recruited by open competition in England only, under similar standards and conditions of its own, while the Provincial Service, recruited under different methods adapted to local circumstances, will secure a fair representation of the various races of India in the administration of the country. It is an essential feature of this scheme that the competition in England be open unreservedly to Natives as well as to Europeans, that Europeans resident in India who satisfy the prescribed preliminary conditions be eligible equally with Natives for the Provincial Service, and that the conditions of each service respectively be the same for all who enter it to whatever nationality they may belong."

The italics are ours. Scarcely a regard has thus been shown to true native feeling on the subject. Whatever may be the strength of the agitation which has been got up in this country on the subject of age limitations, it probably originated at the bidding of people who were training youth for the examination, and afterwards spread to the more educated classes. To these, however, it was strictly confined, the people of the country at large feeling little or no interest in it. The feeling of the people on the subject of a forced sale to a foreign land, for the purposes of this competition, was strong as it was all but universal. A few Indians returned from England, it is true, have been spreading a contrary feeling, but it is still confined to a small section only. The genuine Indian sentiment is what we have shown it to be. But it has been disregarded.

It is no wonder, however, that the Report before us shows no gleam of a bold statesmanship—such statesmanship, for instance, as was displayed by a much abused former Viceroy who instituted the Statutory Civil Service. That was a bold great measure, conceived in a spirit of broad sympathy for the claims of classes which have been continually depressed under British rule. The present Commission wants to give the quietus to this bantling of Lord Lytton's brain on the ground that it is condemned by people in general, and that it has failed to realize expectations. That it has enemies among the radical classes, is only natural, while as to its failure, that is more the blame of the Governments which went on making nominations from sons and relatives of their aristocratic pets who were bound to fail, than of the Statute.

PRE-BRITISH INDIA.

VIII.

HUMAYUN.

Humayun was not seated long on the musnud, when his peace was broken by the tumult of war. He proceeded to Bhandelkund, and laid siege to this place. To accomplish his purpose, he was disturbed by a rebellion in Jounpore, headed by two Atgarian chiefs. They appeared on the scene, and defeated and dispersed the rebels. But he was immediately called to proceed against the hill fort of Chunar, which had been seized and was then held by his future rival, Shir Khan, who submitted, on condition of returning the fort, and Humayun returned to Agra. This incident was for him the cloud no bigger than a man's hand; soon the sky would be laden with heavy clouds portending a great storm.

Humayun next came into collision with Bahadur Shah, King of Gujerat. A brother-in-law of Humayun's had plotted against his life and Government. On the discovery of his plot, he fled and took refuge with Bahadur Shah, who refused to give him up on Humayun's demand. The Gujerati King, however, took the initiative, though he refrained from openly declaring war. He supplied a discontented Mussalmán noble, Ala-ud-din, liberally with money, which enabled him in a very short time, to collect a large army, which made Agra its point of attack. This large, hastily collected force was, however, speedily dispersed, and Humayun, burning under the sense of the injury he had received, marched from Agra on Gujerat. He arrived there at a most fortunate time for himself, for he found his enemy at war with the Rana of Meywar, and occupied in besieging Chittoor. He lost this opportunity by permitting himself to be swayed by the remonstrances of the Gujerat King, who protested against the impropriety of attacking a Mussulman prince while engaged in war with the infidels. Some say, that he was influenced by his own profligate habits, which retarded his march until the place was untenable, and Bahadur Shah had time to be prepared to meet him in an entrenched camp. Humayun environed his camp and cut off supplies. Bahadur seeing he would be forced by famine to surrender, fled at night, almost alone, leaving his army to its fate. The army quickly dispersed. Much valuable time was lost in these undertakings. Humayun, to retrieve therefore in some measure his error, led the pursuit in person with a light detachment, until Bahadur Shah finally took refuge in Diu—the most remote part of the peninsula of Gujerat. Having failed in his object, Humayun proceeded to occupy the settled parts of Gujerat, and the open country soon submitted. Next the hill-fort of Champanir was stormed, and Humayun displayed singular courage on this occasion. The army was directed to make an attack on one of the gates of the fort, to draw off the attention of the defenders, while a select band of 300 volunteers escalated the almost perpendicular escalade was accomplished successfully, with a hundred spikes fixed into the rock. Humayun was among the hundred.

At this period, Shir Khan appeared in the field with a chosen body of troops, and the intelligence of his revolt compelled Humayun to leave Gujerat and set off for Agra. He left Mirza Askari, his brother, in charge of his new conquest. Scarcely had Humayun left, when intrigues ensued, with the avowed object of raising Mirza Askari to the throne. These intrigues produced dissensions among the officers and men, resulting in general disorder. Bahadur Shah having information of the state of affairs was soon actively hostile; and the invaders gave up Gujerat almost without a struggle, and also withdrew from Malwa which was not even threatened.

Humayun did not remain long in his capital before he set out against Shir Khan. This remarkable man was the son of a jagirdar of Sasaram in Behar, and had risen by his own ability, from the position of a private soldier in the employ of the Governor of Jounpore, to be master of Behar; he also held possession of the fort of Chunar, and the still more important fortress of Rohtas. Shir Khan, however, did not rest content with so great a change in his fortunes, but was impelled by his restless ambition to invade Bengal; and he had laid siege to Gour, the Capital of the King of Bengal, when Humayun marched from Agra against him, fully recognising the advantage of attacking him while thus embarrassed, and had reached Chunar at the head of a powerful army, without meeting with the slightest opposition. Shir Khan was not ignorant of the danger of his position, but he was equal to the emergency, and laid his plans with much foresight. He threw a strong garrison into Chunar, with instructions to make an obstinate defence and retard the advance of Humayun. He also took possession of the defile of Sickragalli, where he placed a strong garrison under command of his son. His plan to cope at this point with the superior force of Humayun was to retreat to the hilly tract to the south of Chunar, and to Rohtas his family and all his treasures. The check which Humayun received at Chunar gave him time to reduce Gour, and also to obtain a decisive victory in battle. The occupation of the defile of Sickragalli as a second obstruction to the march of Humayun, was decided on, because he yet wanted time to remove to Rohtas the treasures and stores captured at Gour, and to dispose suitably of the open country.

Humayun immediately invested Chunar and tried every possible means to reduce it, but his efforts failed, and several months were spent in the siege before the garrison surrendered. On becoming master of the fort, he issued a horribly cruel order. He decreed that the right hands of the gunners, soldiers, and men, should be cut off, in revenge for the loss of hands which he had inflicted on him. After the capture of Chunar, Humayun pushed his march along the banks of the Ganges, till he approached the defile of Sickragalli. He sent on an advance guard to take possession of the defile, which was already occupied by Shir Khan's son. He was checked and repulsed them with considerable loss. He then hastened on with the main body of his army, and was agreeably surprised to find the defile open, and the road open to the Capital of Bengal, and to obtain possession of Gour without any opposition. But the season of the year by this time attained their height: the Delta of the Ganges was one vast sheet of water, and in the country the reach of inundation every brook and channel swollen into an impassable flood. It was impossible to carry on military operations in Bengal, and scarcely possible to keep up a communication with Upper India. The army lay in forced inactivity for several months, during which time the soldiers became demoralized through depression, in consequence of the moist and sultry climate, and their numbers were thinned by the sickly season that follows the rains. No sooner were the roads open, than they began to desert in large numbers; and Prince Hindal, who had been stationed in North Behar, marched off with his men, even before the rains had ceased.

IX.

This was just the opportunity Shir Khan had looked forward to. He now issued quickly from his retreat, took possession of Behar and Benares, recovered Chunar, laid siege to Jounpore, and pushed his detachment up the Ganges as far as Canouj. Thus, when the season for military operations commenced, Humayun found his communications with his capital intercepted, and the only alternative left was to trust his new conquest to the charge of a weak garrison, and endeavour to force his way to Agra with the rest of his reduced army. Unfortunately, he hesitated for a long time before he adopted this decided measure, and the dry season was half over before he began his retreat. He sent an advance guard, under the command of Khani Khanam, one of Baber's principal generals, and himself followed the remainder of the troops. His advance guard had reached Monghyr, when it was surprised and defeated by a detachment sent out by Shir Khan, who was more surprising as he had before been cautious. If Humayun had not before had sufficient time for extricating himself from his present position, which was daily becoming more perilous, the intelligence he received from Agra must have acted as a spur. His brother Hindal had, after deserting his post at Behar, reached Agra only to begin collecting adherents, and, being afterwards joined by the numerous fugitives from Bengal, he went into open rebellion. Humayun's ministers at this juncture applied on behalf of their master to Prince Camran, who immediately set out from Cabul, with the professed intention of supporting Humayun's interests, but in reality to be at hand to profit by any advantageous opportunity. Humayun therefore pushed on with his weakened force, and had passed Buxar, when he found that Shir Shah was intercepting his retreat. This able chief had raised the siege of Jounpore and had marched thirty-five miles on that day to accomplish his purpose. After such a march, Shir's troops could not have withstood a vigorous assault, and Humayun was strongly urged to attack him at once, before his troops had time to refresh themselves. Here the weakness of his disposition again became apparent, he hesitated, and deemed the course too hazardous to be adopted at once. The next day, Shir Shah was found to have intrenched himself in such a manner that he could not be passed nor attacked with any prospect of success. Humayun therefore could do nothing else than intrench in his turn. He soon began to collect boats and form a bridge across the Ganges, so as to pursue his retreat along the opposite bank. Nearly two months were spent on this work, and yet Shir Khan made no sign of opposition. The bridge was nearly complete, and Humayun was complacently looking forward to a speedy extrication from his difficult position, when Shir Shah showed his hand. For this astute leader every day's delay was an advantage, he therefore placidly witnessed his adversary's endeavours to escape, but when he saw the bridge of boats nearly finished, he suddenly left his camp one day, leaving it, however, occupied by a sufficient force to conceal his movements, made a hasty and secret march at the head of his best troops, and at night found himself behind Humayun's camp. He divided his men into three columns, and at dawn completely surprised the camp of his foe. Humayun had just time to leap on horseback, and then he desired to make an effort against the enemy, when one of his principal officers seized his reins, and compelled him to make his way to the river-side. The bridge was not ready, and as Humayun had not a moment for deliberation, he plunged into the Ganges. His horse became exhausted and sank in the stream before he reached the opposite bank, and he must have been drowned, but at this critical moment he was rescued by a water-carrier who happened to be crossing the river on an inflated mussuk, and on which he was able to support the king's weight as well as his own. Thus rescued, Humayun pursued his flight with a very small retinue, to Calpi, and thence proceeded to Agra. Almost the whole of his army had been cut off by the enemy or drowned in the river. Humayun's queen, despite his officers' efforts to save her, was surrounded, and fell into the hands of the enemy. Shir Shah, with becoming magnanimity, treated her with scrupulous delicacy and attention, and restored her to her husband on the first opportunity. Humayun's presence, discomfited as he was, was of essential importance at Agra. His arrival put a stop to the plans of Hindal and Camran. He pardoned Hindal at the intercession of Camran; and the three brothers united their exertions to arrest the progress of the common enemy.

JAMES H. LINTON.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR.

A VINDICATION.

Surely the time is out of joint, when a man, who has attained the three score years and ten of the Psalmist, can so easily be procured to blow up the sins of an unscrupulous autocrat by the bellows of flattery. Man did I say?—God made him and therefore let him pass for a man. But then he is a fool—an arrant fool, with brass enough in his head to make a tea-kettle! But fool or no fool, he has the qualifications of a critic enough and to spare!

critics all are ready made.

Take hackney'd jokes from Miller, got by rote,
With just enough of learning to misquote;
A mind well skill'd to find or forge a fault;

Fear not to lie, 'twill seem a sharper hit;
Shrink not from blasphemy, 'twill pass for wit;
Care not for feeling—pass your proper jest,
And stand a critic, hated yet caress'd.

Though his way of life

Is fall'n into the scar, the yellow leaf;
And that which should accompany old age,
As honor, love, obedience, troops of friends,
He must not look to have; but, in their stead,
Curses, not loud, but deep, mouth-honor, breath,

Sir Fool is not altogether friendless, for he alone is friendless who cannot find a friend sincere enough to tell him disagreeable truths.

A drowning man catches at a straw, and it is not strange that Sir Fool should seek to demolish me by charging on me the atrocious crime of being a young man. But he ought to know that beard was never the true standard of brains and that

We live in deeds, not years, in thoughts, not breaths,
In feelings, not in figures on a dial.
We should count time by heart-throbs. He most lives,
Who thinks most, feels the noblest, acts the best.

Gray hairs should be respected, to be sure. I for one do not demur to the privilege which age always brings—the privilege of being insolent and supercilious without punishment. But surely the man whose age has only added obstinacy to stupidity does not deserve that his gray hairs should secure him from insult.

All seems infected that th' infected spy,
As all looks yellow to the jaundic'd eye.

What wonder then that Sir Fool should light upon as many mistakes in my letter as there are words in it, nay more! Perhaps he does not mean what he says, or why does he not quote chapter and verse? But Sir Fool is not after all so ill-furnished in the upper story as to make himself the laughing stock of the whole world, if he is not already such, by an attempt at discovering (to use a Bengalicism) an equine egg. But granting for the sake of argument that I have made one or two slips of the pen—and it is not strange seeing that good Homer sometimes nods—what do they signify? Does not Sir Fool know that "the toad, though ugly, wears yet a precious jewel in his head?" I can't for the life of me understand how any grammatical inaccuracy that may have crept in my letter can prove that Surrender Not is not the "author of such a book of follies, that it would need the tears of all the angels to blot the records out."

If possession of little knowledge be a sin—I confess I am sinner enough. I have this consolation, though, that I have sinned in good company. But then I know that I know nothing and consequently little knowledge is no dangerous thing so far as I am concerned, while Sir Fool does not know that he knows nothing.

Holloway's Pills.—Pure Blood.—When the Blood is pure, its circulation calm and equable, and the nerves well strung, we are well. These Pills possess a marvellous power in securing these essentials of health by purifying, regulating, and strengthening the fluids and solids. Holloway's Pills can be confidently recommended to all persons suffering from disordered digestion, or worried by nervous fancies, or neuralgic pains. They correct acidity and heart-burn, dispel sick headache, quicken the action of the liver, and act as alteratives and gentle aperients. The weak and delicate may take them without fear. Holloway's Pills are eminently serviceable to invalids of irritable constitution, as they raise the action of every organ to its natural standard, and universally exercise a calming and sedative influence.

As to the aptness of the quotations from Shakespeare, a "bookful blockhead ignorantly read" can be no better judge thereof than swine of pearls.

The Devil hath power to assume a pleasing shape, nay, he can, if necessary, cite Scripture for his purpose. But however he may disguise himself, he can never conceal his cloven feet. Sir Fool has spared no pains to conceal his identity under the borrowed feathers of Sir W. Scott, Dryden, Burns, Wordsworth, Churchill, Pope, Byron, and Mrs. Beecher Stowe; but there is not, it would seem, much love lost between him and Dame Grammar, his protestation to the contrary notwithstanding, and orthography has betrayed him. After all, it is the gentleman for whom motley's the only wear, and not myself, that has to learn to spell. "Unwedgable" should be spelt as I have spelt it and not as he has done. Vide Measure for Measure, Act 2 Sc. 2 and Schmidt's Shakespeare's Lexicon. But why go so far, he may refer to his great grandson, if he is not of course a chip of the old block—and he will tell him:—

Listen, O revered great grandsire! to the law of language. When final e is preceded by g soft, the e is retained before able and ous, as changeable, damageable, marriageable, unwedgable.

The last, but by no means the least, charge against me is that I have pressed into service "cart-loads of obsolete and vulgar words and phrases." Sir Fool is a veritable S. S. Circle and as such orthodoxy is his doxy and heterodoxy another man's doxy. Cart-loads indeed! but pray is it a Lilliputian cart, a cart which no mortal can see with the naked eye, no not even with the aid of a microscope! But the readers of Reis are too old birds to be caught with chaff. They know the Persian saying:—"Though the bat may refuse to fly in the light, that does not diminish the splendour of the luminary."

Sir Fool is nothing if not logical, and his logic is, you know, irresistible. Surendra Nath is a true man, an excellent man and one whom we ought to wear in our heart's core, ay, in our heart of hearts! and why? Because forsooth, "A blunt man's" English is not Her Majesty's English! But, Sir Fool, if Galileo had said "still it moves," would the earth have moved?

Sir Fool is an anti-Surrender-Not-ian, but one may as well believe a man.

You write a letter extending over two columns in exposing the bad English of one who has the audacity to strike off the false patriot's mask, you would have him hanged, drawn, and quartered, and a Surrender-Not-ian and you are "many miles asunder!" But pray, Sir Fool, why are you ashamed to be known as a Surrender-Not-ian, though Surrender-Not-ian you are to the backbone! Verily, hypocrisy is the homage that vice pays to virtue!

I shall be the last person not to give credit where credit is due. Sir Fool is, I must say, wise in his generation. It is well to be in the good books of Surendra Nath, for who knows that we shall not ere long be blessed with the republica for all the ills that flesh is heir to, in the shape of a new form of Government, and that Surrender Not the Great will be the first President of the Republic of United India. Even if he should fail to be installed in the Presidency, still he ought to leave no means untried to ingratiate himself into the good graces. And should anybody ask him the why and wherefore, he might say, like Falstaff, "Give you a reason on compulsion?—No, reasons were plentiful as blackberries, I should give none on compulsion." Or if he has any regard for truth, he might say what the old woman in the story, who set one candle before the image of Michael and another before the Devil, (whom the former was trampling under feet) said for paying such honor to Satan, naively said:—"V. S. your honor, it is quite uncertain which place I shall go to, but I am sure you will not blame a poor woman for securing her own soul."

A fool's bolt is soon spent, but Sir Fool's resources have not already been exhausted, we shall see what he can do at Philipp; but what dire sins have the readers of Reis committed that Sir Fool should once more inflict on them his terrible nonsense?

A FOOL'S BOLT IS SOON SPENT, BUT SIR FOOL'S RESOURCES HAVE NOT ALREADY BEEN EXHAUSTED, WE SHALL SEE WHAT HE CAN DO AT PHILIPPI; BUT WHAT DIRE SINS HAVE THE READERS OF REIS COMMITTED THAT SIR FOOL SHOULD ONCE MORE INFLECT ON THEM HIS TERRIBLE NONSENSE?

MONGHYR.

Jamali, 19th May, 1888.

The people of Monghyr are now in a pleasurable mood for the Barwarce Poojab arrangement which is now in full swing and expected to come off by the latter end of current month. They not only indulge in fun or tamasha alone, but are seen to divert their mind and thought to a somewhat nobler cause, which is well worth mentioning. The other day there was a meeting in Monghyr Zillah School convened by the well-to-do public and educated classes, headed by the District Magistrate, for discussing the project of a "National Orphanage" to be established there, and certain resolutions were passed and carried.

The "Bayley Reservoir" close to the Hill here, constructed last year, for which the East Indian Railway Company had to spend a large sum, is gone down very low, the water receding about an inch or two daily. I think a further outlay will have to be made shortly.

The European gentry of the place are contemplating to have a meat Market of their own in the heart of this station after the fashion of Calcutta. The scheme might be feasible to some extent, as regards fresh food and meat &c., but the question is whether the said market will be a paying one or not, and suit one and all simultaneously.

The Service Commission from Government, consisting of Deputy Comptroller, with a requisite staff both European and native are here, over-hauling the Accounts of the Railway Audit Branch offices at this station. It is said they will stop here for sometime and scrutinize the accounts in all other offices of the Railway, such as Locomotive, Traffic, &c. The object of this imperial inspection is not yet given out.

The rate-payers of this place (natives of course,) are on the alert for the intended imposition of enhanced taxes for the clearing of vats or cesspools by the municipality. This subject has been engaging the attention of the general public.

We have been suffering unbearable heat of the weather for the last week and unless we have some rain soon I am afraid the people will be dying like sheep.

There is a general cry for water. Ophthalmia the season's disease, has made its appearance. 2 or 3 cases of insanity amongst European patients here, have come to my notice. All this is attributable to the extreme heat of the weather, I presume.

ASRUKANA

A Collection of poems in Bengali by

SRIMATI GIRINDRAMOHINY DASSY
(Author of Kabitahar, Bharat Kusum.)

Asrukana is a collection of poetical pieces of singular pathos and beauty of expression. It is a series of mournful songs that the reader is here presented with and they must touch a sympathetic cord in every heart that can feel. There is a singular appropriateness in the title of the work, and in its pious dedication to the memory of the husband of the fair writer.—The Indian Nation.

The authoress is not unknown to Bengali readers. She has already published two or three poems by which she is favourably known, but between these poems and this is a difference that hardly admits of being measured.

This is poetry in life

We have read Srimati Girindra Mohiny's poems in a reverential spirit. The poems are all of a lyrical description. The lyre is soft, sweet and tender, but awfully strong.

The tone of the poems is inexpressibly gentle, inexpressibly pure, and inexpressibly tender and affectionate. It is the tone of a world mother.

Bengal should be proud of this poem—The Calcutta Review.

OPINION OF THE PRESS.

It is many years since I first met, and some years since I last met, Dr. Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee, editor of the Reis and Rayyet (Prince and Peasant), and an author of high repute among the kindly, as well as acute and intellectual, people of Bengal. One of the real misfortunes of India was, and still is, Lord Macaulay's picture of the Bengalee. The picture, true perhaps as regards Nuncomar and many Bengalees, is not accurate as a representation of the people generally, taking them as an Englishman may find them if he looks fairly. If they had been unfaithful, the sad story of the Mutiny had been vastly sadder; and, apart from the Mutiny, many Englishmen could give individual instances of Bengalee faithfulness almost unique in history, taking all the circumstances of our relation to India into account. The Bengalee is generally eager for knowledge of all kinds, and is often both courageous in the expression of his opinions, and gifted to a remarkable degree with the power to express those opinions with force and precision. Mr. Fawcett once told me that an unprepared speech made, on his behalf, during an election, by a young Hindoo, surpassed, in force as well as eloquence, any unprepared speech he ever had heard made by any member of the House of Commons, if four or five members of the House were excepted.

Among these Bengalees there is a small body of men—small for that large province—who are, ironically or otherwise termed "Young Bengal." Some of them are no longer young, but grave and aged; some have, in the course of years, been highly distinguished for their public services and their scientific and other attainments. Some have at times been misrepresented, and their language misinterpreted, so that on its return to them it has amazed none more than themselves. Nothing of this has been done by the really great administrators of India. That it has been done, however, cannot be denied.

In the forefront of this little band is the author of this book of travels, Baboo Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee—a writer of high repute, as I have said, also an administrator, as the reader will see from the title-page to this book. A keener, yet a kindlier satirist, he does not seek for and not find. His use of English language has astonished many an Englishman; and the quality of his reading is shown by his marvellous power of quotation; not merely from authors like Shakespeare, and Milton, and Macaulay, and men eminent in science, but from out-of-the-way old ballads, and little-known old pamphlets, in the application of which he leaves one wondering—first, how he obtained the productions at all, and secondly, how, having obtained them, he learned to apply them so appositely to the subjects which he intends them to illustrate.

Passing from the author to his book, we shall, perhaps, first of all be attracted to the work of the administrator. He comes upon a milkman's village, on which he finds fastened the grip of a Court favourite. He unloosens the grip, and resettles the village, in the double interest of Prince and Peasant. And all the time he sees everything. The poor people bathing on the rivers' banks, have his genial and kindly, if also at times, what a Scotchman would call, his "pawky" notice. A "fair maid of Sonargoan" attracts his attention by the gracefulness with which she carries a vessel of water from the river; and, though the fair maid and he are divided by race and faith (she is Mussulman), she has his full meed of praise. Indeed, it must be admitted—and he will not be offended with me for saying so—that he never meets with a fair face, without at least giving evidence of the fact that he has eyes to see and a heart to comprehend.

Of his wide and generous sympathies, much might be said, and still leave much more to say. He meets a missionary on the river, and evidently is inclined, in writing his notes, to pass a joke on the subject. He nips it, however, in the bud, and contents himself with saying, "So new is preaching here, that the simple people said the padre had been singing in the street." He meets Catholic and Protestant missionaries on shipboard, and chuckles over their disputes, while he astonishes them by his command of the English language, and even by his knowledge of the Bible—a knowledge, I may add, which is evident in many of his writings.

A parrot falls overboard, and is drowned in its cage, to his great distress, which is not however paraded. He says: [Extract.]

These are not the words of a Christian, but of a Hindoo.

Again, he has a faithful dog, whose name is Tom, and whose glory once was to bark, with a noble independence, at some very dignified Sahibs. Our author is compelled to leave Tom behind; and here is his farewell: [Extract.]

I think this is a very fine passage, and one that will draw the author very close to the great heart of humanity, wherever the words are read. Could anything be finer than the testimony to the two foreign "gentlemen," ending with the "Bengalee pariah, my poor Tom"? Not the pariah merely, but the pariah dog. The passage is worthy of the author, and of the great mercifulness of the land that bore him.

Whoever reads this book must be prepared further to find bold and manly language. The author is no flatterer of John Bull, though he gives John his due, and admits that India owes him a great debt. Here is one passage relating to foreign fruits: [Extract.]

Among the sketches of country—word-pictures—the reader will find some exceedingly pretty, and all the more valuable in that they are taken from a standground purely Indian; not English. Where an English artist's mind would be filled with European ideas, the mind of this gifted Eastern artist is filled with a class of ideas totally different, yet equally instructive and certainly not less subtle and far-reaching.

On the eve of one of his journeys, our author was placed in a dilemma of a kind not unknown to travellers in India, but not on that account the less stupid. He wished to go by a particular boat, and took time by the forelock for that purpose. The fare was at first stated as 90 rupees, to pay which he offered "a new crisp, fresh British India" note for 100 rupees. "It was," he adds, "flesh from the Currency Office, and had been received only the day before from another Government department." The rest of the story is thus told: [Extract.]

The humour of the little sketch is worth noting. I can fancy the author laughing at his own dismay; for he can laugh well at other people, and especially well at himself. I shall not dwell on one more passage; and I give it, in the spirit of the man who dares to write in a newspaper Prince and Peasant. He desired to return to his home in Bengal, and to bid adieu, for a time at least, to Independent Tipperah, where he had been located "some two years." He received the Maharajah's permission to return home; but still he could not get away. [Extract.]

There is, I think, a sound lesson in this passage; the lesson of the immense value of courtesy and urbanity in the relations of rulers and ruled. There is a great deal in that sentence, "He serve flesh and blood." The best administrator in India is not always the ablest; the man whose plans are the wisest as plans; but the man who, with plans or without them, gives confidence to the people, and confidence not merely in his justice, but also in his consideration and forbearance. A clever man once said that the art of success in India is the art of giving good dinners. It may be so; but the peril is great—the peril of debt; and in any case the art has its limits, and its natural collapse. Even dinners and champagne pall in the end. But there is one art that never fails—the art of true courtesy; of that courtesy which, being natural, is not affected by any whim or caprice. One of the person who possesses it, of one with whom he has relations.

In bidding farewell to this little book, I once more recall, and very vividly can, the author's kindly and gentle voice, as known to me many years ago. I see him, as I see Baboo Kristo Lal Pal, Dr. Mahendra Lal Sircar, and some others, including a much-abused editor of the Amrita Bazar Patrika; and I feel and say, with all earnestness and sincerity, that among these are men whom the Government of India would be wise in recognising and winning entirely to its side. They are men on whom no really generous word—true as well as generous—ever is thrown away. I have compared them at times with men of kindred occupations at home, and I think that they are, as a rule by far the truer gentlemen in good manners, and often in very much more than mere manners. May the great God, whose sacred Name they use as that of the Father of all, guide them to a nobler destiny than any they yet have known, and with them, and by them, bless their native land!

JAMES ROUTLEDGE.

CONTEMPORARY LYRICS.

DEATH.

BY THE LATE DEAN STANLEY.

I

"Till Death us part."
So speaks the heart,
When each to each repeats the words of doom ;
Thro' blessing and thro' curse,
For better and for worse,
We will be one, till that dread hour shall come.

II.

Life, with its myriad grasp,
Our yearning souls shall clasp,
By ceaseless love, and still expectant wonder ;
In bonds that shall endure,
Indissolubly sure,
Till God in death shall part our paths asunder.

III.

Till Death us join.
O voice yet more divine !
That to the broken heart breathes hope sublime ;
Thro' lonely hours
And shattered powers
We still are one, despite of change and time.

IV.

Death, with his healing hand,
Shall once more knit the band
Which needs but that one link which none may sever ;
Till, thro' the Only Good,
Heard, felt, and understood,
Our life in God shall make us one for ever.

RHINE-SIDE.

By queenly Aix to pretty Bonn—
And then athwart the river,
In sheer idlesse we wandered on,
As fain to stray for ever.

With endless shift of Light and Shade
Fair Cloudland decked the scenery ;
And, rain-refreshed, brown Autumn made Herself new Summer-greenery.

Anew leapt out the parch'd rills,
Anew the dry grass sprouted,
A second life was on the hills,
And 'twixt the seasons doubted.

In golden shine the royal Rhine
His dancing wave uplifted ;
The rafts by Loreley's mountain-shrine
And reefed reefs were drifted.

On wood and dell,
On ruined shire and stonyness,
Where the Streif weaves his spell
Of legends.

For still with murmur and with roar
Ran on the storied river,
As if each robber-haunted shore
Should haunted be for ever.

Once more from his despairing height
Young Roland on his maiden
Gazed through the dim and mocking night,
Bereft and sorrow-laden,—

While o'er the pale and broken nun,
With love-troth vainly plighted,
The Dragon-Rock frowned sadly down
On heart and passion blighted.

Once more the wild marauding ban
Broke law and fear asunder,
And wrought their death-work on the lands,
For vengeance or for plunder.

And foreign force and foreign
Brought sword and fire to village
The restful homes, the peaceful coasts,
The ingle in the village.

The homes are gone—the hosts have passed
Into the Great Uncertain ;
The fateful pall is o'er them cast,
The impenetrable curtain.

The harsh steam-whistle calls and wakes
Their echoes shrill and lonely ;
The busy traveller, passing, takes
Note of the moment only.

But, storm or shine, the rushing Rhine
Flows on—the deathless river,
Whose harmonies, by grace divine,
Reverberate for ever.

NEWS AND COMMENTS.

THE latest discovery is—a safe is no longer safe, all patents notwithstanding, and though Chubb himself makes it. Experiments with Thomas Fletcher of Warrington's new gas blowpipe have demonstrated that thick iron and steel plates are easily penetrated.

HIS Highness the Maharajah of Jammu and Cashmere has been appointed Honorary Colonel of the 37th Bengal Infantry, and the Raja of Lanbagraon, an officer of the same corps. This is worse than an empty compliment—a foolish business. At any rate, it relieves the good Maharaja of Cooch Behar of the reproach of singularity.

THE Bengali Press is . . . The stigma of cowardice on our people is about to be wiped out . . . aulay, who pointed out that the Bengalis did not furnish a single . . . to the Company, has been practically refused. The hero to offer himself a sacrifice for the credit of his race, has been found. He is a true Bengali and a Baboo in the bargain, being a Kayastha or one of the caste of scribes. His name should be preserved—it is Khetter Mohan Palit. He has enlisted in the 7th Bengal Infantry, and is already serving a year, from June 1887. That he is no myth may be ascertained on enquiry at Fort William, where his regiment is now stationed.

Young Bengal remarks :—

"This is not the first time . . . though it is the first time that or . . . five or six years ago another . . . day, perhaps of better acquire . . . ed to be taken in—even as a . . . ed. Our readers shall perhaps . . . ighted young Zeminder by . . . istry we published months back."

A CORRESPONDENT of the Indian Mirror is informed that some poddars, of Garanhatta, with some budmashes, have formed a new order of the knights of industry, with original plan of operations. At nightfall, these latter, armed with . . . hang about the Beadon Gardens, in quest of prey, and, on espy . . . gentleman pass with watch and chain, suddenly pounce down on him and ease him of his gold and silver apparel, the booty being disposed of by the Poddars, and the proceeds shared between the two sets. "The Police ought to institute an enquiry into the matter, and ascertain the truth therein," says the Indian Mirror. How simple of our contemporary! Why, the Police must . . . another's son of them, as they know the aristocratic B . . . habazar sporting silk coats and real Cashmere shawls, w . . . at our watch and chain in the Lieutenant-Governor's cor . . . me locality—Garanhatta.

"Jealousy . . . lead a man to commit great mistakes and crimes. This . . . case with certain gentlemen connected with several . . . s in Calcutta. The Ripon College scored highest in the . . . ination, the first three places being occupied by its s . . . too much for several gentlemen, who go so far as to ins . . . K. M. Chatterjee, being one of the Professors of the C . . . ently with them. Nor is this all; they even dare to say . . . rjee left out Tort because the subject was not taught . . . college. How far this is, we do not know. So far as we know . . . atation was made to Mr. Chatterjee, by the students of the C . . . and the Metropolitan Colleges, which decided Mr. Chatterjee not to set any questions from Tort. These gentlemen, however, by false and unfair insinuations do nothing but ruin their own reputation."

Nice gentlemen these, to be sure! But, are there really any such black sheep in the plural number in our society to indulge in unfounded imputations on the honour of as true a gentleman as any among us, except the Mahatma of the Manger? In fact, our contemporary seems to have adopted this way of dealing with that rabid person, on the principle of teaching the daughter-in-law by licking the daughter.

THE Anti-Congress agitation is not confined to the Hon . . . Sir Syed Ahmed. According to the Express :—

"A crowded meeting has been held in Benare . . . of Raja Angra. Pandit Chintam . . . Rao Dharphole, lect . . . and extravagant in . . . expenses and the refon . . . kit learning, who has . . . working in the Oudh dist . . . an-thropist, delivered an . . . lecture denouncing the Cong . . . idea."

He proposed that no delegate representing the Benares district should attend the Congress meeting at Allahabad. The time, he said, which was uselessly spent in political agitation by the thinking, or rather unthinking, people of India must be utilized in improving agriculture, social reformation, education, and in promoting the cause of Anglo-Sanskrit education. Raja Ram Shahstri Medale was president, supported by Pandit Makundlal Tewari and Narayan Shastri. The meeting closed with a vote of thanks to the chairman."

A DISMISSED parcel clerk attached to the Benares cantonment, has sued the station master of Benares for defamation. It appears that the clerk, of 12 years' service, had been reported against by the Station Master for dishonesty, and had to go away. He had the sympathy of several of the European Civil and Military officers of the Cantonment, but their recommendation to reinstate him was of no avail. The Joint Magistrate Mr. C. W. Hope has fixed the case for the 2nd June.

MR. LESLIE SAUNDERS, Commissioner of Berar, was killed, on the morning of 22nd, by a fall while riding at Chikalda in the Ellichpur district.

THE Home remittances from 1st April to 19th May amounted to £2,327,900. The Budget estimate for the year 1888-89 is £14,000,000.

SRINAGAR 17. Cholera has slightly increased again in Kashmir. There were 136 new cases and 53 deaths on the 16th against 101 new cases and 45 deaths the day before.

SRINAGAR 19. Cholera continues to increase. 175 new cases and 64 deaths reported at Srinagar to-day. Cholera is said to be bad also at Poonch.

MAHARANEE Sarnamoyee, of Cossimbazar, contemplates soon raising the Berhampur College to the status of a first class college. From the next session it will teach up to the B. A.

IT has been reported from Srinagar that an Englishman with six servants has been buried in an avalanche in the Kaintal nulla in Kishtwar.

AT the suggestion of local antiquarians, Lord Ripon is having extensive diggings made in the grounds of Fountains Abbey for archaeological "finds."

BABOO BROJENDRA NATH DE, C. S., has passed the examination for the degree of Honor in Persian in the 1st Division, and has obtained the usual donation of Rs. 4,000.

SHATYA PRATAP SINGH, Maharajah of Satara, of the House of the historic Sivaji, has established a Brahma Somaj in his palace at Puna, which is attended by the Maharajah, and deferentially and inquisitively by his relatives and some outsiders.

THE town of Moni, capital of the Shan State of that name, was recently sacked and burnt by Twet Nga Lu, a filibuster, who has recently given some trouble in the states in that neighbourhood. News was received on the night of the 15th instant that Mr. Scott, the Assistant Superintendent of the Shan States, with Lieutenant Fowler and half a dozen men of the Rifle Brigade, mounted on officers' ponies made a plucky dash upon the place and secured the person of Twet Nga Lu, who is being brought into Fort Stedman.

THE following from Burma :—Rangoon 15th. The Northern Division generally quiet with the exception of Mogaung which is still a little disturbed. In the case of a dacoity in Shwebo the police pursued and killed two dacoits, wounded three, and captured some arms. The Eastern Division quiet. In the Central Division the Sagaing district continues disturbed: an important dacoit leader was killed and another captured during the week. Five dacoits were killed in the Myingyan district. In the Minbu district Inspector Locke with military police considered by To's gang and after two hours' engagement killed 15 coits and captured some arms; three men only on his side being unded. Nothing important in Lower Burma. The gang of dacoits o caused the recent disturbances in Tavoy is retreating to Siam. ro Shans concerned in the attack on Nabule have been arrested. rior Adamson is working up the facts about the disturbance.

read in the Ladies' Column of the Bombay Times :—

"In a new play that has caused some sensation in Paris called e Puits qui Parle," the figure of Truth, illustrated by a young woman remely scantily clad, grows into life before the eyes of the astonished lience, and being at last quite animated descends on to the stage m her well and speaks. She then returns to the edge of the well, d gradually the life seems to fade entirely away, and she is again a rble statue. Heavy prices have been offered to the manager to eal the way in which it is done, but he still prefers to keep his secret, d those who assist him to perform this trick are bound over by heavy es not to divulge it."

That is the Revolutionary Festival of Reason redivivus, within doors.

following some time ago appeared in a London letter to one of the pers :—

"Mr. Cordery too has come home at a wrong time. He arrived on nday last. By this time his ears must have tingled a good deal, his ear especially, for some very uncomplimentary things have been d about him lately. No one believes that Sir Horace Rumbold would ve obtained a single Halli Sicca rupee from the Treasury at Hydera- d but for the 'countenance' of the Resident. Mr. Peter MacLagan, P., backed by a well-known Englishman possessing interest in Hy- abad, in the House of Commons, and the St. James's Gazette outside, ween them will make matters particularly unpleasant for all the rties to the successful demand on Hyderabad Treasury.

You know many of the facts in this scandalous case, but some may e to the surface here which are kept below ground in India. Among se will be found a letter in last night's St. James's Gazette, signed

It should not be difficult to identify the writer. He gives some t starting instances of over charges, not to say anything stronger, e by the Palmer firm. What, however, I have not seen anywhere ed is the handsome manner in which Wm. Palmer and his relatives e treated by the Nizam after the failure of the firm. A letter, dated 1 March, 1840, is extant, addressed by old Wm. Palmer to General ser, Resident at Hyderabad, in which that gentleman describes the sions he and his family received from the State as follows :—

I receive	per month	Rs. 2,500
My brother	"	" 1,000
My son Mr. W. Palmer	"	" 600
My nephew, Mr. H. Arrow	"	" 400

more than twenty years after that date these handsome payments e continued at least so far as Mr. Wm. Palmer was concerned. Say, e amount was enjoyed for thirty years only, and a simple sum in hmetic will show that, not counting interest, over sixteen lakhs of rupees (not as now depreciated, but) worth two shillings each have e paid to the Palmer family."

Nov. Opinion quotes three Sindhi proverbs, adduced by a cor- sident of the Civil and Military Gazette, showing how the Sindhi ards his neighbour the Panjabi, as argument against the annexation ind to the Punjab :—

1. Snake cherish ! Panjabi perish !
Of the same water are cow and ass,
They both belong to the Panjab class.
When one Panjabi comes, you'll soon find two. When two Pan- s come, no room for you."

MAL breath is more poisonous than carbonic acid. Professor wn-Sequard has found from the condensed watery vapour of the red air a poisonous liquid, which, injected under the skin of rabbits, luced immediate death. He considers this poison an alkaloid and a microbe. The rabbits died without convulsions, the heart and e blood vessels being engorged with blood.

Holloway's Pills and Ointment.—It is impossible entirely to prevent oxious vapours which are given off in mines and tunnels, and e who, like miners and railway operatives, have to work day after in such vitiated atmospheres, suffer in health and strength in conse- ce. The chest and liver often become clogged with the products al combustion, necessitating great attention to the health. No dy is more valuable for miners and the like than Holloway's Pills, ey carry off all effete matter from the blood, and healthily stimulate ver. They are also invaluable for costive bowels and for all bilious less. The Ointment is a priceless remedy for piles, sprains, and all manner of sores.

NOTES AND LEADERETTES.

THE Dewanship of Indore left vacant by the flight of R. Ragoonath Row, has been filled by Rao Bahadur Venyak Janardan Kirtane, late Naib Dewan of Baroda. The new Dewan assumed office on the 17th.

THE Vice-Chancellor and Syndicate of the Calcutta University have at last ordered publication of a result of the Entrance Examination. The List of successful candidates gives 477 in the first division, 1138 in the second and 1105 in the third, or a total of 2720. Of the Calcutta Institutions, the Metropolitan returns the largest number—and a fisherboy. But how to account for the delay? And what about the mathematical examiners who made short work of the answers by numbering them without going through them? Out with it, Mr. Registrar, if you please!

THE new temporary Judges of the Calcutta High Court, the Hon'ble Messrs. R. F. Rampini and H. W. Gordon, to their seats in the forenoon of the 30th ultimo. But the work for the Judges is very light. There are no arrears to bring up and the institution of cases has been reduced to half by the enforcement, from the commencement of April last, of Sec. 551 of the Civil Procedure Code, which empowers confirmation of decision of the lower Court without sending it notice of appeal or for records.

THERE was the usual Garden Party of the Chairman of the Calcutta Corporation on the Queen's Birthday. Notwithstanding Sir Henry Harrison's municipal bill just passed by the Local Council, the party was well-attended. One was noticed, the absence of progressive nature—one who would muster strong on former of and wife. Same roof. Is it possible that both sides have b in disillusionised?

THE Shiaks and Soonnees had a scrimmage on the evening of the 17th, near a mosque at Kazigungge, at Allahabad. As the mosque is a Shiah place of worship, the Soonnees, vain of their numbers, were probably the aggressors. Blows were exchanged in right earnest, and several on each side were wounded. Seeing their assailants every moment swell in number, the Shiaks adopted the policy of discretion and retreated before the host and barricaded themselves within their mosque, or else the consequences would have been far more serious. The Police, by instinct led, kept themselves out of the business till it was all over, when they made the usual sounding demonstration on the spot, charging upon the wayfarers, seizing and maltreating every body—but those who had any hand in the disturbance.

THE champion of Native rights and the hero of the Arnigad case has now devoted himself to the cause of Hinduism. He is "stumping" the country against the confiscation of a temple at Benares. On behalf of Ram Chunder Rao Paindey, Trustee for the Temples of Gunnessh, Shiva, and Appurna and the Chattra in the City of Benares, Captain Hearsey claims red of Government securities for 3 lacs of Rupees and value of damages of move- able and immoveable property sold and damaged in 1858. As may easily be supposed, Government is unwilling to re-open a case thirty years old, but the Captain is not the easily silenced He has been touring the country, enlisting sympathy of the Hindus in his cause. Meetings have been held at Dehra Doon, Lohi, Moradabad, Bareilly, Shahjehanpur, Luckhempur, Fyzabad and Benares, and his petition supported by signatories at Saharanpur, Lucknow, Cawnpore, and Sitapur. And now he lays siege to the metropolis.

THE liberality with which the Government has treated the so-called princes of Metiabrooj to the neglect of the true blood-royal, has raised expectations in other hearts. We read in the Indian Daily News :—

"Nawab Zaighomud Dowlah, son of the late Nawab Syed Ali Nokhee, Khan Bahadour, Prime Minister of Oudh, has presented a petition to His Excellency the Viceroy, setting the position of his father and his services in connection with the division of Oudh. His father had Rs. 25,000 monthly as Prime Min. The King promised him and his family Rs. 4,000 per month for me but discontinued it, saying that, as his father was loyal to the British Government, he should look to them for help. The King stopped the pension and told him to look his pension from the Oudh Est. Unfortunately he died shortly afterwards. Petitioner explains the delay in making his petition, and his present position. He was tried to obtain a pension under Government, but he was put in offices barely being Rs. 100 per month. He remains a very well-known officers who can bear witness to his position and deserts. Should a pension be not granted to him, he desires at least a suitable berth in some department of the service, in order that he may honourably support himself and his family. He observes that many servants and members of the Oudh family are in receipt of pensions whose claims are much inferior to his own."

By the Oudh Estate, doubtless the kingdom of Oudh is meant. The Nawab is not well advised in asking for an appointment. He will not get a decent one, and will not keep it if he got one. It is impossible not to sympathise with his family, however. They have a real claim upon the revenues of Oudh, which Nawab Ali Nukkee Khan betrayed into the hands of Lord Dalhousie. Ali Nukkee did not care for pensions or jaghires, being immensely rich. How his wealth was dissipated within a few short years of his death, is one of the mysteries of Matiabrooj, which the Political Agency ought to account for. The prodigality of the two sons was by no means so extraordinary as to prove so ruinous.

FROM the pro-Gazette official, we find that Messrs. Sibold and Williams, of Jut, have offered to construct a Tramway within that town. It is to be a single line of the metre gauge and worked by steam, the mileage being fixed at Rs. 500. There are to be two classes of passengers, the lower fare not exceeding one anna per mile and the higher class at double that rate. The Company bind themselves to a penalty of Rs. 200 for any breach of the conditions not provided for in the draft deed or in the Tramway Act, and a further daily fine of Rs. 50 for continuance of the breach. We hope there will be no hurry in closing with the offer, particularly as extensive private and public interests are involved. The Government ought to profit by the Bengal experience. A tramway introduced into a town is at best a nuisance. Care should be taken in new and growing towns, in especial for the sake of the idea of suspecting the nothing, and speaking of the past, particularly in the presence of the Parliamentary Committee on the Hyderabad Company frauds, we are bound to warn the public against being taken in and the Government against permitting any abuse of the concession. We hope there is no benami in the project, as in Calcutta. No official speculators should be allowed to fatten at the expense of private investors, of the municipality, and of the public.

THE new number of the English Review opens with a remarkable article, brilliant and overflowing with information and criticism, on the late Egypto-British campaign of six years back. It is attributed by the Army & Navy Gazette to the vigorous pen of Sir Edward Hamley and to the accuracy of his literary reputation. It recalls the palmy days of the Review. It criticises with an unsparing hand Colonel Maurice's History of the Campaign of 1882 in Egypt. The Review of the paper lies chiefly in its exposure of the British conduct in the unhappy Land of the Pharaohs. With a masterly pen it traces the beginnings and progress of the unprincipled foreign money-lenders and other adventurers in the government of the country. He thoroughly unmasks the plea that makes the British aggression, headed by Arabi Pasha, responsible for the calamities which ensued on the British aggressions and occupation. The British expedition to injury and is unworthy of all true Englishmen. The Review agrees with Lieutenant-Colonel von Vogt that the action of the Liberal Party in taking the affairs of their country in hand—the so-called revolt of Arabi the Egyptian—"was the result of a very natural reaction against the financial drain caused by European money-lenders and banking establishments." He scouts the pretence that the expedition to Egypt was caused by alarm at Arabi's attempt to tamper with the Suez Canal. The British Expedition was a foregone conclusion. The writer says:—

"Early in the year an officer had been specially despatched to report upon the state of affairs from Ismailia to Cairo, and had brought back much detail."

The Army & Navy Gazette goes further—

"If we are not mistaken, an officer had made inquiries upon the spot in a hostile occupation the year before."
Colonel von Vogt denounces the bombardment of Cairo.

ONE of the fine oil paintings of the Glasgow Exhibition, which was attributed, on which Scott, of Torquay, formerly of Darjeeling, is engaged. It represents a twilight scene in the Himalayas with the new moon just peeping from behind the distant ranges. It is appropriately designated by a Horatian phrase—Purpurei Orientis honores (Eastern purple honors)—being a gorgeous effect in colours.

THE Army and Navy Gazette writes:—

"An officer sends from Mandalay some interesting notes as to the progress of civilisation in that new British station in the East. The city, he says, is quite transformed. The native city within the walls has disappeared in salutary fires. The whole aspect of the place is changed. Barracks for the British garrison, public offices, and residences for the officials replace the old streets of planks and mud studded on stilts along the edge of the broad, rectangular, and quite unsavoury and wholly unpaved streets. Now the roadways are macadamised; the houses are of substantial brick; the barracks are of the cheap and abundant teak of the country. Mr. Crossthwait's new house is built on a part of the broad city wall. New gardens are laid out; those around the Palace are greatly improved. The Palace is utilised for official residences, and serves the purposes of a Secretariat. The new native town springing up outside the walls is progressing down the broad causeways leading to the river, which were marked out by our engineers a month after the occupation. There is security for life and property, and the city hopes for a future of prosperity. Meanwhile, Mandalay within the walls is becoming, if it be not actually, the finest cantonment in the Empire. We wonder if the natives agree with our correspondent in this view of the improvers' work in the city. We hope they do; for, after all, the officials were made for the people, and not the people for the officials."

Can the writer deceive himself that a people can possibly be reconciled by macadamised roads and good barracks (for a foreign garrison) to loss of their country? Ask the Mandalayites how they like the British polishing—in every way! As well ask the geese how they enjoy plucking?

EXILED from home, the French Princes are not to have peace or fair play even abroad. It appears that the Duc d'Orleans, the eldest son of the Comte de Paris, who has been travelling in India, is to be attached to one of the Indian regiments. Thereupon a writer in Truth cries out against the employment in India of the eldest son of the head of "that intriguing clan." He asserts that the appointment cannot be regarded in France except as a mark of decided hostility. Indeed! And what if it be so? Surely, England was not so reduced as to stint her old courtesy to strangers in dread of the unreasonable prejudices of other nations. What a difference between the nervousness of this writer and the noble boast of Curran!

FROM men to things is a natural step, without implying the degradation involved in the descent from the sublime to the ridiculous. From rehabilitating bad characters to rehabilitating bad places, can scarcely be an awkward or difficult transition. Accordingly, we find that the criticism and inquiry of the day, after rescuing from reproach the black legs of history, proceed to illumine its dark places. Who would have thought of the possibility of vindicating the Bastille! In the annals of Europe, there is not a spot of more terrible associations—of infamous memory than that prison of the old Monarchy of France. Whatever dispute there may be as to the principles and proceedings of that political earthquake which overtook France towards the end of the last century, about the Bastille there is a singular agreement. The destruction of it has ever been regarded by all as the most unexceptional achievement of the Revolution. The fervid generosity of Burke did indeed put in a word in favor of that old prison. But he was promptly rebuked by young Mackintosh and mercilessly handled by that formidable pamphleteer Tom Paine. As regards the Bastille at any rate, all parties have endorsed the view of the great British Parliamentarian's opponents. The Bastille has thus come down to us as the embodiment of the tyranny, cruelty, unfairness and baseness of all that was foul in the ancien régime. But a change has come over the spirit of the Age. With the progress of liberality of sentiment and loyalty to truth, beliefs have been shaken—the most settled positions upturned. The Bastille has had the advantage of that fair play which is not now denied to the blackest demons of history. It has found an able and pains-taking defender in Captain the Hon. D. Bingham. He has gone into its history with resolute ardour, and now announces the result of his inquiry in two volumes. The result is highly favourable to the credit of the place. It exposes the injustice that mankind has during more than ninety years of time, has done. The old dungeon has been the victim of a prejudice.

The Bastille was, after all, no very ominous thing. It was a strong place—a fortified gaol—that was all. The dark underground dungeons which have frightened the imaginations of so many generations, were simply ice-houses. As a prison, there was nothing exceptional—no cruelties nor oppressions of any kind. No, not even squalor or overcrowding or starving of the inmates. There was no harshness even towards the worst badmashes, whether literary, political, or miscellaneous. What a Paradise for such scamps as some who prowl almost us, to the disturbance of honest citizens and the disgrace of legitimate public affairs and true letters! There was far more light and air, humanity and comfort, than in most prisons of the period, if John Howard is to be believed. And there was no gaol-fever of course. As compared with old Newgate, for example, it was a delightful place.

THE dapper Duke is not given to effusion, but the Irish madness is gradually infecting the most cool-headed, and so we find His Grace of Argyle giving himself up to this sort of dissipation at the Guildhall, Cambridge, which is reported in the papers. Speaking on the Union with England and Scotland, he proceeded to describe

“the feelings with which he as a Scotsman approached the question. He said that not very long ago, among some family papers, he saw an account of things done by those who had gone before him, and whose name he bore, which made him desire to see the field of Bannockburn, on which Scotland succeeded in maintaining her independence against the serried ranks of the English army. He went to it and stood where Robert Bruce had stood, and where his own ancestor had stood beside him. It was a glorious autumn day, and he recalled incidents of the battle, concluding with the little Bannock running with the best blood of England and France, and he stouted for joy at the remembrance of it.”

A strange avowal that! Joy at the idea of a stream flowing with human blood! The Duke of Argyle was known to be a cynic, and he appears to be something more hideous than a misanthrope. That reminds us of the brither Sawny who was discovered in a cave full of skulls and flesh of his victims near Edinburgh.

FOR want of better excitement, Society in England has lately been making the most of the dispute of a couple of old women for social precedence and literary pretension. The ladies of Great Britain decided to present the Princess of Wales with an address and a diamond tiara on the occasion of the silver wedding. The ladies are divided in politics according to their family preferences, and those of each party put up their own representative for the honor of reading the address and presenting the jewel. The Liberal fair constituted the Marchioness of Ailesbury as their mouthpiece and charged her with the drawing up of the address. She is a fine specimen of venerable womankind, accomplished and agreeable, a famous talker, not in the sense of ancient garrulity, but full of vivacity. She prepared the draft and sent it on to the leading lady of the Tories—the Marchioness of Salisbury. She is mare meet to mate with the horse—quite as formidable among her kind as the Marquis among his. She acknowledged receipt and wrote back to the Gladstonian Marchioness:—

“Do you really expect me to put my name to an effusion not one sentence of which is English?”

That ought to be some consolation to our countrymen so often accused of “Baboese.” The prospect is not, however, cheering for those Indians who loyally strive to learn their sovereign’s tongue in its purity, seeing that high ladies of her own Court are liable to the reproach of inaccuracy and barbarism. Verily, the Queen’s English is an unknown quantity or rather a slippery quality!

THE Mirror’s Cooch Behar Correspondent writes:—

“The Superintendent of State’s term of office will expire in November next, I believe. It is hoped that the Maharajah will feel no delicacy in bringing in another qualified man, be he a European or Native, to fill the most responsible and high post in the administration of the State. If the services of such men as Dewan Raghu Nath Rao or Sir T. Madhava Rao could be secured, the necessity of having two such big officers as that of the Dewan and of the Superintendent of the State might be dispensed with. Suggestions to this effect, I hear, have been made to His Highness. They should have his best consideration.”

That is a fine appreciation of the services of Captain Gordon and Babu Kalicadas Dutt, and a quiet hint. But what a compliment is paid to Bengal by the suggestion to bring up a Rao Bahadur all the way to manage Cooch Behar! Is there such a virtue in Grimm’s Law? Will not a Roy do, with or without Bahadur? Or even a Bose or a Ghose or even a Chatterjea, notwithstanding the barking from the well-known manger? What! are even Sens so discredited in Cooch Behar? We still swear by Norender!

The same writer adds:—

“The post of Secretary to the State Council having fallen vacant, one Jagomohun Tagore from the Central Provinces applies for it. His Highness has written to the Commissioner, Central Provinces, for the loan of his service.”

So the compliment has been already paid—by the left hand.

Native Opinion of the 20th instant has an interesting account of the rise of the new little state of Zanzibar on the African Coast. Originally an Arab colony, peopled by the chief of Muscat with emigrants from Oman, its prosperity was due to the enterprise of Hindus and Mussulmans from the Western Coast of India who settled there or traded with it. Two brothers were contending for supremacy over it when Lord Elphinstone, Governor of Bombay, interfered and persuaded them to divide their possessions, one keeping Oman with Muscat for his capital, and the other remaining as independent sovereign of the islands on the African Coast, the principal of which is Zanzibar. The first ruler of Zanzibar has been followed by two successors. The last was Sayed Bargash who had been in his youth an exile in Bombay. Not long after ascending his throne, he went to Europe for a couple of years, accompanied by Dr. now Sir John Kirk, the British Consul. He was a sensible if somewhat severe and grasping man, who promoted commerce by every means in his power, improving his town, making roads, lighting them, providing water, &c. His eldest son being a lad of eleven by a Georgian concubine, the late ruler’s brother has succeeded him. He was living in obscurity on a farm in the interior when he was called to the throne. He is, however, a man of no weight or experience. The romance of this petty peddling Arab principality, which long lived on slavery and would now revert to a corsair state if Britain would or could allow it, is supplied by Syed Bargash’s sister. She fell strangely in love with a German and married the Nazarene with whom she went to Europe. She returned on board a gun-boat to prosecute her claims while her brother was still living, but did not land. She returned back to Europe after obtaining her dues. She may yet turn up at a convenient juncture.

THE High Court has been distinguished for the trial of the most sensational crimes committed in the metropolis of late years. The last case, popularly known as the Doveton murder, was the first tried. Meher Ali, the son of the Dowlatnama of the Dovetod Girls’ Institution, with two others, was accused of murdering his son-in-law—husband of his foster-daughter—Shaikh Hori, in one of the out-offices of the Institution in the middle of the day, after a brief altercation about a demand made by the victim for some two hundred Rupees owing to him, and after well strangling him with a rope, putting the body in a box which was left on the bank of the river. It was the box, which happened to contain an empty phial with a label on, that connected the Doveton school with the occurrence. The evidence was simply of this circumstantial kind. The prisoners were ably defended, Meher Ali by Mr. M. P. Gasper, and the others by Mr. Lal Mohan Ghose. The presiding Judge was the Nestor of the Bench. For though Mr. Justice Wilson has strangely disappointed in the Tangail case, he is still our brightest jewel of the Court. His judicial temper and demeanour are exemplary, and for summing up he has no equal. Yet in this case, in his anxiety to see that the offender did not escape justice, he was a little hasty in assuming a murder where all the surrounding circumstances pointed more to accident—culpable homicide, it most. The Jury returned a verdict of guilty of murder against Meher Ali and acquitted the other prisoners. The Judge accepted the verdicts and discharged the latter. Meher Ali was as usual asked if he had to urge anything why capital sentence should not be pronounced on him. He answered he had not murdered. So the Judge performed the most painful function of the judicial office and pronounced the awful sentence of death. As Meher Ali was being carried out of the Court House he addressed the crowd, commenting on the strangeness of the justice that convicted one of three men implicated in the same offence. Perhaps he said more, but that is all that has been reported. On meeting his son he abused him for wasting the best part of his hard-earned fortune in defending him. He directed him to send him all his papers to the jail as he wished to make a proper disposition of his remaining property. And a proper disposition he has made, leaving one half to his son and the other moiety to be divided between the brother and the deceased Hori. Meanwhile, the true facts have oozed out to the public, and a strong appeal has been made by many of the most respectable and honoured members of the community, in which most of the Jury have joined, praying for the commutation of the capital sentence on Meher Ali.

The case of the murder of the retired Mr. Baboo Khetter Nath has been nearly concluded. On Monday Mr. Justice Wilson will deliver his charge.

A FAR more powerful objection to the extension of Calcutta has been found. The Law Member of the Governor-General in Council alone power to extend the limits of the 24-Parganas District. The annexation of the best part of the 24-Parganas District Bill just passed in the Bengal Council is, therefore, ultra vires. It is it that the question was not raised in Council and discussed specially with so many limbs of the law in it? It would have been just like them to take such a crushing preliminary objection. But better late than never. The Law Member of the Viceregal Council has now received formal notice of the illegality of this Bengal effort at law-making, and we are sure the matter will receive the best consideration at his hands. Mr. Scoble has been all his life practising the law and knows the respect due to it, and he is no mere book-lawyer and speculator, like so many of his predecessors including the most eminent of them.

It will not do to say that the extension is for municipal purposes only, nor can any Viceregal extension be limited to municipal purposes.

WE understand and we are glad to see with pleasure, that Government has favourably accepted the recommendation, made in these columns in 1886, for awarding the Victoria Cross to deserving members of the Native Army of Her Majesty.

THE ex-Dewan Luchman Das of Cashmere is playing the truant. He has not yet entered appearance in the Commission appointed to try him, although summoned no less than eight times.

SPECULATION is still rife as to the date of the Viceroy's departure. The Englishman's Simla Correspondent mentions a rumour that Lord Dufferin contemplates remaining in India till the end of the year on the authority of a private telegram. It is not possible to say at the time. And all after the recent authorities. People will not see that at present when he would be going. He is a nobleman who has left America. That nobleman has left America. There is no knowing by what time he is likely to return to India.

WITH the retirement of Col. Prideaux, the Political Agency on the King of Oudh, merges in the 24-Parganas Collectorate. The gallant Colonel had recommended his immediate assistant in the Government's pay for Deputy Collectorship and Deputy Agency in local Oudh affairs after the precedent of the Nizamut. The Government, perhaps now grown wiser, would not sanction the job, and has appointed the Hon'ble Abdool Jubbar under the Collector to administer the affairs. The Moulvie is on leave, however, Baboo Hem Chunder Kerr acts temporarily. The other assistant in the pay of the King now sports a certificate of good conduct and efficiency under the hand and seal of the Colonel. He has had his day. Introduced on a salary of Rs. 800, he was ordered to draw Rs. 750 a month.

THE PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION—A DISAPPOINTMENT.

OUR last week's article requires an explanation. In the anguish of disappointment at the outcome of the Commission, we have been betrayed into some injustice, perhaps. In saying that the subject of a simultaneous competition for the Covenanted Civil Service in India had been disposed of in the Report summarily, merely with the ipse dixit that such a competition in this country was undesirable, we overstated the case against the Commission. Considering the importance of the point, as well as the great value set upon it by numerous classes of the Indian population, and the opinion of the kind on the part of the Commission, indeed, hardly possible, and, after more careful consideration, we are glad to find ourselves wrong, so far as the fact itself is concerned. The subject has received the consideration of the Commission, although the conclusion is all too unsatisfactory.

In further justice to the Commission as a whole, it ought to be stated that not a little have representatives of the Native interests themselves contributed towards such a conclusion. Indeed, we have to thank ourselves if its decision is not otherwise. Three of the Native Commissioners, to wit, Mr. Justice Romesh Chunder Mitter, and Messrs. Rawaswami Mudaliyar and Krishnaji Lukshman Nulkar, did not, indeed, share in the apprehensions generally felt as to the probable result of the introduction of an Indian competition, but neither was their support of it at all vigorous nor full-hearted. For the rest, the other native members, together with no inconsiderable number of native witnesses who gave their evidence, were fascinated by the charms of an English training, and outvied the English supporters of a practical monopoly in their advocacy of an antipodal trial for Indian youth. The Commission has thus been placed in a position to state, that the evidence tendered before it supports the conclusion that the English competition "is very favorably looked upon by large and important classes in India." The judgment has gone against us by our own fault. Our own representatives have belied the real Indian feeling on the question. The social and political disability implied in the existence of an arrangement, ostensibly based on considerations of race and religion, is to be perpetuated at the instance of a handful of Indian agitators themselves.

Our regret at the Commission's decision is the keener as it professes to be final. Not only under the terms of the Government Resolution, was the object of the appointment of the Commission declared to be "to devise a scheme which may reasonably be hoped to possess the necessary elements of finality," but the language in which the decision is conveyed by the Commission, leaves little room for hope that the question can be reopened at any measurable distance of time. "On a full consideration," says the Commission, "of the evidence before it, the Commission has come to the conclusion that it is inexpedient to hold an examination in India for the Covenanted Civil Service simultaneously with the examination in London." The terms are absolute, and without any qualification as to time. Such qualification as to time is, however, distinctly made in referring to the objections to an Indian competition. One of these objections is noticed by the Commission to be "that Indian schools and colleges do not at the present time supply an education and training of the high and liberal kind considered to be a necessary qualification for admission to the to the Indian Civil Service...." The italics are ours. This argument is certainly pertinent to the question, and if it was considered to be of force, it could justly furnish reason for postponing the simultaneous examination in India till such time as the standard of Indian education arrived at the necessary degree of perfection and completeness. A limitation as to time might reasonably be assigned to the Commission's recommendation. Again, if the state of Indian education did not furnish the required degree of qualification, there could be little harm in having a tentative competition which, as it was bound to fail, would thereby be a most effective answer to the party demanding an Indian examination, while at the same time it would go far to conciliate that party by showing that it was no adverse policy but merely the inherent impracticability of the thing itself that was against the adoption of their proposal. Other objections, besides the one based on the educational backwardness of this country, had certainly their due weight with the Commission, or we might have looked for a decision given with limitations and without the character of finality. What those other objections are, have been summarized in the Report. The pros and cons of the question are thus given:—

“Briefly stated, the arguments usually advanced by those who favor the plan of a competition examination in India are that the introduction of some such system is necessary to remove obstacles which at present preclude natives of India from competing on terms of equality with British born subjects of her Majesty, and that the interposition of such obstacles is inconsistent with the statute of 1833 and Queen’s proclamation of 1858. In the first place there are religious and caste objections, to which the Commission will hereafter refer, which debar members of certain classes from crossing the sea. But—even when these objections do not exist, it is argued with much force that Indian parents are naturally reluctant to send their children at a comparatively early age to a distant country, where they are exposed to many temptations, and where sufficient supervision may not be exercised over them; and it is still more strongly insisted that considerations of expense deter many native youths from appearing as candidates at the examination in England, especially in view of the risk of failure, which, under the conditions of the English examination, must always be great in the case of Indian candidates. These difficulties, it is said, deter many of the best natives of India from seeking entrance to the covenanted Civil Service, and practically have the effect of a race disqualification.

On the other hand, it is argued that in the present circumstances of social life in India, open competition in that country would not justify to the same extent as similar competition in England, the presumption that the successful candidates would possess in a sufficient degree the qualities essential for high administrative office, that Indian schools and colleges do not at the present time supply an education and training of the high and liberal kind considered to be a necessary qualification for admission to the Indian Civil Service, and that an open competition in India for the covenanted would operate with inequality, excluding altogether some important classes of the community, while giving undue advantage to others. It is further argued that it could scarcely fail—in view, on the one hand of the large number of candidates who would offer themselves for examination, and, on the other hand, of the small number who could, under any circumstances, be successful,—to create a large disappointed, and thereby probably discontented, class which would cause considerable embarrassment to the Government. Doubts have been also expressed whether pressure would not sooner or later be brought to bear on the Government with a view to make the examination of a less English and a more Oriental character and to adjust it on terms more favorable to Native candidates. Again some witnesses have referred to the injurious effect which, in their opinion, would be exercised upon the development of education in this country by an open competition for the Civil Service. It is urged that in view of the value of the prizes offered, such an examination would be followed by the creation of private establishments for the main, if not sole, purpose of offering special preparation to intending candidates, while the regular educational institutions would scarcely be able to resist the temptation of so shaping the course of their study as to secure success at the Indian examination rather than to impart a general liberal education to the mass of their scholars. Some witnesses, indeed, have expressed the opinion that the effect of unqualified competition in India on general education would be so disastrous as to constitute a national evil of great ultimate importance. There are two other objections taken to the establishment in India of competitive examinations for the Civil Service to which it is necessary to refer, namely, the difficulty which would be experienced in maintaining the secrecy of the examination papers, and in making satisfactory arrangements for that part of the examination which is conducted viva voce. It is said that experience in connection with examinations in India has shown very real difficulties to exist under the former of these heads, which, if not actually insurmountable, are at all events sufficient to suggest the necessity for the greatest caution. As regards the viva voce examination, it is contended that it would be impossible to secure either uniformity of test or the high standard exacted in England, if the work were undertaken by the professional staff available in India.”

We have reproduced the Commission’s summary of arguments for and against an Indian examination, for the benefit of our readers. Let them ponder these, and judge if they are such as to justify the decision to which the Commission has come. If the question is one of qualification, nothing can be fairer than that the same test should be applied here as in London, for testing them, and that those alone should be admitted who pass the test which, notwithstanding the special pleading as regards the difficulties of a viva voce and honest examination in India, may easily be made the same at both places.

THE KYD STREET ACCIDENT AND UNSAFE HOUSES.

Not long ago, one fine day, Calcutta was startled by a domestic calamity to one of its residents. It was nothing less than the sudden coming down of a house with dwellers in it. The house was a large three storeyed one in a quarter of the European town, which, whatever its medieval name, was respectable enough for, and has been thoroughly sweetened by, the continual residence of the gentleman of the city, Sir Henry Harrison, and it was at the time tenanted by its owner, a respectable Jewish lady, Mrs. Rebecca Sasson. The accident created a sensation throughout the country and an actual alarm in the town itself. As the house was to all appearance sound, it was feared that we might all some day be overtaken by a similar fate. Accordingly, a natural curiosity was manifested as to the cause of the accident. But now, we are afraid, without being a whit wiser, we have resigned ourselves to the old indifference. The subject is worth a reminder, however.

In connection with the recent death of Mrs. Rebecca Sasson’s house in Kyd Street in this city, the Indian Spectator has opportunely reminded the public of a similar accident, with consequences even more unfortunate, not long ago, in Bombay. The Honourable Narayan Wassudeo, one of the leading men of the Presidency, at the time of his death a member of the local Legislative Council, was suddenly buried alive by the tumbling down of a portion of his house. The reminiscence is timely. Although in Calcutta the good Jewess was brought out of the ruins of her dwelling with a few scratches, while the Honourable Hindoo was buried up to his premises, there were many points of resemblance between the two accidents. Wassudeo lived on Malabar Hill in a house hired by him for the purpose. It proved to have been a too costly whistle. He was not only out of the pocket of a large sum for consideration, but he finally paid for it with his life in the bargain. It was a large house, but old and decayed. He had decided upon a general rehabilitation. Some alterations were in progress before a thorough repair. While the work was in the very act of superintending these works, all of a sudden the part which was being operated upon of the house came down about his ears and engulfed him, crushing his body and his life out of it, unlucky man! Here, too, in Calcutta, the house in Kyd Street was a great shaky pile, which had been condemned by engineers. It ought to have been taken down, but it is too odious a suggestion to any owner. The owner lived in it, all the extensive repairs and repairs necessary for safety were ordered and undertaken. But the owner would not remove to other quarters in the meantime. And for other reasons. For one thing, removal is such a nuisance; it tries the most heavenly temper. So she clung to her home to the bitter end. She was indeed a martyr to her love of comfort and convenience. It was bad enough to have a whole army of matstrees and masons and their myrmidons invading your home and murdering all quiet at day if not also sleep at night, and dislodging you from room to room in your own home. But you can at least make an orderly retreat with all your forces and all your baggage, without the loss sure to be entailed on long marches. Poor Rebecca elected the easier and more comfortable alternative. She remained in her house while the changes in the building proceeded, shifting from apartment to apartment. While the process was in progress, one day, without any notice, the whole pile came down about her ears. More lucky than the Hindoo, Mrs. Sasson escaped unscathed. It is a pity that the same carelessness might have befallen her. What conduct, she certainly was without advice in what she did. She must have been told there was no great risk. She had certainly read of much larger edifices—great American hotels—being moved while the houses were full and occupied. Unusual. Why should not a comparatively small private dwelling be repaired with safety to the inmates? Up to this time, indeed, no satisfactory explanation of the great crash has appeared, which is a pity, seeing that other houses in the same condition may come down without warning, and with more disastrous consequences perhaps. It is necessary to know the specific source of danger in the tumbled down house. The previous condemnation is little to the purpose now. Surely, that condemnation was not specific and peremptory enough, else no man or woman in his or her senses would have remained in it while it was being taken down in parts. The house was not so near the street to be affected by vibration of the ground from carriages passing; there was a broad garden between the street and the building that fell down. Nor was it in the rainy season when the soil is soft from continual wet, nor after days of down-pour, that the house gave way. These are important considerations in estimating the cause of the accident. The matter concerns all residents, and they ought not to be without a thorough inquiry.

The above has been in type for some time. Since then, an official report has appeared, the result of Coroner's inquest. But in our mind, they are far from conclusive. The lady's evidence of the effect of the gun-firing in Fort on the house on the day before the fall, is evidently colored by her nervousness since. If the effect was so very striking, how did she still stick to the house? The professional opinion that would predicate weakness of a wall because it was made of small bricks is worth little attention. We know that our strongest houses are made of the old small bricks laid on one another with a layer of mere earthen jelly without any cementing property between.

THE NEW ANGLO-INDIAN DAILY.

THE Morning Post may yet be a formidable rival to the older journals; it is said to have already caused a diversion; but as yet it is not quite free from the defects of a new concern. The editing would be the better for a little more care. A competent "reader" is badly wanted on the staff. The paper teems with typographical oddities. Such errors as "good, humou" are always disagreeable and should be specially eschewed till the paper has acquired prestige. Such Celtic-looking epithets as "rex" send the unsophisticated reader searching in vain through his dictionaries. The editorial note on "the Mendacious London Correspondent" is a puzzle. It runs thus—

"The 'Indian Nabobs' who attended the Jubilee celebrations will be interested to learn that they have introduced a new drink on their return to their own country. It is known as the Jubilee Peg and is thus concocted: In a large soda water tumbler is placed a lump of ice; on this is poured a large glass of brandy, the tumbler is then filled with champagne; to be drunk while effervescing. The Nabob's visitors are gravely assured the 'Prince of Wales never drinks anything else.' It is by pretty fictions such as this that the London correspondent relieves prosaic [sic] disquisitions on local government and other weighty [sic] questions."

What is the meaning of it all? Where have the Indian Nabobs introduced the Jubilee Peg? And where, according to the London Correspondent, are the Nabob's visitors assured of the Prince of Wales' drinking taste, in India, England? Again, we have "A Village Tragedy," as follows:—

"A ghastly story comes from a little hamlet on the banks of the Gogra, the great river in Gonda, three hundred years ago. A woman imagined she possessed of an evil spirit and told than [sic] that his wife's sights [sic] creature was held down himself upon her, deliwoman succumbed almost immediately, the village chowkidar reporting that she had died from cholera. But murder will out, and the husband, with those who assisted at the roasting [sic] business, are in the hands of the police. Of all the horrible cases that witch-craft is anserable [sic] for, none has eclipsed in its awfulness this Gogra tragedy."

That is a poor concluding remark, scarcely showing the calm self-possession of the man of the world, not to say the width of information of an experienced man of culture and reading. Extraction of eyes is rather a common incident in the East. Perhaps by laying stress on witch-craft, the writer meant a quiet hint of the moral superiority of Europe and a sly hit at the barbarity of Asia. In that case, he is at once mischievous and foolish. There is little to choose between the two Continents. But our object is not to notice either the one point or the other, but to draw attention to the first sentence. Surely, that is an original way of introducing news. One is puzzled as to whether he reads of some antiquarian discovery or some incident of the day. Why on earth is the poor reader without notice transported willy nilly behind the centuries? Even there he is left far from comfortable. For the reminiscence to which he is treated, is not familiar matter of history, but something obscure and little known if true. Had the writer recalled the memories of Akbar and his court or of Fattehpore Sicri, it might have been something. But to carry so far back to tell of Khurasa, an old bustee in the backwoods of Gonda, is an unwarrantable liberty with the good reader. Geographical and historical allusion lends itself well to embellish and enliven composition, and geographical details are aptly employed to set in narratives. But in telling a common Oudh village story, of the cock and bull species, to dwell on the threshold on "the Gogra, the great river in Oudh," is preposterous. There is still less occasion for introducing "Gonda." It is not even pretended that the village which was the scene of the alleged tragedy, lay in Gogra. For that matter, the writer of the paragraph does not to this day know the whereabouts of the crime he professes to report. The "banks of the Gogra" is too vague for even approximate identification. The absurdity of geographical rhetoric reaches its climax, when the three hundred years old feat of the great river in having swept away a town of which few besides the savant of the Morning Post have ever heard, is paraded to lend vraisemblance to a sensational story without specification of locality such as is daily to be met with in the lowest grade of vernacular papers. On this flimsy basis, the writer is glad to comfort himself with the reflection that bad as Europe was in the past it was far more respectable than Asia is even now.

Geography, indeed, seems to be the weakness of the staff. These gentlemen are at once lofty and vague in their references to places. Another note in the same issue tells us of several mail routes having been altered on account of the incursions of rats whose burrows are dangerous to the mounted couriers and whose ravages have destroyed every blade of grass. But where? That is the necessary question. "In Outer Mongolia," we are told, if anybody in India or in Great Britain knows where that is, any more than he knows "Inner Mongolia." It is all very well to procure a supply of Russian newspapers and draw your sensational notes therefrom. But, as yet, Geography according to Continental authorities is not taught in the British dominions. Before the general reader could derive any positive notions from such literary efforts, he should be provided with a handbook of Russian administrative divisions and civil and military organization.

There are many signs of vitality and enterprise in the new journal. It is evidently under some 'cute heads. Its chief reliance is upon news rather than literary brilliancy or finish. Yet it is acquiring strength in that department. It is doing a solid service to letters by collecting all the scattered edicts of Asoka and laying them before its readers. Is old "Broadbrim" no more? Still the American letters are interesting. We specially congratulate the conductors on having secured at once so able and so distinguished a London Correspondent as "G. B. M." We congratulate the entire Indian reading public on such an acquisition. Colonel Malleson has not lost aught of his old cunning. He is better than ever. He has dropped off his last remaining crudities, and is simply and effectively brilliant. His European summary is necessarily brief but vividly dramatic. He conveys you a truer idea of the political contests at Home than you could get even by wading through the Times' reports. His descriptions of the great parliamentary debates are great historic pictures. We have run out our space, or we should quote, by way of illustration, the London letter of the 27th April. Such writing is rare enough even in England.

PRE-BRITISH INDIA.

HUMAYUN.

WHILE Humayun was occupied in repairing his losses, Shir Shah seemed content with his acquisitions in Hindustan; for he wisely sought first to recover possession of Bengal; and afterwards he turned his attention to putting his former territories into a state of order. Whether he would have renewed hostilities is doubtful. Humayun, however, could not rest still under the stinging sense of shame which the memory of his defeats aroused. His honour was involved in the contest; and we know what fine distinctions kings draw in this respect. When a point of honour has to be satisfied, they are generally indifferent to the terrible consequences of war for their subjects. There is nothing new under the sun! Eastern or Western monarchs are moved by the same impulses, and act as heedlessly. Civilised king and barbaric ruler, have the same exaggerated notion of their own importance. The sting of dishonour being the motor, it was but natural that the next eight or nine months should be busily employed by Humayun in military preparations, and at the end of this period Humayun once again marched from Agra, aided with a contingent of 300 of Camran's men. Camran himself retired to Lahore and waited the issue of events.

Shir Shah hearing of these movements had likewise advanced and had by this time reached the Ganges opposite Canouj, when he came within striking distance of his foe. Both hosts remained for some time inactive, each party seemingly unwilling to offer an advantage to the other, till the ill-fortune of Humayun again asserted itself through the desertion of one of his officers, Sultan Mirza, who left his camp with all his own followers; and as his example was so likely to infect others, it determined Humayun to fight the enemy at once. He, therefore, issued orders to cross the Ganges, by the bridge of boats that had been built, and to engage the foe. A general engagement ensued in which Humayun's army was defeated and driven into the river. The defeat was appalling. Humayun himself, was wounded; his horse had been wounded and he must have been killed or taken prisoner, if he had not fortunately found an elephant, on which he mounted. The mahout, however, obstinately refused to attempt to swim the Ganges; on which the king threw him from his seat on the neck of the animal, and ordered an eunuch, who was also on the elephant, to guide him across the river. The opposite bank was too steep for an elephant to climb, and Humayun must still have perished, if two soldiers who had landed on that spot had not come to his help; they tied their turbans together and threw one end to him, and by this means he was able to gain the shore. In a little while he was joined by his brothers, Heindal and Askari, and few stragglers from his troops, when the little band made the best of their way to Agra; on the road, however, they were attacked by the villagers and narrowly escaped being plundered if not killed.

Humayun was now despondent, and made haste to remove his family, and the most portable of his treasures from Agra and Delhi, and to flee to Lahore, to Camran. On reaching his destination, he found he was no welcome guest, for Camran was equally afraid of being supplanted by him at Cabul, or of being involved in his quarrel with Shir Shah, with whom, before long, Camran made peace, by relinquishing the Punjabs, and retiring himself to Cabul, leaving the unfortunate Humayun to provide in the best way he could for his own safety.

The deserted Humayun at first did not know where to turn his steps in flight, though he had still some resources in the treasures he had brought with him, and which only waited to be utilized for the purpose of raising a body of mercenary troops; or he might have renounced all hopes of kingly power and retired to a private station in life; he chose the former course as affording him some faint hopes of yet retrieving his former losses. This resolution is further testimony that he was not wanting in courage. It is peculiar that the thoughts of the unfortunate monarch should have been turned to Sindh as the most suitable theatre to begin his experiment. Of all places in India, this was the most unlikely where a man of Humayun's temperaments would have gained an ascendancy over its turbulent popu-tion; but Sindh was in the hands of a powerful ruler, Hossein. Having resolved on this course to pursue, he entered Arghun's territories. In negotiations and no less futile hostilities, including attempted sieges of Bakkar and Sehwan, he wasted a year and half, expended his funds, and exhausted the resources of the surrounding country, with the inevitable consequence of desertion by his mercenary followers. In this extremity he received intelligence that Hassein Arghun was advancing to attack him, and he fled in haste to Uch, on the frontier of Sindh. He barely tarried at this place, and from thence proceeded in the direction of the Rajah of Marwar's territories, whom he supposed to be friendly to his interests, and this belief prompted him to throw himself on the Rajah's protection. It was during Humayun's residence beyond the Indus, that he first met Hamida, the mother of the famous Akber. His step-mother, the mother of Prince Hindal, gave an entertainment in the women's apartments, in honour of the exiled king; probably it was given to counteract the depressing effects of unsuccessful attempts against Bakkar, in which place the army was then occupied besieging. At this entertainment he saw a young lady of extreme beauty, and made such a deep impression on him, that when he found he was not already betrothed, he married her immediately, regardless of the angry remonstrances of his brother.

XI.

Humayun proceeding in his journey towards the territory of the Rajah of Marwar, had reached the neighbourhood of Jodhpore, and was just trying passage through the desert, in which he was attended by his followers from thirst and fatigue. When he was informed that the Rajah would most probably deliver him up to his enemies rather than assist him, the unfortunate monarch had no resource, therefore, but to turn back with a heavy heart, to seek comparative safety in the dreary wilderness he had just emerged. However, before he had reached the desert country, he desired to obtain a supply of water, which could be, in that parched and barren region, the preservation of their lives; but when he had reached the water, they were driven back by the heat, and were only able to slake their thirst after a most bloody and bloodshed. These villagers did not act in a merciful manner, but were compelled to seem cruel, for water is a very precious possession in that region, often visited by long seasons of drought. Humayun was thus again forced to undertake the terrible realities of a march across the desert, and for this purpose he set his face towards Amercot, a fort in the desert, not far from the Indus. To reach Amercot was a terrible ordeal, as between his present position and that goal, there lay a terribly desolate tract, so awful in its barrenness, and in the evils and miseries those who traversed it encountered, that it was but natural that his heart shrank from contemplating the journey. He knew from authentic information that what he had suffered in passing once through the desert, was nothing when compared to the trials that now were before him, and which would be increased by his being compelled to begin such a journey without a supply of water, nor had he any hopes of obtaining a supply soon. He had not proceeded far when his difficulties began multiplying, and he felt the burden was made heavier by the presence of the women of his family. Such was the touching and sorrowful beginning of this journey, that none of those who shared in its terrible sufferings, could have forgotten. The pictures of this desert journey must have been so vividly and deeply stamped on the faculty of memory, as to require no effort to recall them.

The little band, in a most exhausted condition had reached the heart of the desert. They had left far behind the last traces of human culture, and were now struggling with the agonizing sufferings of the desert, to add to their peril, if it were possible to do so, they received one morning, after a night of torment and fatigue, they were followed by a large body of horsemen, who rode up to them; when their worst apprehensions were to be realized, for they found that the son of the Rajah of Marwar commanded these troops, and that he had expressly sent them to force them for entering his territory without permission, and for having had the audacity to kill kine in a sacred country. These new difficulties occurred in on the exhausted party those who attempted to assist, and drove the rest of them; while a detachment pushed forward and took possession of the wells, on which the only remaining hope of temporary relief, was founded. The calamities of the fugitives seemed now drawing to a close, but whether the Rajpoots had originally no intention of destroying them, or relented afterwards, being moved by their sufferings, is uncertain. However, just when all hearts among the captives expected instant death, the Rajah's son advanced with a white flag, and after severely reproaching them for the acts they had committed against the dignity of his father, supplied them with water for their immediate relief, and allowed them to proceed without further molestation. The remainder of the journey was one of severe trial, sufficient to test the strongest nerves, as several marches yet remained to be accomplished through the natural horrors of the desert; the torment of thirst was suffered by all, while many succumbed and died miserably. Humayun with seven mounted companions pushed forward at their best speed and at length reached Amercot, from whence aid was sent to the sufferers, and they were enabled to reach the same place.

At Amercot he at last found a friend. Rana Persad, the chief, not only received him, but treated him hospitably and respectfully, and offered to assist him if he was disposed to make another attempt to gain an establishment in Sindh. It was at this period of deepest sorrow and depression for his parents, that Akber was born. His mother was far advanced in her pregnancy during the march to Amercot, and it was with the utmost difficulty that she was conveyed through the desert. One can imagine what her sufferings must have been when strong men broke down under the trials. Humayun had marched for Sindh the day before the birth of Akber, and the news of the event reached him on the road. He should have, according to usage, given presents to his friends on such an occasion, but he was so destitute, that he had nothing but a pod of musk; this he broke up and distributed among his friends and adherents, with a wish that his son's fame might resemble the odour of that perfume, and be diffused throughout the world. How almost prophetic this utterance proved! for Akber raised the Indian Empire to a high position, and its lustre at that period was great.

OPINION OF THE PRESS.

It is many years since I first met, and some years since I last met, Dr. Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee, editor of the Reis and Rayyet (Prince and Peasant), and an author of high repute among the kindly, as well as acute and intellectual, people of Bengal. One of the real misfortunes of India was, and still is, Lord Macaulay's picture of the Bengalee. The picture, true perhaps as regards Nuncomar and many Bengalees, is not accurate as a representation of the people generally, taken as an Englishman may find them fairly. If they had been unfaithful to the story of the Mutiny had been vastly different; and, apart from the Mutiny, many Englishmen could give individual instances of Bengalee faithfulness almost unique in history, taking all the circumstances of our relation to India into account. The Bengalee is generally eager for knowledge of all kinds, and is often both courageous in the expression of his opinions, and gifted to a remarkable degree with the power to express those opinions with force and precision. Mr. Fawcett once told me that an unprepared speech made, on his behalf, during an election, by a young Hindoo, surpassed, in force as well as eloquence, any unprepared speech he ever had heard made by any member of the House of Commons, if four or five members of the House were excepted.

Among these Bengalees there is a small body of men—small for that large province—who are, ironically or otherwise termed "Young Bengal." Some of them are no longer young, but grave and aged; some have, in the course of years, been highly distinguished for their public services and their scientific and other attainments. Some have at times been misrepresented, and their language misinterpreted, so that on its return to them it has amazed none more than themselves. Nothing of this has been done by the really great administrators of India. That it has been done, however, cannot be denied.

In the forefront of this little band is the author of this book of travels, Baboo Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee—a writer of high repute, as I have said, also an administrator, as the reader will see from the title-page to this book. A keener, yet a kinder satirist, one might seek for and not find. His use of the English language has astonished many an educated Englishman; and the quality of his reading is shown by his marvellous power of quotation not merely from authors like Shakespeare, and subjects which he intends them to illustrate.

Passing from the author to his book, I shall, perhaps, first of all be attracted to the work of the administrator. He comes upon milkman's village, on which he finds fastened the grip of a Court favourite. He unlooses the grip, and re-settles the village, in the double interest of Prince and Peasant. And all the time he sees everything. The poor people bathing on the rivers' banks, have his genial and kindly, if also at times, what a Scotchman would call, his "pawky" notice. A "fat maid of Sonaguan" attracts his attention by the gracefulness with which she carries a vessel of water from the river; and, though the fat maid and he are divided by race and faith (she is Mussulman), she has his full meed of praise. Indeed, it must be admitted—and he will not be offended with me for saying so—that he never meets with a fair face, without at least giving evidence of the fact that he has eyes to see and a heart to comprehend.

Of his wide and generous sympathies, much might be said, and still leave much more to say. He meets a missionary on the river, and evidently is inclined, in writing his notes, to pass a joke on the subject. He raps it, however, in the bud, and contents himself with saying, "So new is preaching here, that the simple people and the padre had been singing in the street." He meets Catholic and Protestant missionaries on shipboard, and chuckles over their disputes, while he astonishes them by his command of the English language, and even by his knowledge of the Bible—a knowledge, I may add, which is evident in many of his writings.

A parrot falls overboard, and is drowned in its cage, to his great grief. It is not however paraded. He says, "It was a parrot, but of a Hindoo."

Again, he has a story of a man, whose name is Tom, and who was to bark, with a noble independence, some very dignified Sahibs. Our author is compelled to leave Tom behind; and says farewell: [Extract.]

I think this is a very good one, and one that will draw the attention of the great heart of humanity. The words are read. Could any other than the testimony to the two gentlemen, taking ending with the "Ben. my poor Tom"? Not the pariah, the pariah dog. The passage is the author, and of the great merciful and that bore him.

Whoever reads this book must be prepared further to find bold and manly language. The author is no flatterer of John Bull, though he gives John his due, and admits that India owes him a great debt. Here is one passage relating to foreign fruits: [Extract.]

Among the sketches of country—word-pictures—the reader will find some exceedingly pretty, and all the more valuable in that they are taken from a standpoint purely Indian; not English. Where an English artist's mind would be filled with European ideas, the mind of this gifted Eastern is filled with a class of ideas totally different, and equally instructive and certainly not less and far-reaching.

On the eve of his journeys, our author was placed in a dilemma of a kind not unknown to travellers in India, but not on that account the less stupid. He wished to go by a particular boat, and took time by the forelock for that purpose. The fare was at first stated as 90 rupees, to pay which he offered "a new crisp, fresh British India" note for 100 rupees. "It was," he adds, "fresh from the Currency Office, and had been received only the day before from another Government department." The rest of the story is thus told: [Extract.]

The humour of the little sketch is worth noting. I can fancy the author laughing at himself; for he can laugh well at himself. I shall give you one more passage; and I give you the spirit of the man who dares to write in a newspaper Prince and Peasant. He returns to his home in Bengal, and, adieu, for a time at last, to Independence, where he had been located for years. He received the Mahanirvana mission to return home; but still he set away. [Extract.]

I think, a sound lesson in this passage. The lesson of the immense value of urbanity in the relations of rulers and ruled. There is a great deal in that sentence, "I will not serve flesh and blood." The best administrator in India is not always the ablest; the man whose plans are the wisest as plans; but the man who, with plans or without them, gives confidence to the people, and confidence not merely in his justice, but also in his consideration and forbearance. A clever man once said that the art of success in India is the art of giving good dinners. It may be so; but the peril is great—the peril of debt; and in any case the art has its limits, and its natural collapse. Even champagne and champagne fall in the end. But the art of that never fails—the art of courtesy; of that courtesy which, being in the hands of a ruler, is not affected by any whim or caprice of the person who possesses it, but is shown to anyone with whom he has relations.

In bidding farewell to this little book, I once more recall, as I easily and very vividly can, the author's kindly face and gentle voice, as known to me many years ago. I see him, as I see Baboo Kristo Das Pal, Dr. Mahendra Lal Sircar, and some others, including a much-abused editor of the Amrita Bazar Patrika; and I feel and say, with all earnestness and sincerity, that among these are men whom the Government of India would be wise in recognising and winning entirely to its side. They are men on whom no really generous word is thrown—generous—ever is thrown—because they are men who are at home, and I have seen them as a ruler by far the truest and most good manners, and often more than mere manners. May the sacred Name they use and love, guide them to a noble end, and may they yet have their share of the good that is theirs, and by them, bless their country.

SCIENCE AND FAITH.

FROM THE BISHOP OF DERRY'S "NEW ATLANTIS."

"Patience! God's House of Light shall yet be built,
In years unthought of, to some unknown song,
And from the fanes of Science shall her guilt
Pass like a cloud. How long, O Lord, how long?—

When Faith shall grow a man, and Thought a child,
And that in us which thinks with that which feels Shall everlastingly be reconciled,
And that which questioneth with that which kneels.

But for the New Atlantis—for the Church
Where faith and knowledge heart-united dwell—
I think it lies far-off beyond our search,
Enfolded by the Hills Delectable."

RESPICE FINEM!

I.

"Thou liest, Hope," 'tis said, when unfulfilled
Thy promises on life's worn footpaths rest;
When roofless stands the temple thou didst build;—
But what say they who know and love thee best?—
"Though the rich light which filled the morning skies
Increase and fade into the depths of night,
We sin if we believe the radiance dies,
When, with slow steps, it leaves our common sight:—
Once to have seen is surely still to see!—
So when we speak of early Hope as dead,
We take our hold of words but carelessly,—
Forgetful that on Hope the Spirit fed,
And gained—in losing even the truth to be—
The present truth of self-maturity!"

II.

Ah! still the heart sighs on?—Then seek again
Some larger light 'mid drifting clouds of gloom;
For surely something, say you, must remain
After Hope's death, some flowers grace her tomb!—
Nay—tenderly—for she may not be dead,
But sleeping, charmed, until your life kisses hers
Into the living-Beauty which you fled
To place your love beside:—She ministers
Not as we do even to our dearest guest;—
For banquet as we may, hunger is still
A few hours distant only,—but her best
Comes last, and ends all hunger!—Wherefore fill Thy heart with sorrow? Somewhere, it must be Thy pure, high Hopes touch God's Desires for thee!

JOHN HOGGEN.

NEWS AND COMMENTS.

WHAT a lot is this of writers and speakers! Sheridan was taken to task for having had the temerity to speak of the great History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire as the "luminous" pages of Gibbon, when the great orator had referred, as he said, to the voluminous historian. To compare great things with small, we have been charged with strong language for having called a vagabond of the press—vomitted out of Bombay to Hyderabad, thence to Upper India, and from Oudh thrown out on Bengal—a badmash. What a pity that we should have missed, by a slip of the pen or of the composing digits, the true word for the world, the flesh, and the Devil, as well as the occasion—"bad mashe." There can be little mistake now.

LAST, not least, historic and holy Oodeypore brings up the rear of the Native Chiefs, in the demonstration of loyalty to the Paramount Power and determination for the preservation of the Empire, with the offer of the services of his troops and a donation of six lacs.

TIBETANS attacked Gnatong in force on the morning of May 23, soon after day-light. Their force is estimated at 1500. They never got within three hundred yards of the stockade, and by ten o'clock were in full retreat over the Jacola. Our loss was three killed and seven wounded. Tibetan loss estimated at fifty. The affair was principally one of skirmishes.

LATER intelligence of that morning's engagement at Gnatong show that the Tibetans were two to three thousand strong. The action lasted about three hours. The enemy have retreated rapidly over the Jakola Pass on the way to the Jelep. A company of the Derbyshire regiment under Captain Gossett and 200 Pioneers under Colonel Broomhead are pursuing in two different directions.

The three killed on our side are No. 2659 Sergeant Luke Leckington, Derbyshire. No. 1686 Sepoy Kharak Singh and No. 1811 Sepoy Hookum Sing, 32nd Pioneers. The seven wounded are of the Pioneers, three of them severely. The enemy's loss is estimated at 100.

NEWS from Gnatong dated noon the 23rd May is to the effect that the enemy were pursued on the 22nd to the Jakola Pass and for several miles towards Pemberingo. Pursuing parties suffered no loss. The enemy's rout was complete. The roads beyond the Jakola and towards the Pemberingo are strewn with blankets and traces of a hurried flight. Early on the 23rd some 50 or 60 men were seen carrying the wounded. Ten prisoners have been taken, mostly wounded, and many are still in the woods near the camp. Parties are out to capture them.

The number of the enemy killed exceeds what was reported at first and many have been carried away. A large party, including several wounded men, apparently of importance, who had assembled during the action on the Jakola, were scattered by a well directed shell. Two bodies were found at the place.

No signs of the enemy are now visible on this side of the Jelep or Pemberingo Passes.

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given, any other being unnecessary, and likely to cause confusion.

The Pioneers expended 12 rounds per man, the Derbyshire 15 rounds and the guns fired 31 rounds.

A TELEGRAM from Rangoon of date the 22nd May gives news, which however needs confirmation, of a raid by 500 Kachins on Momeik, a Shan State, not under British administration. There is no important news of the Chins' raids in the Upper Chindwin.

In the Minbu district, 116 dacoits including 3 leaders surrendered and 22 were captured. A large gang, which is believed to be that of Ootiya Ottama's lieutenant, trying to escape from Minbu Southwards, was encountered in the Thayetmyo district of Lower Burma when 18 of them were killed and many wounded.

A TELEGRAM from Rangoon of May 25 says that the Deputy Commissioner of Minbu has reported the surrender of 640 dacoits in that district.

THE following is a translation of a Burmese letter from Hla Dway Siado and Pakhan Siado, Buddhist Chief Priests of Mandalay, residing at the "Maha Abye Ya Ma Tini," to His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief.

Greeting.—His Excellency will remember having, before he left Burma for Bengal in February 1887, had an interview with the Priests in the Palace at Mandalay, during the course of which the conversation was directed to the affairs of the country.

At this interview the opportunity was taken of explaining to His Excellency that the disturbed state of the districts in Burma had alienated the people from the spiritual influence of the Priests, but that every effort would be made by the Priesthood to better the condition of the people and restore the country to its original tranquility.

Since then the Chief Priests have been assiduously engaged in the fulfilment of this end, and they lately resolved that each should apportion to himself the mission of visiting the districts along either bank of the Irrawaddy. However little may have been done so far, they feel sure that the desired results will eventually be achieved. Letters are being sent by them to all the members of the Priesthood, who in their turn will publish the contents to the people and abjure them with the aid of spiritual benediction to live peacefully in their own homes as becomes all good citizens, so that their own condition and that of the country may be ameliorated.

The head Priests have already visited a number of the disturbed districts and have sent letters to the remainder intimating their impending visits and instructing the people to be peaceful.

The Priests wish to assure His Excellency that the work of assisting in the salvation of the country and its people is being undertaken most heartily and they feel sanguine that the country will be resuscitated into a peaceful kingdom, in the prosperity of which all will gladly co-operate.

This letter is sent as a token of remembrance of His Excellency, and if a message is sent to the Priests in acknowledgment, its receipt will be hailed with gladness by the Priests and all inhabitants, and blessings will ever lastingly be invoked for His Excellency.

THE Salvation Army which has extended its operations throughout the globe, has just been declared by a jury at Quebec in Canada to be a public nuisance.

ON the 1st May a statue of Sir Bartle Frere was placed in the gardens of the Victoria Embankment, London, not far from the statue of General Outram. The Prince of Wales will unveil it on an early date.

THE Directors of the Bank of Bombay have obtained sanction of Government to open a branch at Akola, in the Hyderabad Assigned Districts.

MR. H. E. M. JAMES, Deputy Director-General of the Post Office of India, having been appointed a Senior Collector in the Bombay Presidency, Mr. H. M. Kisch is promoted from the 2nd to the 1st grade of Postmaster-General, Mr. P. Sheridan becomes Deputy Director-General of the Post Office of India and Mr. G. J. Hynes, the First Assistant Director-General.

THE latest Gallic discovery is a toad weighing 2 qrs. 10 lbs and measuring nearly 3 ft. round the body, its sound resembling the bark of a dog.

It was found at Juillac, in the Department of the Correze, and sold for £70. A thousand Rupees for a frog! That must be the identical toad of Shakespeare that wears a jewel in its head.

MAJOR-GENERAL E. Mitchell, R. E., Retired List, was convicted and fined for travelling several times in the Metropolitan Railway in the first class with third class tickets. The War Secretary, without going to the extreme length of depriving the retired military of his retired pay, has deprived him of the honorary rank of Major-General.

BIKANIR is to be relieved of Major Talbot. Mr. C. S. Bayley, C. S., Assistant Commissioner, Ajmere, succeeds the military man as Resident. Captain Herbert, Assistant Commissioner at Merwara, takes Mr. Bayley's place and is himself succeeded in Merwara by Captain Penrose from Hyderabad.

Mr. Tighe, who has before acted as Assistant Superintendent for Operations in suppression of Thagi and Dacoity in Hyderabad, gets Captain Penrose's vacancy.

BARUS Umesh Chandra Batabyal and Kedar Nath Roy have been admitted to the Statutory Civil Service as Assistant Magistrates and Collectors to the Lower Provinces.

THE Hon'ble H. Beverley, one of the Judges of the High Court, has been granted privilege leave for one month from the 10th August next. It is virtually a leave for 3 months, for the Long Vacation commences as soon as the leave expires.

THE railway from the Caspian to Samarcand was opened on the 26th May last with elaborate ceremonies and rejoicings.

THE Currency Commission have made their report. It is believed they recommend a bimetallic currency on the basis of a fixed valuation between gold and silver.

THE Home remittances from 1st April to 26th May 1888, amounted to £2,562,600.

THE will of the late Sir Henry Sumner Maine, K. C. S. I., and Master of Trinity Hall, Cambridge, who died on the 2nd February, in his 66th year, has been proved and probate granted to the executors the Hon. Justice Sir James Charles Mathew Frederick Pollock and Mr. Frederick Harrison. The realty consists of the testator's leasehold house in Cornwall-gardens. Besides its stabling, furniture and effects, horses and carriages, and the library, as also the copyright of his works and his gold medals and other heirlooms, the remaining personalty has been declared to a penny at £46,715, 6s. 7d., and is charged with two annuities. The house and furniture, horses and carriages, with 200 of the books and three gold medals, with an annuity of £1,200 are bequeathed to the widow, an annuity of £200 to his son C. S. Maine. The remainder of the income is also to go to Lady Maine, on whose death two-thirds of the capital will go to the said C. S. Maine and the remainder to another son Henry Hallam Maine. The copyrights are not to be sold.

THE Chinese Ambassador in London has complained to the British Foreign Office, of Chinese emigrants to Australia being subject to a poll tax of £10, an impost from which the subjects of other Powers are exempt. The Chinese Government hopes that her Majesty's Government will institute an inquiry into this invidious impost and determine how far it is compatible with the existence and growth of friendly relations between Great Britain and China.

THE Hunza and Nagar feudatories of Cashmere, in the bleak northern parts of the kingdom, have lately given much trouble to the Durbar. In consequence, troops were despatched, and these operated with such prompt energy that the chiefs have been brought back to a sense of their duty. Already, the Raja of Nagar has sent a representative to the Maharaja's commanding officer at Gilgit, to offer submission and beg for mercy. It is believed there will be no farther need of bloodshed.

A STARTLING discovery was announced, on the 30th April, of a deficit of 100,000 fr. in the Greek Treasury. Another deficit of 240,000 fr. in the Treasury accounts for the Province of Attica has been found, in consequence, whereof arrests are being made.

THE following official notification appears at Hyderabad :—

"On account of the suspension of the Syed Abdul Huq, Sirdar Diler-ul-Mulk, it is necessary to appoint on behalf of Government an official Director in his place on the Board of both the Railway Company and the Mining Company. It is, therefore, notified that with concurrence of the Resident, Nawab Fateh Nawaz Jung Bahadur has been appointed to this office temporarily or until further orders."

Nawab Fateh Nawaz is now acting as Chief Justice, with which office his appointment as Government Director on Joint stock companies does not well consist. But in Hyderabad there is no notion of consistency of any kind, either among the natives or the British.

SRINAGAR 23rd.—Only a slight decrease of cholera in Srinagar during last 3 days. The disease is prevalent throughout the valley. The new cart road from Uri towards Murree is reported to be free.

SRINAGAR, May, 28.—There is a slight increase of cholera in comparison with the preceding two days. 162 fresh cases and 83 deaths have been reported in Srinagar in the last 24 hours.

MR. R. E. Genge, Surgeon, of Mooltan, [while encamped in the Wurdhwan valley in Cashmere, was, with his whole party of six natives, crushed under an avalanche which fell on the 15th. One coolie only providentially escaped, having gone to a neighbouring village for provisions. Mr. Genge's body has been recovered and brought for burial to Srinagar.

THE Commissioner of the Berars, Mr. Leslie Saunders, died in the Ellichpore District of his jurisdiction, on the 22nd, from a fall from his horse—the third fatal riding case and the fourth death by accident, in his family in India, a young Saunders having been poisoned to death by inadvertence. Son of Mr. Charles Saunders, formerly Resident of Hyderabad, Leslie entered the Civil Service in 1858 and was a Panjab Civilian, till transferred to the diplomatic branch he became successively Commissioner of Ajmere and Commissioner of Berar.

AYUB KHAN was to have left Rawalpindi for Murree on the 25th ult. Captain Evans Gordon goes with the Sardar.—Ayub Khan's stipend has been fixed at Rs- 5,000 a month for himself and his followers. He is to submit a list of his allotments to them.

MR. JOHN BRIGHT is suffering from congestion of the lungs. It is satisfactory to know that there has been a decided improvement in his condition.

HEALTH is failing Sir Barnes Peacock. We fear he has been overworking himself as stipendiary member of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council on £5,000 per annum.

MR. D. M. BARBOUR is expected to join his office of Financial Member of the Supreme Council in November, when Mr. Westland will take furlough.

ORDER has been passed to extend the diocese of Rangoon to Upper Burma.

THE Contagious Diseases' Act is to be suspended pending final orders for its suppression—according to the Indian Witness. Orders have already been issued not to work the Act.

DURING the month of May 1888, ten thousand two hundred and seventy one persons visited the Indian Museum. Of Native there were Holloway's Pills.—Any dyspeptic sufferer aware of the purifying, regulating, and gently aperient powers of these Pills, should permit no one to cloud his judgment or to warp his course. With a box of Holloway's Pills, and attention to its accompanying "Directions," he may feel thoroughly satisfied that he can safely and effectually release himself from his miseries without impairing his appetite or weakening his digestion. This most excellent medicine acts as a nervine and bodily tonic by aiding nutrition, and banishes a thousand annoying forms of nervous complaints. An occasional resort to Holloway's remedy will prove highly salutary to all persons, whether well or ill, whose digestion is slow or imperfect, a condition usually evidenced by weariness, languor, listlessness, and dependancy.

8,222 males and 1,821 females and of Europeans 162 males and 66 females. The daily average number of visitors for the 11 days on which the Museum was open to the general public was 933. From the 1st to 15th May the galleries were closed for the annual cleaning.

'NEWS AND COMMENTS.

EVIDENTLY, the Government does not expect an early termination of the Thibetan business. For, orders have issued for taking the telegraph on to Gnatong, while the Commissariat Department has been directed to mass in Colonel Graham's camp provisions for the entire Sikkim Field-Force to last till the 30th June, and for the 32nd Pioneers and 250 mules till the end of October.

THE Government of India is pursuing its policy of substantial conciliation of the Native Princes. The fort of Gwalior was returned, before his death, to Maharaja Jeeaji Rao Scindhia who had pined for it. And now Bangalore fort is to be made over to the Mysore Durbar. As a sort of compensation, the civil and military station of Bangalore is to be extended so as to include the residency house and grounds. The arsenal has been removed to Agram and all the British troops have been withdrawn.

THE Government of India invites a four per cent loan of Rs. 3,00,00,000. Tenders must be in sums of Rs. 500 or multiples thereof, and will be opened publicly by the Comptroller-General at the Treasury Buildings, Calcutta, on Tuesday, the 3rd July next. The Budget provides for a loan of 3 millions sterling. The late heavy drain from the brisk banking of the Secretary of State, has possibly precipitated the descent to the market, as it has unusually lowered the exchange. The withdrawal of 3 crores from India at such a time of abnormal depreciation of silver, will be a sore calamity to the commerce of the country.

REFUGES from the Mahdist head-quarters report the Mahdi's assassination by his lieutenant, who has assumed power. A humptious proclamation, purporting to come from the Mahdi, in which all believers are called upon to make common cause with the dervishes, and which claims for the latter the accomplishment of the conquest of Abyssinia and of the forcible dispersion of the foreigners, has certainly issued. It has created a great effect in Upper Egypt, where it has been freely circulated.

THE "Exodus" to the Hills has narrowly escaped a practical condemnation and the responsibility of a tragic mischance. Meher Ali was to have been executed yesterday. Although a petition had gone up to the Lieutenant-Governor from many of the respectable members of the community, for sparing the man's life, it was feared that the representation would not reach the head of the Government in time, who was engaged in the exciting recreation and arduous business combined of climbing the heights of the Himalayas. If Meher Ali had, in consequence, undergone the extreme penalty, he would not have been the first sacrifice of a prisoner within recent years under the Bengal Cucumlocution Office. Luckily, there has been no such miscarriage. The petition has reached its destination. Sir Steuart Bayley has taken time to consider the representation in the convict's favor, and has postponed the dread day for a week.

THE several Members of the Board of Revenue, Lower Provinces, have been authorized by the Governor-General in Council, under Sec. 5, Regulation III of 1822, to exercise generally, throughout the territories subject to their control, all the duties, powers, and authority which are vested in the Board collectively in respect of the departments detailed below :—

"The Hon'ble H. J. Reynolds, C.S.I., will exercise the aforesaid powers in the Department of Land Revenue. This includes revenue, survey and settlement, land registration, land improvements, the sale or lease of waste land and Government estates, the management of Wards' and attached estates, the collection of cesses, the realization of arrears of revenue, and the recovery of public demands, rent suits, embankments, pensions, the examination, enrolment, &c., of revenue agents, putni sales, and the supply of provisions for troops.

Mr. F. B. Peacock will exercise the aforesaid powers in the Departments of Miscellaneous Revenue. These include excise, assessed taxes, salt, opium, customs, stamps and stationery, tolls and canals, the partition of estates, and the acquisition of land for public purposes.

During the absence on leave of Mr. Peacock, Mr. F. M. Halliday, Officiating Member of the Board of Revenue, will exercise the powers with which Mr. Peacock is vested."

This announcement does not cover the illegality of the past. The irregularity was prominently brought to notice in connection with the Burdwan adoption. Hence the late correction and authority to perpetuate the practice of divided work and joint order. But supposing some of the former proceedings of the Board ever came to be questioned in a court of justice, what then?

The perfunctory way in which the Board performs its high functions, is a type of Indian official laxity. But it has always been to us a wonder how that body was permitted to override the clear injunction of the law in deference to the convenience of the Members. Not only is the Government to blame in this, but the bar must also share the obloquy of not having yet attacked such a scandal. We badly want a few Woodroffes. Any Zemindar or other party, suffering from the action of the Board, might disregard its order, and bring the question before the High Court whether a fraction was to be taken for the whole. Even now, when the correction at last comes, it is not adequate. The present Notification is a half measure. Nothing short of an Act of Indemnity for the past and of authority for the future, will meet the necessities of the case.

ON a reference from the Sub-Judge Rai Bahadour Baroda Prosad Shome, in the Small Cause Court case No. 150 of 1888, the High Court, Messrs. Justices Norris and Macpherson, have held that in a case by the landlord for damages for trees cut by the tenant without the landlord's consent, section 23 of the Bengal Tenancy Act does not apply. The tenant must prove any custom that he may rely upon in his defence. The landlord is absolved from the onus of proving the custom prohibiting the right by occupancy tenants to cut down trees at their own will.

THE Government of India, we are glad to announce, have once more pressed upon the India office the abandonment of the prohibitive duty levied in England on Indian silver goods. The practical hardship, no less than the theoretical injustice of the impost, has been repeatedly exposed within the last several years in both countries. Yet Christian England, the supporter of costly missions to the ends of the earth to convey the gospel of Righteousness and Peace and Good Will, would not do a simple act of fair play. It was against her grain. For England, though Christian, is commercial before everything—peddling to the last degree; except on the rare occasions on which her deeper moral consciousness is stirred, when she is capable of extraordinary sacrifices. As a rule, she does not forget that she is the leading shopkeeper of the world, and is determined to maintain her monopoly of the markets of the world. She cannot be persuaded to be just even to her own dependencies—Ireland herself, although one of the members of the political firm going under the name and style of the United Kingdom, being no exception. India has had always reason to lament this selfish greed. One after another, all her manufactures have been swallowed up. It is in this unworthy spirit that the heavy duty was imposed and is maintained in England on shipments of Indian silver work to English ports.

SIND is naturally much exercised by the proposed transfer of the province from the Bombay Government to the Lieutenant-Government of the Punjab. Official Bombay is simply indignant at the call to be stripped of this appanage. The transfer, however, is not to be effected so early as the public was led to expect. The Government of India is awaiting the despatch of the Bombay Government before finally reporting on the subject to the India Office. There is ample time, therefore, for argument in the press and agitation by public meetings, and it is being utilised in that direction. It will tax all the powers of our Western politicians to maintain the status quo against the prima facie reasonableness of the proposal. One fact, as the hard-headed Hindu jurists of old say, is worth a hundred texts or arguments. Nature is against the pretension of Bombay to have and hold hereafter what she has hitherto possessed. Physically, Sind's affinities are distinctly Punjabi and by no means Bombayan, and there are no overwhelming reasons of policy to plead for the continuance of the present arrangement. A glance at the map shows at once that Sind is part of the Punjab and that it is not even near Bombay. Between British Bombay and Sind, there is not only a considerable tract of Native India broken into numberless states, great and small, but also many pieces of water, salt and brackish.

It is satisfactory to find that the natural head of the great Burdwan family is in the hands of good advisers. The Dowager Maharani is just reported to have offered the munificent donation of Rs. 5,000, towards the establishment of a school in Burdwan for European and Native girls, to be called Lady Bayley's Free Girls' School, and she proposes to found two scholarships for Sanskrit students, either at Nuddea or any other seat of Oriental learning.

AND now from the sublime to the ridiculous! The Durbarees fit of the usurper, by instinct led, alarmed at the credit the persecuted old lady was acquiring by her righteous use of wealth, put their wits together and hit upon their plan of Campaign for storming public opinion and securing the good graces of the country at large. It is certainly ingenious, and thoroughly characteristic. In the words of the statement furnished to the press,

"A novel institution has been recently established at Kuti Bari in Burdwan, for the purpose of imparting free lessons in the art of elocution to the Native striplings of the place. The institution is attached to the college hostel, and under the patronage of Principal Ram Narain Dutt, B.A., Mr. Benode Lal Burman, A.D.C. to H. H. the Maharajah, and Fakira Rajendra Nath Dutt."

And this is called "Burdwan coming to the front!" A "novel institution" this to be sure, the like of which has not yet seen the day at the Presidency. Genius is nothing if not original, and clever as the fortunate Lala's creatures were—by half—they have at length been materially strengthened by the accession of unmistakable Genius in the person of the last-named Fakira. What next? and next? They seem to be on the eve of a great Revolution in Burdwan. That Honorable man the Lala has already, by the touch of his magic wand, altered the law of inheritance among his tribe. Government having succumbed to him, the word has been passed or the hint taken, and already a new school of Hindu Law, unknown to the Sastras—the Rishis or the commentators—has been added in the legal treatises now appearing. A mock Parliament would fitly crown the triumph. Perhaps Burdwan might be content with a National Congress all to itself. So, we suppose, the lads—we beg pardon, the striplings—of Rar are to be drilled into declamators between a couple of Dutt Baboos with a Mr. Burman in the middle into the bargain. Our Surrender Not the Orator and his coadjutor the "mute inglorious" No-render had better look to their laurels. This drilling business—the preparation of the unfortunate boyhood of Bengal for politics before time and needless agitation—is their own vocation. Are they prepared to surrender so fruitful an occupation to these interlopers and outer Barbarians of Burdwan? They have already accomplished much of their object. A certain class of our boys now lisp in oratory, because the platitudes and mixed metaphors come. Can they suffer to see the glory snatched away by others?

We do not know the credentials of these new-comers for the rôle they have assumed. Mr. Benode Lal is, we believe, the same who was the electioneering agent at Calcutta of the Burdwan party interested in forcing on the adoption of the boy who is now Maharaja. He certainly deserved their thanks for his great and arduous exertions for creating public opinion in favor of the irreligious adoption, and has apparently been rewarded with the post of A.-D.-C. to the Maharaja—fit Atalik for such a prince. But who is this Fakira? Perhaps, Mr. Lambert might be able to tell.

THE appointment of a Political Officer for the Affairs of the late King of Oudh comes, as we announced last week, to an end with the departure on leave of Lieutenant-Colonel W. F. Prideaux. The Collector of the 24-Pergunnabs undertakes the payment of Oudh and Mysore pensions at Alipore, and the administration of the late King's estates has been entrusted to the Government Solicitor, who will be nominated Agent of the Governor-General for that purpose—to dispose of the immoveable property advertised for sale.

his deepest abhorrence. As an instance of His Holiness' strict adherence to old ways and manners, I may relate a case that took place a few years back. It must be borne in mind that the lord of Ouni Ati has some 7 or 8 hundred bhakats (all celibates) who serve him and his guardian deity in different menial offices. The huts of these doomed wretches are built so close to each other as to leave no opening for smoke to go out or light and air to go in. The result is that in the morning and evening, when fires are made in these huts for cooking purposes, none but bhakat can venture into them; one unused to it is pretty sure to be blinded and suffocated. Accordingly a gentleman had the humanity to suggest to His Holiness a more convenient arrangement of the houses. Instead of thankfully receiving the suggestion, he rejected it with disdain, and looked down upon the gentleman as a heretic. Nor is this a solitary instance. How many projects of public welfare has he not rejected on this stupid ground! His Holiness would do nothing that his fathers had not done. Is it not strange, therefore, that such a man should have lent himself to the imitation of a Christian custom derived from the old Hebrews? A man that condemned as improper and heretical a proposition for an altered construction of his out-offices, felt no scruples to permit the perpetration of a jubilee. Surely, His Holiness's predecessors and forefathers had never held a jubilee, although many of them sat on the guddee for a much longer period.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR.

SIR,—“Fools are my theme and satire my song,” but, as rhyming is not in my beat, I will content myself with prose.

At a recent meeting, Sir Goose (over whose silly head forty-five tropical summers have passed) in consideration of his age was voted to the chair.

The Spaniel—a genuine Hispaniola breed—was engaged to read a paper on the “Structure and habits of boobies.” The gentle breeze, through the windows, lulled Sir Goose into somnolence, the beasts fell talking with each other in a low suppressed growl.

But the Spaniel, with canine assiduity and patience, continued reading. The essay terminated and they continued,

“Clap, clap, all together, clap, clap away,

For this is the way they exercise to have a little play.”

The applause was unmerited and the Joint Secretary of the Club did not fail to perceive that the Spaniel had played a dirty trick and had nearly succeeded in hoodwinking his human auditors by reading to them an essay copied “verbatim et literatim” from the lucubrations of a Scottish author. He accordingly stands up, and emphatically condemns the practice. The beasts, horror struck, gaze at each other. The lecturer's face emulates the red glare of the lamp burning on the table.

The Jackdaw, decked in all the pride and splendour of fashion, and eying the audience through the translucent rays of a pair of massive steel spectacles, having a sympathy in common with the zoological race, screeches out in defence, “Assuming that he has copied, what harm can there be in it?” A young man, who was announced in the “notice” as a visitor, and who had enjoyed the privilege of speaking in the Club on previous occasions, felt justified in saying, “But copying word for word from a book amounts to plagiarism, and as such is reprehensible.” Sir Goose, who is linked to the Spaniel by an official tie, was exceedingly put out of countenance at the disclosure of this literary larceny, and being unable to restrain his cholera any longer, vociferously cackled out with extended beaks “Who are you, young man? Learn to respect your seniors. You are not a member of the Club, and had therefore no business to speak. Hold your peace.” In plain English, he tried to hector the young man down. Young man? What the deuce does Sir Goose mean by that? What a pity there was no prompter to whisper in Sir Goose's ears the following stanzas:—

“We live in deeds, not years, in thoughts, not breaths,

In feeling, not in figures on a dial.

We should count time by heart throbs. He most lives

Who thinks most, feels the noblest, acts the best.”

The quadrupeds, encouraged by their leader, set up an infernally tremendous howl, looking daggers at the Secretary. The bipeds commenced screeching, chirping, hooting, quacking and all other words that the vocabulary of ornithology can supply.

An old Jackanapes, sitting on the right hand of Sir Goose, making grimaces and antic gestures, and exposing from time to time a set of dirty teeth, gibbered out:—“No, no, we ought not to discourage these things, we must encourage them.” Encourage what? Plagiarism, to be sure. Bravo! Sir Ape, a remark worthy of you. He will be a valuable acquisition to the Alipore garden, though I would like much to tame such a droll creature, and fatten him on the delicious plantain. But to continue. The Spaniel had evidently been engaged so long, without heeding the remarks of his critics, in composing the following sentence, which he thus expressed in the tone of an intellectual dog:—“This gentleman too, in his essay on the ‘Indian Mutiny’ has copied from Mocolay.” A fearful anachronism, thought I. Like the divinity student in Holme's Professor of the Breakfast Table, a gentleman started up a laugh, but reined it back with a pull, as one throws a horse on his haunches.

At this juncture, another gentleman rose with the laudable object of putting an end to the dispute, and, by an effective speech, succeeded in tranquilizing the furious animals. Then followed the Joint Secretary's speech, at the conclusion of which the meeting dispersed.

✍ We publish this letter as a creditable performance for so young a writer, but he must try his hand on subjects of general interest. There is too much striving after literary effect visible in most of our young correspondents. Let them cultivate matter, and smartness will come of itself. There is the making of writers in them.—ED. LORD DUFFERIN IN THE CALCUTTA SLUMS.

Commenting upon the Englishman's account of the Viceroy's inspection of the Calcutta slums, the Daily Telegraph, in a leading article, says:—

Lord Dufferin continues by a hundred bright, sensible, or courageous deeds and speeches, to make everybody sorry that he is shortly to surrender the Viceroyalty which he has administered so well. One of the last acts of his cold-season sojourn in Calcutta was to take a long and, from the sanitary and olfactory point of view, a terrible morning walk in the slums of the capital of India. Calcutta has been called a “City of Palaces,” and such it is, perhaps, viewed from Garden Reach or Pal Ghat. Moored in that part of the Hooghly, or walking or driving near Fort William, the visitor or resident sees across the broad expanse of the maidan a sweep of stately buildings extending from the Cathedral to Government House. Their white or saffron hue contrasts agreeably with the green turf and the thick clumps of tamarind or palm trees; while the domes of the Viceregal Palace, with the splendid foliage of the Eden Gardens, nobly fill the perspective, and incline one to believe that Calcutta is as handsome as she looks. But whoever ventures seriously to explore the vast native city will be quickly undeceived; the Indian metropolis is far more a city of slums than of palaces, and cannot “hold a candle,” as regards its indigenous quarters, to Bombay. Very few Europeans, however, know much about the worst parts, which are often the most characteristic, of Calcutta. Even the Viceroy had never seen them until the other day, when the impulse suddenly seized him to make a resolute exploration of the more crowded and insanitary quarters of his capital.

He ought, perhaps, to have started, after the fashion of the Caliph Haroun-al-Raschid, at night, with Sir Mackenzie Wallace disguised as a Babu, Lord William Bercsford as Rissaldar, and Lord Dufferin himself dissembling in the garments of an up-country merchant. The manner of this expedition, however, was modern, like its kindly and conscientious inspiration, and the Viceroy started for his “slumming” in a carriage accompanied by the Chairman of the Municipality, the Engineer, the Health Officer, and a Private Secretary. Northern, or native, Calcutta has some good thoroughfares, it must be confessed, such as Cornwallis-street and the Circular Road; but being upon real business bent, Lord Dufferin soon had to quit his carriage and plunge on foot into Baranasee Ghose's Street and its adjacent purlieus. He wound his way along that snaky causeway; he inspected Chassadhobaparah, where wayfarers must walk in single file through a labyrinth of dark and stuffy gutters; he plunged into the awful bastis and cowsheds, the mat-huts and miserable godowns, beyond Dhurrumtollah and Moydapatty lanes. He gallantly treaded the unspeakable abominations of Burra Bazaar; visited a gowalla's establishment knee deep in filth; and even traversed—no doubt with handkerchief to nose—the yards and apartments of a “basti” in Jorabagan, which is mentioned as remarkable for its bad name. Here, says the Englishman, “the Viceroy saw for himself the appalling filthiness characteristic of a locality where buildings have been constructed without the least regard to light, ventilation, means of access, or sanitary requirements of any description.” And it continues very justly: “The community at large, and the native portion of it especially, have much cause for gratitude to the Earl of Dufferin for having undertaken such an inspection. He is, we believe, the first Governor-General who has seen for himself some of the plague-spots of our City of Palaces. He must have noted how strongly their condition contrasted with the well-kept wide streets of the southern portion of the town, and with the large gardens, acting as air spaces, attached to the houses in the European quarters.”

Truly, if some Western enthusiasts for sanitation could have accompanied the Viceroy in that morning walk they would have thought the East end of London, in comparison, a paradisiac of hygienic science. The slums of Calcutta are about the most unlovely specimens conceivable of urban life. They are not even interesting, as is generally the case with the back regions of an Indian town or city, except perhaps, for the population, which, swarming about the narrow, hot streets and lanes like human ants, lends a certain colour and animation to the dingiest nook. Built on the dead flat of the Ganges alluvium, there is no natural drainage; a few feet below the surface all is swamp and squashy mud: paving is almost unknown, except in the chief thoroughfares; and the people are sublimely ignorant of the common rules of health, and too conservative to take up with change. True it is that much has been lately done for the native quarters of Calcutta: the drainage and water supply have been looked after, and open oases cleared in wildernesses of foul and crowded regions. This work, however, has fallen back again into the hands of a native Municipality, who have not the energy or the enthusiasm for sanitation of the West; and the Calcutta which lies out of sight of the tourist or temporary resident is consequently almost as bad a hotbed of disease as in the days when cholera was regularly bred there, and when boats loaded with frightful refuse used daily to discharge their contents into Garden Reach, amid hundreds of corpses floating down the river. Now-a-days, sailors are not poisoned by the contaminated stream; nor have captains to set a hand on watch to clear their cables of dead Hindoos drifting along the sacred stream. Yet behind the broader causeways, where handsome temples and gaily painted commodious residences are to be seen, there are still these hideous, squalid narrow lanes, where an odour reigns supreme, with rancid ghee for its basis, and all the seventy smells of Cologne as mere collateral flavours, of a compost indescribable, omnipresent, overwhelming. Tanks green with glistening confervæ, growing almost visibly under the fierce tropical light, serve at once for drinking, bathing, and washing purpose to all the squalid crowded habitations around. The musk-rats and bandicoots run in and out of the rotting foundations; mosquitoes, centipedes, and the smaller vermin teem in the hot atmosphere; and yet, close to such tenements, and in the heart of the ugliest slum, one will find dwellings of the rich luxuriously fitted within, and tenanted by people of high culture and refined life. That Calcutta is not a healthy city goes without saying; it never can be so under present circumstances, and the mortality, which is abnormally high, would be much higher still but for the fact that the citizens are largely acclimatised to evil odours and foul water and air, and also that Nature, by her winged and creeping ministers, does a great deal for man. Myriads of crows, vultures, kites, and storks fill the air, discharging gladly and constantly the duties of scavengers; while the earth, the walls, the roofs, the bamboos, the mats, the very dust are full of minute indefatigable creatures perpetually carrying off and devouring the dirt in the wrong place which would otherwise make a continuous lazaret-house of Calcutta.

Yet there was one spot visited on this occasion by the Viceroy, which might teach a lesson in sanitation to the best-managed city of the West. "At Bolorum Dey's," says the report, "where the carriages were waiting, the Viceroy got in and was driven rapidly up Chitpur Road, and through Nimtollah Street to the Nimtollah Burning Ghat. The body of a young woman who had died that morning of cholera, was being cremated. His Excellency stayed a short time at the burning ghat, asking several questions, and showing much interest in the ceremony." That is, indeed, a remarkable and suggestive place. A low-fronted building, something like one of our Underground Railway stations, rises by the river, upon which its interior looks through a row of light arches. On the floor, which is of earth, are noticed many black patches covered with grey ash. Beyond through the arches runs the busy Hooghly, blazing with sunshine, covered with ships, flags, sails, and native crafts. Looking citywards in the early morning, you will soon perceive more than one funeral party approaching the Nimtollah. They bear dead bodies upon a charpoy or native headstead; a relative or two and a Brahman, it may be, following. There is no fuss, no loud demonstration of grief, the charpoy is set down inside the building, the white chudder is turned aside. Perhaps it is an old man well quit of this troublesome existence, perhaps it is a pretty Hindu girl, her black hair still lustrous, her comely mouth closed with death's secret, and upon her forehead, pale and cold, the bright vermilion tilaka newly impressed. The attendant, having seen to the registration, supplies about three hundred-weight of wood; a vacant spot is found upon the clay floor, the pyre is skilfully built, the corpse laid upon it, and some wood, reserved for the purpose, disposed above and around. Then the nearest relative or his representative sets fire to the "bed of change." It is soon seen that there is no need of elaborate crematoria, furnaces, or the like, for this quick and beautiful form of obsequies. The purifying flames rise and crackle; the fume drifts out of the arches over the river; the attendants sit in the corners of the building; smoking hookahs or softly chatting; very soon you only remark a smouldering pile of grey ashes which sinks into a surprisingly little layer. Out of this the chief mourner, rakes, with a branch of Sami shrub and Palasa tree, what he can find of the skull-bones and a joint or two. He sprinkles these with scented waters, and with ghee, wraps them in leaves of the Palasa, and places all in a new earthen pot, which is tied up with thread. This will, by and by, be buried in the ground near home, or placed in a temple; and on the "shradh," or commemorative days, the son will offer eight varieties of flowers, food, and fruit, with this prayer, "May the Adorable and Eternal accept from us these offerings! May the dead one be conveyed to pleasing and immortal abodes!" A little milk and water is poured over the spot of incremation, and this simple and cleanly ceremony, which has only cost the family twelve shillings of English money, is at an end, except for certain strange yet affectionate and dutiful observances, which follow during some days after, and are part of the Indian's ritual. It is, indeed, the idea of Hindoos that the soul lingers about its old haunts for ten days; and it would be a sad sign of the dead man's future destiny if the crows refused to eat the cooked rice thrown to them on the tenth day. Happily, they never do; a Calcutta crow would pick up the funeral-rice of the Father of Evil himself if he could die and be burned at Nimtollah. Certainly, neither Lord Dufferin, nor any one who has watched the process of cremation in India, can ever again doubt that in celerity, simplicity, economy, and the abolition of all mournful associations, it recommends itself to crowded populations and sanitary reformers.

OPINION OF THE PRESS.

It is many years since I first met, and some years since I last met, Dr. Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee, editor of the Reis and Rayyet (Prince and Peasant), and an author of high repute among the kindly, as well as acute and intellectual, people of Bengal. One of the real misfortunes of India was, and still is, Lord Macaulay's picture of the Bengalee. The picture, true perhaps as regards Nuncomar and many Bengalees, is not accurate as a representation of the people generally, taking them as an Englishman may find them if he looks fairly. If they had been unfaithful, the sad story of the Mutiny had been vastly sadder; and, apart from the Mutiny, many Englishmen could give individual instances of Bengalee faithfulness almost unique in history, taking all the circumstances of our relation to India into account. The Bengalee is generally eager for knowledge of all kinds, and is often both courageous in the expression of his opinions, and gifted to a remarkable degree with the power to express those opinions with force and precision. Mr. Fawcett once told me that an unprepared speech made, on his behalf, during an election, by a young Hindoo, surpassed, in force as well as eloquence, any unprepared speech he ever had heard made by any member of the House of Commons, if four or five members of the House were excepted.

Among these Bengalees there is a small body of men—small for that large province—who are, ironically or otherwise termed "Young Bengal." Some of them are no longer young, but grave and aged; some have, in the course of years, been highly distinguished for their public services and their scientific and other attainments. Some have at times been misrepresented, and their language misinterpreted, so that on its return to them it has amazed none more than themselves. Nothing of this has been done by the really great administrators of India. That it has been done, however, cannot be denied.

In the forefront of this little band is the author of this book of travels, Baboo Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee—a writer of high repute, as I have said, also an administrator, as the reader will see from the title-page to this book. A keener, yet a kindlier satirist, one might seek for and not find. His use of the English language has astonished many an educated Englishman; and the quality of his reading is shown by his marvellous power of quotation; not merely from authors like Shakespeare, and Milton, and Macaulay, and men eminent in science, but from out-of-the-way old ballads, and little-known old pamphlets, in the application of which he leaves one wondering—first, how he obtained the productions at all, and secondly, how, having obtained them, he learned to apply them so appositely to the subjects which he intends them to illustrate.

Passing from the author to his book, we shall, perhaps, first of all be attracted to the work of the administrator. He comes upon a milkman's village, on which he finds fastened the grip of a Court favourite. He unloosens the grip, and re-settles the village, in the double interest of Prince and Peasant. And all the time he sees everything. The poor people bathing on the rivers' banks, have his genial and kindly, if also at times, what a Scotchman would call, his "pawky" notice. A "fair maid of Sonargoan" attracts his attention by the gracefulness with which she carries a vessel of water from the river; and, though the fair maid and he are divided by race and faith (she is Mussulman), she has his full meed of praise. Indeed, it must be admitted—and he will not be offended with me for saying so—that he never meets with a fair face, without at least giving evidence of the fact that he has eyes to see and a heart to comprehend.

Of his wide and generous sympathies, much might be said, and still leave much more to say. He meets a missionary on the river, and evidently is inclined, in writing his notes, to pass a joke on the subject. He nips it, however, in the bud, and contents himself with saying, "So new is preaching here, that the simple people said the padre had been singing in the street." He meets Catholic and Protestant missionaries on shipboard, and chuckles over their disputes, while he astonishes them by his command of the English language, and even by his knowledge of the Bible—a knowledge, I may add, which is evident in many of his writings.

A parrot falls overboard, and is drowned in its cage, to his great distress, which is not however paraded. He says: [Extract.]

These are not the words of a Christian, but of a Hindoo.

Again, he has a faithful ugly dog, whose name is Tom, and whose glory it once was to bark, with a noble independence, at some very dignified Sahibs. Our author is compelled to leave Tom behind; and here is his farewell [Extract.]

I think this is a very fine passage, and one that will draw the author very close to the great heart of humanity, wherever the words are read. Could anything be finer than the testimony to the two foreign "gentlemen," ending with the "Bengalee pariah, my poor Tom"? Not the pariah merely, but the pariah dog. The passage is worthy of the author, and of the great mercifulness of the land that bore him.

Whoever reads this book must be prepared further to find bold and manly language. The author is no flatterer of John Bull, though he gives John his due, and admits that India owes him a great debt. Here is one passage relating to foreign fruits: [Extract.]

Among the sketches of country—word-pictures—the reader will find some exceedingly pretty, and all the more valuable in that they are taken from a standground purely Indian; not English. Where an English artist's mind would be filled with European ideas, the mind of this gifted Eastern artist is filled with a class of ideas totally different, yet equally instructive and certainly not less subtle and far-reaching.

On the eve of one of his journeys, our author was placed in a dilemma of a kind not unknown to travellers in India, but not on that account the less stupid. He wished to go by a particular boat, and took time by the forelock for that purpose. The fare was at first stated as 90 rupees, to pay which he offered "a new crisp, fresh British India" note for 100 rupees. "It was," he adds, "fresh from the Currency Office, and had been received only the day before from another Government department." The rest of the story is thus told: [Extract.]

The humour of the little sketch is worth something. I can fancy the author laughing even in his dismay; for he can laugh well at others, and equally well at himself. I shall only venture on one more passage; and I give it as showing the spirit of the man who dares to call his newspaper Prince and Peasant. He desired to return to his home in Bengal, and to bid adieu, for a time at least, to Independent Tipperah, where he had been located "some two years." He received the Maharajah's permission to return home; but still he could not get away. [Extract.]

There is, I think, a sound lesson in this passage; the lesson of the immense value of courtesy and urbanity in the relations of rulers and ruled. There is a great deal in that sentence, "He serve flesh and blood." The best administrator in India is not always the ablest, the man whose plans are the wisest as plans; but the man who, with plans or without them, gives confidence to the people, and confidence not merely in his justice, but also in his consideration and forbearance. A clever man once said that the art of success in India is the art of giving good dinners. It may be so; but the peril is great—the peril of debt; and in any case the art has its limits, and its natural collapse. Even dinners and champagne pall in the end. But there is one art that never fails—the art of true courtesy; of that courtesy which, being natural, is not affected by any whim or caprice, either of the person who possesses it, or of any one with whom he has relations.

In bidding farewell to this little book, I once more recall, as I easily and very vividly can, the author's kindly face and gentle voice, as known to me many years ago. I see him, as I see Baboo Kristo Das Pal, Dr. Mahendra Lal Sircar, and some others, including a much-abused editor of the Amrita Bazar Patrika; and I feel and say, with all earnestness and sincerity, that among these are men whom the Government of India would be wise in recognising and winning entirely to its side. They are men on whom no really generous word—true as well as generous—ever is thrown away. I have compared them at times with men of kindred occupations at home, and I think that they are as a rule by far the truer gentlemen in good manners, and often in very much more than mere manners. May the great God, whose sacred Name they use as that of the Father of all, guide them to a nobler destiny than any they yet have known, and with them, and by them, bless their native land!

ASRUKANA

A Collection of poems in Bengali by SRIMATI GIRINDRAMOHINY DASSY (Author of Kabitar, Bharat Kusum.)

Asrukana is a collection of poetical pieces of singular pathos and beauty of expression. It is a series of mournful songs that the reader is here presented with and they must touch a sympathetic cord in every heart that can feel. There is a singular appropriateness in the title of the work, and in its pious dedication to the memory of the husband of the fair writer.—The Indian Nation.

The authoress is not unknown to Bengali readers. She has already published two or three poems by which she is favourably known, but between these poems and this is a difference that hardly admits of being measured.

This is poetry in life

We have read Srimati Girindra Mohiny's poems in a reverential spirit. The poems are all of a lyrical description. The lute is soft, sweet and tender, but awfully strong.

The tone of the poems is inexpressibly gentle, inexpressibly pure, and inexpressibly tender and affectionate. It is the tone of a world mother.

Bengal should be proud of this poem—The Calcutta Review.
